dition of the instrument had conformed to law." It would seem that, as the bond contained the figures "13,000" after the "$" mark when handed to the clerk by one of the sureties, who had taken the justification of the other sureties and who had been intrusted by them to deliver the bond to the clerk, and as the jury has found that "it was the purpose and intention of the defendants, at the time of signing the paper writing, that it should be used and filed as a guardian bond of F. C. Ebbs," if the "13,000" was written in by said co-surety before handing the bond to the clerk, it was immaterial, and the defendants cannot protect themselves by the act of their agent, of which the clerk had no knowledge. They, impliedly at least, authorized him to fill in the blank, and cannot be permitted now to deny such authority to the detriment of the ward.

But if the instrument could be taken as filed, with "$———" blank, as the defendants allege it was when signed by them, the above section 1891 provides that "any variance in the penalty or in the condition of the instrument from the provision prescribed by law" shall not invalidate it. A smaller variance than this could scarcely happen. The penalty named merely limits the liability of the sureties, and the insertion of "13,000" after "$———" merely restricted their liability to that sum, whereas without it their liability, by the tenor of the bond, extended to responsibility for the safe-keeping of any funds or property of the ward which might have come into the hands of the guardian, without limit as to the amount.

Independent of our curative statute, it is held that the bond "may be executed by the sureties while the penal sum is still blank, and, although the principal may have informed them that the sum is to be a certain amount, and he afterwards inserts a larger amount by direction of the judge of probate, yet the bond holds the sureties." Crowell on Executors and Administrators, 190; White v. Duggan, 140 Mass. 18, 2 N. E. 110, 54 Am. Rep. 437. Such bonds are unlike bonds for the payment of money (in which the amount is material), in that in these bonds the honest and faithful performance of duty by the fiduciary is the obligation, and the amount of the penalty is simply a form, and, at most, merely restricts the extent of the liability. Here, the amount ($13,000), even if inserted without knowledge of the defendants, aggregates exactly the sums for which they severally justified. In 2 Parsons on Contracts, 720, it is said: "An alteration which only does what the law would do—that is, expresses what the law implies—is not a material alteration, and therefore would not avoid an instrument." All the authorities hold that an alteration to be material must change the legal effect of the instrument. This is true even as to obligations for payment of money, as negotiable bills and the like. 2 Daniel, Neg. Instr.

§ 1373a. When a fiduciary "receives money or property upon the faith of a bond, he and his sureties are estopped to deny the validity of the bond." Pritchard, Wills & Adm. § 586, construing a statute similar to our Code, § 1891. Here the money was paid over by the federal court to the guardian upon a certified copy of this bond. "The insertion of the penal sum of a bond left blank will not vitiate the instrument." Brown v. Colquitt, 73 Ga. 59, 54 Am. Rep. 867; South Berwick v. Huntress, 53 Me. 89, 87 Am. Dec. 535; State v. Young, 23 Minn. 551. In the case from 53 Me. 89, Kent, J., says: "When the instrument is a sealed instrument, when signed by the party, the filling in of the blanks afterwards by another is not, strictly speaking, the execution of a sealed instrument. That has already been done by the party himself. The third party does not make it a specialty by his acts. It was one before. The filling up merely perfects an imperfect sealed deed or bond." "If one signs an instrument containing blanks, he must be understood to intrust it to the person to whom it is so delivered to be filled up properly, according to the agreement between the parties, and, when so filled, the instrument is as good as if originally executed in complete form." 2 Cyc. 159, and cases cited thereto in note 74. "An alteration of an instrument which merely supplies an omission therein, and conforms it to the intention of the parties, will not vitiate the writing, especially if a naked blank is left for the insertion of the omitted words." 2 A. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 212; Hunt v. Adams, 6 Mass. 519; Bank v. Stirling, 13 Nova Scotia, 439; Conner v. Routh, 7 How. (Miss.) 176, 40 Am. Dec. 59; Boyd v. Brotherston, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 93; Clute v. Small, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 238. "If a party to an instrument intrusts it to another for use, with blanks not filled, such instrument so delivered carries on its face an implied authority to fill up the blanks necessary to perfect the same; and, as between such party and innocent third person, the person to whom the instrument is so intrusted must be deemed the agent of the party who committed the instrument to his custody." 2 Cyc. 159. This is not only on the ground of implied agency, but because, when one of two innocent persons must suffer, the loss must fall upon him who has put it in the power of another to do the injury. Fisher v. Dennis, 6 Cal. 577, 65 Am. Dec. 534; Spittler v. James, 32 Ind. 202, 2 Am. Rep. 334; Fullerton v. Sturges, 4 Ohio St. 529.

It is not contended here that there was any fraud practiced on defendants, and the jury find that the instrument is of the purport and effect the signers intended. But had it been otherwise, the sureties having committed the bond, with the blank unfilled, to I. N. Ebbs to file with the clerk, not only gave him implied authority to fill it, but they are estopped to claim any protection from an act which they put it in their co-surety's power to commit, and which was unknown to the clerk. The same principle would apply if the sureties handed the bond to F. C. Ebbs or Taintor, who delivered it to I. N. Ebbs, the other surety, who handed it to the clerk.

The tenth, eleventh, and twelfth findings were that the "13,000" was "not inserted in the paper writing at the time" each of three of the sureties respectively named signed it. But taking this to mean that the "13,000" was not "in the writing" when respectively signed by them, the status is presented which we have discussed above. The first and ninth findings are not in conflict with such findings, for they are simply to the effect that, notwithstanding the "13,000" was filled in after such signing and before the bond was handed to the clerk, the bond was valid. If this was a conclusion of law submitted to the jury, the error was cured by the jury answering it correctly, and the judgment of the court to the same effect.

There are but two exceptions in the record: First, to the submission of issues 1, 6, 8, and 9. Issues 6 and 8 were not answered, and were harmless, even if erroneously submitted; and 1 and 9 arose on the pleadings. The other exception, that judgment upon the verdict should have been entered for the defendants, is discussed above.

DOUGLAS, J. (dissenting). I think the guardian bond is binding because it is a statutory bond, and, having been made and delivered for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the statute, carried with it the inherent authority to insert such amount of penalty as would meet the statutory requirement. In any other view of the case, I would be compelled to regard the penalty of the bond as a material and essential part thereof.

MONK et al. v. CITY OF WILMINGTON.

TRESPASS—TITLE—ADVERSE POSSESSION—BURDEN OF PROOF—PRESUMPTION.

1. In an action for damages for trespass to real estate, where plaintiff claims title by adverse possession, the burden is on him to show continuous possession.

2. There is no presumption that the possession of real estate is adverse.

Douglas, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Justice, Judge.

Action by John W. Monk and another against the city of Wilmington for damages for trespass to real estate. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. J. Bellamy, E. K. Bryan, and H. McClammy, for appellant. Jno. D. Bellamy, Bellamy & Bellamy, T. E. Brown, and Emple & Emple, for appellees.

CONNOR, J. The plaintiff seeks to recover upon a title founded upon a disseisin followed by 20 years' adverse possession. It is conceded that the original trespass by the plaintiff's ancestor was wrongful. This does not necessarily mean that it was such an ouster as put the true owner to an action of ejectment, and thereby put the statute of limitations into operation. His honor correctly told the jury that such possession, to ripen into title, must be open, notorious, continuous, exclusive, adverse, etc. The defendant insists that this has not been shown. The plaintiff John W. Monk says that his father, after purchasing the 30 acres adjoining the locus in quo in 1876 or 1877, ran his fence in the manner described by him, which it is claimed covers the land. He continued such occupancy as he had until his death, in 1882. His wife remained in the occupation of the same character until her death, in 1885. Thomas J. Kenan, one of the plaintiff's witnesses, the husband of the feme plaintiff, testified: "After she died, my wife and Jno. W. Monk rented the land to one Dodge. My wife and Mr. Monk made a division of the land in 1886. After division I put some cattle in pasture occasionally. I know the boundaries of the thirty-acre tract. That is an independent tract, and has nothing to do with the land in controversy. After the widow of Thos. Monk died, my wife and John W. Monk leased the locus for five years to Dodge." After testifying to other matters, this witness continues: "Some seven acres of the land upon which the rock quarry is situated is fit for cultivation. You could have planted a crop where the rock quarry is now. That land was fit for cultivation. After the lease to Dodge was out, Jno. W. Monk, the coplaintiff, did not lease the seven acres where the rock quarry is to Southerland, or Rhodes, or to any one else. Rhodes leased from Jno. W. Monk the thirty-acre tract east of that. It was not leased to anybody after the Dodge lease was out, but Rhodes pastured his cattle there after he leased the other land from Jno. W. Monk. Nor did Jno. W. Monk do anything on the land after the Dodge lease was out. The Dodge lease was for five years from 1885." Mr. Rhodes, a witness for the plaintiff, testified: "In 1893 I rented some land from Mr. Monk. I don't say I rented this seven acres. I rented all the land that Jno. W. Monk owned between the New Bern road and the plank road, except five acres, which was reserved on the side next to the plank road, which does not touch the place where the rock quarry now is. I pastured my cattle upon the land where the rock quarry is in 1893, until the rock quarry was started in 1899, and the fence was torn down. I used the land for pasture where the rock quarry is, and that was all it was used for. The thirty-acre tract and the other land which I rented was used for cultivation. I rented the land that I rented from Mr. Monk for five years from 1893 and until it was sold. When I had my cattle on the land in controversy, Mr. W. A. Wright came to me one day, three or four or five years before they began to excavate rock at the rock quarry, and wanted to rent the seven acres in controversy, and I told him that I didn't wish to rent it; that I had more land than I wanted, and I hadn't already rented it; that I didn't want it. I told him I thought I already had it rented; that I had rented it from Monk. He then tried to sell it to me, and I told him that I didn't want to buy. This was in 1895, '96, or '97. It was before the rock quarry was started. I think it was three or four years before the rock quarry was started. The next thing I saw the rock quarry was going on there."

It is elementary learning that the adverse possession necessary to bar the entry of the true owner must be continuous. Ruffin, J., in Malloy v. Bruden, 86 N. C. 251, says: "At all times there is a presumption in favor of the true owner, and he is deemed by law to have possession coextensive with his title, unless actually ousted by the personal occupation of another; and so, too, whenever that occupation by another ceases, the title again draws to it the possession, and the seisin of the owner is restored, and a subsequent entry by the same wrongdoer and under the same claim of title constitute a new disseisin from the date of which the statute takes a fresh start." In this case a break of two years was held sufficient to prevent the continuity of the possession. In Holdfast v. Shephard, 28 N. C. 361, a break "of four and a half or five months" was held sufficient. Here the plaintiffs' witnesses testify that there was a period of seven years during which Monk did nothing with the land. Rhodes, under a lease for an adjoining tract, pastured his cattle upon it. From 1877, the date of the first trespass, to 1890, was only 13 years. The Dodge lease expired in 1890. In 1893 Monk leased to Rhodes the 30-acre tract adjoining the locus in quo, and, so far as we can discover, asserts no claim or possession of the land after that time. Rhodes pastured his cattle on it, but says expressly, "I do not say I rented this seven acres." His entire testimony is consistent with that of Kenan, who says that Monk did not lease it to Rhodes. This is consistent with the fact shown by the plaintiffs that when Monk and his sister made partition of their father's land this seven acres was not included, although the deed of Mary E. Monk to her brother for the 30-acre adjoining tract and some other small parcels contains this language: "The foregoing described tracts, pieces or parcels of land being all the land owned by the late Thos. Monk which lies on the north of the old plank road." The plaintiff says that after the execution of this deed his sister had no possession or occupancy of the land. It is true that Monk says, after the Dodge lease was out, "I leased the property to Mr. Southerland for five years, and after Mr. Southerland's lease was out I leased it to Isaac Rhodes." Two of his witnesses say that the locus in quo was not leased to Rhodes. It is difficult to reconcile the testimony of the plaintiffs' witnesses with this statement. The lease was not put in evidence. The burden was on the plaintiff to show the continuous possession.

The defendant asked his honor to instruct the jury: "There is no presumption that the possession of the plaintiffs and those under whom they claim is adverse." This was refused, and his honor instructed the jury: "If you should find from the evidence that Thos. Monk and his son J. W. Monk had actual possession of the disputed land, said possession is deemed to be adverse, and will be so held until the contrary appears." The defendant excepted. It must be conceded that there is some conflict in the authorities upon this question. Judge Bynum, writing for a unanimous court in Parker v. Banks, 79 N. C. 480, said: "The law never presumes a wrong; hence he who alleges an adverse possession must show it as well as allege it." The learned justice discusses the question with his usual clearness and force, sustaining the opinion by the most approved authorities. This seems to be in accord with section 146 of the Code: "In action for the recovery of real property or the possession thereof or damages for a trespass on such property, the person establishing a legal title to the premises shall be presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time required by law; and the occupation of such premises by any other person shall be deemed to have been under and in subordination to the legal title, unless it appears that such premises have been held and possessed adversely to such legal title for the time prescribed by law before the commencement of such action." This court held in Ruffin v. Overby, 88 N. C. 369, "that every possession of land by one other than the claimant is deemed to be adverse until proof to the contrary is made." This section of the Code, which is taken from the New York Code, has never been construed by this court. We think that the defendant was entitled to the instruction asked.

Several other interesting questions are raised upon the record. The plaintiff put in evidence the deed from Adam Emple, administrator of J. S. Green, to W. A. Wright, bearing date March 16, 1873. He then shows that this deed covers the locus in quo. The defendant also puts this deed in evidence. The plaintiff asked his honor to charge the jury that, in the absence of any evidence showing that Mr. Emple was administrator, and obtained license to sell this land, the deed conveyed no title. Whether, after putting the deed in evidence, the plaintiff can thus attack it, is not clear. It will be observed that the deed is 30 years old. How far its recitals may be taken as true by reason of its age is an interesting question. If this deed conveys the title, it would seem that the plaintiff, together with the defendant, have shown an unbroken chain of title from the state to Mr. Wright, and that the statutory presumption in regard to the character of Monk's occupancy would arise. Of course, if this deed does not convey title, his honor was correct in holding that there was a break in the paper title. It does not appear why the record was not put in evidence. It is to be hoped that, if this case shall again come to this court, the record will clearly present for construction the language of section 146 of the Code. It seems that the case of Ruffin v. Overby is in conflict with this section. This may be explained by reference to the fact that the ouster in that case occurred prior to 1868, as it did in Bryan v. Spivey, 109 N. C. 57, 13 S. E. 766. The question raised by the brief and argument that the action of the defendant in making the contract and removing the rock, being in violation of the provisions of the charter of the city, is ultra vires, not being raised by the pleadings, we deem it best to express no opinion in respect thereto.

We think that there should be a new trial.

DOUGLAS, J. (dissenting). Want of time prevents me at this late day from thoroughly discussing the opinion of the court, and so I will merely indicate one or two of the salient points of error. The opinion apparently attempts to reconcile the testimony by excluding that of the plaintiff, and then proceeds to find as a fact that there was a break in Monk's possession. In the opinion appear the following significant paragraphs: "It is true that Monk says, after the Dodge lease was out, 'I leased the property to Mr. Southerland for five years, and after Mr. Southerland's lease was out I leased it to Isaac Rhodes.' Two of his witnesses say that the locus in quo was not leased to Rhodes. It is difficult to reconcile the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses with this statement." This court is not called upon to reconcile the testimony of Monk with that of other witnesses, nor has it the right to say his testimony is any less worthy of credit than that of others. Monk testifies that he was in actual possession, and the jury alone can pass upon the credibility of his testimony and its relative weight as compared with that of other witnesses.

Again, the opinion of the court places upon the evidence of Rhodes the construction most unfavorable to the plaintiff, while deciding against the plaintiff. It is true Rhodes said, "I do not say I rented this seven acres," but he evidently meant to say that he did not know whether he had a valid lease. This is shown by his further testimony that when Wright wished to rent the land to Rhodes he expressly declined to rent because he had already rented the same land from Monk. His exact words as stated in the record are as follows: "I told him I thought I already had it rented; that I had rented it from Monk." This is clearly consistent with Monk's testimony, if the question of consistency can be considered by this court. This court held in Ruffin v. Overby, 88 N. C. 369, that "every possession of land by one other than the claimant is deemed to be adverse until proof to the contrary is made"; that is, that the possessor is deemed to be holding under his own right. But suppose that this decision is in conflict with section 146 of the Code, that section does not profess to be conclusive. The presumption does not arise until the claimant "establishes a legal right to the premises," and not then even if "it appears that such premises have been held and possessed adversely to such legal title." Monk's own testimony to facts tending to show that he was holding adversely would be sufficient to carry the case to the jury, even if he were not corroborated by others. His inclosing the locus in quo with other land, admittedly his own, by a common fence; his using it for pasture; his renting it to others, and paying no rent to himself—are all circumstances tending to prove that he was holding adversely.

This case was one peculiarly for the jury, and I do not think that their verdict should be disturbed, except for some material error of law in the trial; certainly not on account of any view we might have as to the weight of conflicting evidence.

BOTTOMS et al. v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 13, 1904.)

RAILROADS—DUTY TO USE SPARK ARRESTERS—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTION—PREJUDICIAL EFFECT.

1. It is not the duty of a railroad company to equip its engines with the "best approved" spark arresters, but merely with such approved appliances as are in general use.

2. Error in charging that it was defendant's duty to equip its engines with the "best approved" spark arresters was not rendered harmless by uncontradicted evidence that the engine claimed to have set the fire was equipped with the best approved spark arrester; this fact not being expressly admitted, and there being evidence that a shower of large sparks was emitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Northampton County; Cooke, Judge.

Action by J. D. Bottoms and others against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

T. W. Mason, Day & Bell, and Murray Allen, for appellant. Peebles & Harris and Gay & Midyette, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. In this action for damages for destruction of the plaintiffs' store, alleged to have been set on fire by sparks from the defendant's engine, the court charged the jury that it was "the duty of railroad companies to equip their engines with the best approved devices and appliances for arresting sparks, * * *" and that failure to do so was negligence, making the defendant liable for damages if the jury should find that the plaintiffs' house was set on fire by sparks from the defendant's engine. The defendant excepted.

There is error. In Witsell v. Railroad, 120 N. C. 557, 27 S. E. 125, this court said that it was not negligence to fail to adopt improved appliances merely because they are "known" and "approved"; that railroads were not to be held to so strict a rule that they must keep a lookout for improvements and inventions and buy all such as were approved; and held the correct rule to be thus: "It is negligence not to adopt and use all approved appliances which are in general use." It added that to require the purchase of approved appliances before they had come into general use would be simply to hold that every railroad must have "the latest and best," which would be an unreasonable burden. This ruling has been uniformly followed since. In Greenlee v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 979, 30 S. E. 115, 41 L. R. A. 399, 65 Am. St. Rep. 734, and Troxler v. Railroad, 124 N. C. 191, 32 S. E. 550, 44 L. R. A. 313, 70 Am. St. Rep. 580, the court cites with approval from Witsell v. Railroad, supra, that it was "not negligence to fail to provide the latest improved appliances," and that "a railroad company is liable for any injury caused by failure to use approved appliances in general use." The same language is again quoted and approved in Lloyd v. Hanes, 128 N. C. 364, 35 S. E. 611, Dorsett v. Mfg. Co., 131 N. C. 262, 42 S. E. 612, and other cases, and repeated as recently as Marks v. Cotton Mills, 135 N. C. 290, 47 S. E. 432. The rule laid down in Aycock v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 326, is "usual and proper appliances" to prevent injury by escaping sparks. This is about the same ruling as in Witsell v. Railroad, in somewhat different language.

The learned counsel for the plaintiffs contends that the defendant's witness testified that the engine had the best approved spark arrester, and no witness testified to the contrary; hence, as the charge must be read in connection with the evidence, the error, being as to a matter not in controversy, was harmless; and that the real point in this part of the charge was as to the continued keeping of the spark arrester in good condition, as to which the court charged correctly, and not as to the nature of the spark arrest-er, which was not denied to be the "best approved." But Mr. Allen, of counsel for the defendant, pointed out that, while no witness directly testified to the contrary, it was not admitted that it was a proper spark arrester. The plaintiffs' evidence of a shower of large sparks coming from the engine, if believed, tended to question the defendant's evidence of the spark arrester being the "best approved" pattern, fully as much as it tended to controvert the evidence of its being kept in order.

Error.

BABCOCK PRINTING PRESS MFG. CO. v. HERBERT et al.

REPLEVIN—INNOCENT PURCHASER—PAYMENT OF VALUE—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF DECEASED—ADMISSIBILITY—SUPREME COURT—POWER TO RENDER JUDGMENT.

1. Code, § 957, requiring the Supreme Court to render such judgment as, on inspection of the whole record, it shall appear ought to be rendered, is not applicable to effect a reversal of a judgment for defendant as against the evidence, where the objection that there was no evidence was not raised before verdict by a prayer for instructions to the jury.

2. In an action to recover possession of a printing press sold by plaintiff by conditional sale, which passed into the hands of a publishing company as an alleged innocent purchaser, declarations of the deceased buyer are inadmissible to show that he received value from the publishing company.

3. In order to show that a person was a purchaser for value, a fair consideration must be shown, and payment of a price which would not cause surprise; and, where payment is alleged to have been made in the stock of a corporation, its condition when the stock was issued to the purchaser is material.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by the Babcock Printing Press Manufacturing Company against W. M. Herbert, administrator of the estate of W. S. Herbert, deceased, and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. D. Pollock, for appellant. Loftin & Varser and Land & Cowper, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This is an action for the recovery of personal property, to wit, a printing press and its fixtures. So far as we are able to gather the facts from the record, it appears that the plaintiff, a corporation, and the manufacturer of the press, claims title to the same and the right of possession by virtue of a contract with one W. S. Herbert, now deceased; the agreement being described in the case as a "contract of conditional sale." This contract was dated March 26, 1902, and was filed for registration July 24, 1902. No copy of it is set out in the record, and we are not informed as to its contents. It was introduced merely by the general description we have already given. The plaintiff introduced in evidence a series of notes dated July 19, 1902; a copy of one of the series of notes being set out in the case. It refers to the contract of March 26th, and recites that it was given "pursuant to the agreement." The defendant claims the title and right to the possession of the press as receiver of the Kinston Publishing Company, to which company he alleges it was sold and transferred after the date of the contract of conditional sale between the plaintiff and Herbert, and before the date of its registration. It is also alleged by the receiver that the Kinston Publishing Company purchased the press for value, and without notice, in law, of the contract of conditional sale. There was much testimony introduced by the parties upon the question of the purchase of the press by the publishing company, and of the price paid for it. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. It is stated in the "case" that "the court charged the jury fully on every phase of the case, and gave the contentions of both sides. There was no exception taken to the charge." There are no assignments of error.

While it may be that the conditional sale had not been consummated by the delivery to the plaintiff of the notes for the purchase price, and that there was merely an executory contract to sell, and that, at the time it is alleged the publishing company bought, W. S. Herbert had no title to the press to sell, as contended by the plaintiff's counsel, we cannot consider or decide the question, as there is no exception in the record which raises it. If the plaintiff had asked for an instruction to the jury based upon the contract and the evidence as to the time of giving the notes, and had caused to be set forth in the case a copy of the contract, so that we might determine its nature and legal effect with reference to the time of the delivery of the notes, the proposition argued at length in the brief of the counsel would be before us. But there was no prayer for instructions either as to the plaintiff's or the defendant's evidence and no exception to the charge. There is therefore nothing to consider in respect to the charge or the failure to charge. We cannot yield to the argument that, as there is no evidence of a purchase for value by the publishing company, we should reverse the judgment or award a new trial because the statute (Code, § 957) requires that we should render such a judgment as, on inspection of the whole record, it shall appear to us ought, in law, to be rendered thereon. That section does not apply. The alleged defect does not arise in the record, as distinguished from the "case on appeal." Taylor v. Plummer, 105 N. C. 56, 11 S. E. 266. An objection that there is no evidence must be raised before verdict, by a proper prayer for instructions to the jury, and comes too late after the objector has taken his chances upon the verdict and has

While we cannot consider the argument of counsel upon the effect to be given to the negotiations and dealings between the plaintiff and Herbert, and between the latter and the Kinston Publishing Company, with a view of determining who has the title to the property, we yet think that an error was committed in the admission of testimony which entitles the plaintiff to a new trial. Several witnesses, and among them D. F. Wooten, were permitted to testify as to the declarations made to them or in their hearing by W. S. Herbert, tending to show, and introduced for the purpose of showing, that he had received value from the publishing company for the press. This evidence was nothing more than hearsay, and should have been excluded. It is evident that the witness Wooten had no personal knowledge of the matters to which he testified, for he closes his testimony as follows: "I do not know whether Mr. Herbert sold the press to the company, or received a penny for it." What he had previously said, as coming from Herbert, was clearly incompetent, and was calculated to prejudice the plaintiff before the jury upon the question they were trying. The plaintiff further contended that the testimony of the several stockholders was incompetent, under section 590 of the Code. It is not necessary to decide this question, as it may not again be presented, and, besides, the facts as to the insolvency of the publishing company are not sufficiently explicit for us to pass upon them intelligently.

The defendant claims that the publishing company was a purchaser for value, and, in order to sustain this plea, he must show that the purchase was at "a fair and reasonable price, according to the common mode of dealing between buyers and sellers" (Fullenwider v. Roberts, 20 N. C. 278), or, as is said in Worthy v. Caddell, 76 N. C. 82, "the party assuming to be a purchaser for valuable consideration must prove a fair consideration, not up to the full price, but a price paid which would not cause surprise, or make any one exclaim: 'He got the property for nothing. There must have been some fraud or contrivance about it.'" The principle is clearly stated by Connor, J., in Collins v. Davis, 132 N. C. 109, 43 S. E. 579. It is alleged that Herbert received stock of the publishing company for the press. It does not appear what was the value of this stock. The company, it is said, is now insolvent. What its condition was when the stock was issued to Herbert, if it ever was issued, is a material inquiry. The publishing company must have paid something more, as we have seen, than what would be sufficient as a consideration to support a contract, if the defendant expects to show that the company was a purchaser for value. It must also appear that the press was bought by the company itself, and not merely that the negotiations for the purchase were conducted by one of the stockholders, or even by all of them when not assembled in corporate meeting. Duke v. Markham, 105 N. C. 181, 10 S. E. 1003; Pinchback v. Mining Co. (at this term) 49 S. E. 106. The purchase must have been the corporate act of the company. While the corporation need not act directly, but may be represented by one or more individuals, in making contracts, provided he or they are duly authorized so to act in its behalf, it must at last be the act of the corporation, and not of its individual members, in order to be binding.

The questions we have mentioned may be more fully presented at the next trial, and we do not intend by what has been said to intimate any opinion in regard to them. In the present state of the evidence, we could not well do so.

For the error in admitting incompetent testimony, there must be another trial. New trial.

DOUGLAS, J., concurs in result.

SUFFOLK & C. RY. CO. v. WEST END LAND & IMPROVEMENT CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1904.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—CONDEMNATION PROCEEDING—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. In a proceeding to condemn land, evidence to show the value of the land by its location and surroundings is admissible.

2. In a proceeding to condemn land for a right of way, a tax list is inadmissible to show the value of the land.

3. Where a railroad condemns the whole of a dedicated street, the abutting owner is entitled to compensation for the full value of the land taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Hoke, Judge.

Special proceedings by the Suffolk & Carolina Railway Company against the West End Land & Improvement Company to condemn land. From a judgment for defendant for $2,300 damages, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is a special proceeding to condemn a right of way for railroad purposes through certain lands owned by the defendant. It appears that the defendant bought about 130 acres of land adjoining the corporate limits of Elizabeth City, which is laid off into lots and streets. Some of the streets were improved, while others were not. Among the unimproved streets was Grice street, which was condemned as an entirety as a right of way for the use of the plaintiff, and has been taken for such use. The report of the commissioners does not state the length or width of the right of way, but describes it simply as "all that certain strip of land across the lands of the defendant company and known and described as 'Grice Street.'" The evidence and the plat show that said street is 50 feet wide, including sidewalks; that is, between the building lines. The sole issue was the amount of damages that the de-defendant was entitled to recover, which were assessed by the jury at $2,300. There was testimony on both sides. The plaintiff appealed from the judgment rendered.

Pruden & Pruden and E. F. Aydlett, for appellant. Ward & Thompson, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. (after stating the case). The principles involved in this case are few and well settled. Its determination really depends more upon the weight given to the testimony, and that has been settled by the verdict of the jury. The first exception is to the admission of the following testimony given by a witness for the defendant: "There is a street two blocks away, parallel to the one down which the railroad runs, which has been improved at considerable expense, having been paved with brick, and on this street several residences of good size and quality have been erected. The said improved street and the street covered by the right of way of the railroad are parts of the same tract of land, belonged to the defendant company, and are near each other. The said improvements placed upon the property in question increase the value of the whole tract. Cross-streets connected the improved street with Grice street." The record states that it was given on cross-examination. This is denied by the plaintiff. We must assume the truth of the record, but it makes no difference, as we think the evidence was competent in either event. It does not come within the prohibition of the rule affirmed in Rice v. Railroad, 130 N. C. 375, 41 S. E. 1031, following Warren v. Makely, 85 N. C. 12, and that class of cases. It does not seek to prove the value of one piece of land by comparison with the value of another, but to show its value by its location and surroundings. It is common knowledge that suburban property will sell better if it is in a good neighborhood, near to a macadamized road, and in the immediate vicinity of churches and schools. If this property is within two squares of a paved street and close to good houses, it would necessarily sell for more than if it were far from any house, with a mile of mudholes between it and the town. This seems to us less a question of law than of the natural and necessary effect of the evidence. The witness had testified on his direct examination that the lots on Grice street were worth $150 on an average; that the damage would average at least 50 per cent., and would amount in his opinion to $5,625, being an average of $75 per lot. On cross-examination he was testifying to facts which tended to show the reasonableness of the opinion he had expressed. We do not find any exception to this evidence in the record, but, as both sides argued it under the assumption that there was an exception, we have considered it in that view. We see no error in its admission.

The second exception is to the exclusion of the tax list which was offered by the plaintiff to show the value of the land in question. It was properly excluded as being clearly incompetent for the purpose for which it was expressly offered. There are cases in which the tax lists have been admitted as some evidence, though slight, of claim of title and of the character of possession by the party listing the same. Austin v. King, 97 N. C. 339, 2 S. E. 678; Pasley v. Richardson, 119 N. C. 449, 26 S. E. 32; Barnhardt v. Brown, 122 N. C. 587, 29 S. E. 884, 65 Am. St. Rep. 725; Gates v. Max, 125 N. C. 139, 34 S. E. 266. Where the mere listing of the land is the act sought to be shown, the tax lists are admissible, because the lister is the actor; but the rule is essentially different where the value of the land is sought to be proved thereby, because the valuation is the act of the assessors, and therefore res inter alios acta as between the parties to this proceeding. As was said by the court, through Pearson, C. J., in Cardwell v. Mebane, 68 N. C. 485: "The 'tax lists' were not competent evidence to show the value of the land, as the assessors were not witnesses in the case, sworn and subject to cross-examination in the presence of the jury." In that case the tax lists were admitted for the purpose of proving the good faith of the vendees, who were charged with paying their father an exorbitant or fictitious price for the land, but not for the purpose of showing its actual value. In Ridley v. Railroad, 124 N. C. 37, 32 S. E. 379, this court, speaking through Clark, J., says: "Acquiescence in listing and payment of taxes by another is evidence against the party out of possession. But the tax valuation being placed on the land by the tax assessors, without the intervention of the landowner, no inference that it is a correct valuation can be drawn from his failure to except that the valuation is too low. Such valuation was res inter alios acta, and is not competent against the plaintiff."

The third and last exception is to the following part of his honor's charge, to wit: "The jury would estimate the damages, if any, arising from the impaired value of defendant's land caused by condemnation of plaintiff's right of way; would deduct therefrom any advantages and benefits arising from the construction of plaintiff's railroad which were peculiar to this land, but not such benefits and advantages as were common to this and the public generally; and, on applying this rule, the excess, if any, of the damages over the benefits and advantages, would be the amount to award defendant in response to this issue." It is needless to discuss this question, in view of the recent and well-considered case of Railroad v. Owners of Platt Lands, 133 N. C. 266, 45 S. E. 589, in which the rule laid down in the charge is expressly approved. In fact, the plaintiff does not seem to question it as a general proposition of law, but in its brief explains the nature of its objection in the following words: "The objection to the charge of the court is that the court left it with the jury to estimate full damages for the right of way of plaintiff. We think this is error. The street had been appropriated for the public. The property had been laid off in lots, and the streets were necessary for the use of the lots. They are marked on the plat, and the property is being offered for sale in lots, so that the defendant owning this property would be entitled to damages by reason of the additional burden placed upon Grice street, and not for the full damage for the right of way. Grice street, as shown by the plat, is donated for the use of the public, being laid off in lots, and the defendants cannot withdraw the right to the street, and do not claim or desire to do so; therefore they are not entitled to the street which they have donated for the use of these lots and means to sell them, and they can only recover, by reason of the ownership of the adjoining lots, such additional burden as the right of way for the plaintiff shall place upon said Grice street. It is admitted by both plaintiff and defendants that where the railroad right of way goes is Grice street." The plaintiff relies upon White v. Railroad, 113 N. C. 610, 18 S. E. 330, 22 L. R. A. 627, 37 Am. St. Rep. 639, and Hodges v. Tel. Co., 133 N. C. 225, 45 S. E. 572, in support of its contention that the defendant can recover only for the additional burden of the railroad right of way. To the same effect is Phillips v. Tel. Co., 130 N. C. 513, 41 S. E. 1022, 89 Am. St. Rep. 868. We presume that the principle itself is not questioned by either party to this proceeding, however they may differ as to its application. In the case at bar the plaintiff does not in practical effect impose an additional burden upon the street, but takes the street itself from building line to building line, thus rendering it useless as a highway, and destroying the essential purpose of its dedication. It is stated in the evidence that the plaintiff is digging up the entire street, and that the track is above the level of the surrounding land. This will virtually compel the owners to cut off from the abutting lots enough land to make a street on each side of the right of way, which would not leave sufficient depth for suburban lots in the absence of public sewerage. Moreover, under these circumstances the street would be practically impassable from side to side, and could never be made a handsome or convenient thoroughfare. It is well settled that the defendant is entitled to recover not only the value of the land taken, but also the damage thereby caused to the remainder of the land. Even if the plaintiff should not use the entire right of way, the rule would be the same, as it is not what the plaintiff actually does, but what it acquires the right to do, that determines the quantum of damages. If the plaintiff acquires the right to use the entire street, that land is, in contemplation of law, just as much taken for the purposes of the easement as if it were filled with railroad tracks. Of course, this rule does not apply to subsequent acts of tort not contemplated in the original condemnation. This distinction is clearly pointed out in Railroad v. Wicker, 74 N. C. 220, and the rule therein laid down has been uniformly followed by this court. Brown v. Railroad, 83 N. C. 128; Knight v. Railroad, 111 N. C. 80, 15 S. E. 929; Mullen v. Canal Co., 130 N. C. 496, 41 S. E. 1027, 61 L. R. A. 833. We are somewhat struck with the action of the original commissioners who assessed the defendant's net damages at $100, stating in explanation that they had estimated and deducted "the increased value peculiar to part of said abutting land that the said railroad would bring." What this increased value would be, or how it would be brought about, they do not state. The only evidence we find of any such probable increase in value is the statement, made by both the plaintiff's witnesses, that the railroad "opened up the property for factories, and increased the value of the same more than the damages sustained." To destroy property for the purpose for which the owners alone intend it, and turn it into factory sites when there are no factories in sight, is a benefit entirely too remote and contingent to be capable of present estimation. Some of us may have heard of factory sites before, and, as we listened to the siren voice of the real estate agent, have seen lofty factories rise in the air, pouring forth their countless thousands of well-paid operatives seeking to buy a few choice lots in the neighborhood of Eden. Perhaps we have revisited in after years the scene of once bright but faded anticipations, only to find a lonely cow grazing in the middle of Broadway, or a solitary pig pen standing as a monument to buried hopes. It is due to the plaintiff's counsel to say that they did not press this contention in this court either in brief or argument.

There is another matter which, while not under exception, we think deserves attention. The commissioners, in their report condemning the land, describe it as follows: "Did proceed to condemn, and by these presents do condemn, all that certain strip of land across the lands of the defendant company, and known and described as 'Grice Street,' for a right of way to be used by the plaintiff company for the purposes set out in said petition." It is true the said right of way was fully and correctly described in the plaintiff's petition, which referred to a plat properly filed; but it seems to us that, as the easement is conveyed to the petitioner by the report of the commissioners when confirmed, the said easement should be therein described as fully and correctly as it would be in a grant. Indeed, it might be better if the extent of the easement were also set out in the judgment of the court, although in the present case his honor's judgment could not have been other than it was as the case was presented to him.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

(137 N. C. 310)

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF MACON COUNTY v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF MACON COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 19, 1904.)

TAXATION—POLL TAX—PURPOSES OF TAX—USE OF FUNDS—CONSTITUTION.

1. Const. art. 5, § 1, makes it the duty of the General Assembly to levy a capitation tax on every male inhabitant between certain ages, which will be equal to the tax on property valued at $300, but that the state and county tax combined shall not exceed $2 on the poll. Section 2 provides that the proceeds of the state and county capitation tax shall be applied to the purposes of education and the support of the poor. Section 7 provides that every act of the General Assembly levying a tax shall state the object to which it is to be applied, and that it shall be applied to no other purposes. Laws 1903, p. 303, c. 240, authorized Macon county to levy a special tax of 30 cents on the $100 worth of property, and 90 cents on each taxable poll, for the benefit of the public roads, and provided that such tax should not be applied to any other purposes. Held, that Const. art. 5, § 7, does not apply merely to taxes on property, and, the limit of $2 poll taxation having been reached in Macon county for general purposes, taxes collected under the act of 1903 did not belong to the school and poor fund, but could only be used for the purpose specified in the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Macon County; Ferguson, Judge.

Mandamus by the board of education of Macon county to compel the board of commissioners of the county to apply the proceeds of a certain tax to the support of the public schools. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff board of education in its complaint alleges: That the defendant board of commissioners at their regular meeting on the first Monday in June, 1904, levied a tax of $1.58 on each taxable poll in the county for school purposes, and 30 cents for the support of the poor. The state had theretofore levied 12 cents on each poll for pensions, all of which aggregated $2 on the poll; being the constitutional limit. That, at the session of 1903 of the General Assembly, an act was duly passed authorizing the commissioners of Macon county to levy a special tax of 30 cents on the $100 worth of property, and 90 cents on each taxable poll, for the purpose of working the public roads of said county. That by said act it was provided that the special taxes levied and collected pursuant to the authority thus conferred should constitute a special fund for working the roads, and that they should not be applied to any other purpose. Chapter 240, p. 303, Laws 1903. The plaintiff asked that a mandamus issue, commanding the defendant board to apply the proceeds of the tax levied on the polls by said act to the support of the public schools of Macon county. The defendant board demurred to the complaint. His honor Judge Ferguson sustained the demurrer, and rendered judgment against the plaintiff for costs. Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

T. J. Johnston, for appellant. Horn & Mann, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts). Well-prepared and well-considered briefs were filed in this case by counsel on each side. They have aided us in considering and deciding the interesting question presented for the first time for decision. The plaintiff's counsel say, "The decision of the case turns upon the question whether a capitation tax levied by the commissioners in pursuance of a special act of the Legislature for a special purpose, as contemplated by article 5, § 6, of the Constitution, must be appropriated in the manner prescribed in section 2 of the same article." The defendant resists the construction contended for by pointing us to section 7 of the same article.

Section 2, art. 5, provides "that the proceeds of the state and county capitation tax shall be applied to the purposes of education and the support of the poor," etc. Section 6 provides that "the taxes levied by the commissioners of the several counties for county purposes, shall be levied in like manner with the state taxes and shall never exceed the double of the state tax, except for a special purpose, and with the approval of the General Assembly." Section 7: "Every act of the General Assembly levying a tax shall state the object to which it is to be applied, and it shall be applied to no other purpose."

The plaintiff contends that, by section 2, the proceeds of all capitation taxes, whether derived from the general revenue act, made to meet the ordinary and necessary expenses of the state and county government, or from special acts authorizing the levy of a tax for a special purpose, exceeding the constitutional limit, must be applied to the support of the public schools and the poor; that section 2 controls the application of all capitation taxes, thus confining the language of section 7 to property taxes. The defendant contends that section 2 should be confined in its application to capitation taxes levied pursuant to the requirement of section 1, art. 5, to meet the equation prescribed for ordinary expenses of the state and county government; that section 7 controls the application of not only all property taxes, but all capitation taxes levied pursuant to special laws for a special purpose. The defendant suggests that, whether this is correct as to all capitation taxes, it is certainly so as to all such taxes in excess of $2. It must be conceded that there is an apparent condict between the two sections. It is our duty to reconcile them, so that, if possible, both be given force and effect. It is said by Judge Cooley: "If different portions seem to conflict, the courts must harmonize them, if practicable, and must lean in favor of a construction which will render every word operative, rather than one which may make some words idle and nugatory." Const. Lim. 92. Article 5 of the Constitution has been the subject of much controversy. The construction and reconciliation of the different sections have given the court much difficulty. There can be no doubt that the restrictions and limitations therein have seriously embarrassed the Legislature in providing necessary revenue to meet the demands of a growing, progressive community. It is impossible to read the many opinions of the justices of this court without being impressed with this fact. It would seem that to arrive at satisfactory, or at least workable, results, the court has run very close to the line which separates construction from making the law. We may, however, in the light of the decisions, treat some questions as settled. By the express language of article 5, § 1, it is made the duty of the General Assembly to levy a capitation tax on every male inhabitant between the ages of 21 and 50, which shall be equal to the tax on property valued at $300 in cash; that such state and county tax combined shall never exceed $2 on the poll. Mr. Justice Rodman, who was a member of the constitutional convention of 1868, at the June term, 1869, of this court, in University R. R. v. Holden, 63 N. C. 427, said: "It is too plain to admit of an argument that the intent of this section was to establish an invariable proportion between the poll tax and the property tax, and that, as the former is limited to two dollars on the poll, the latter is limited to two dollars on the three hundred dollars worth of property." That, with the exceptions pointed out in Jones v. Com'rs, 107 N. C. 248, 12 S. E. 69, and Wingate v. Parker (at this term) 48 S. E. 774, observance of this equation is essential to the validity of all revenue or taxing laws, is shown by the uniform decisions of this court. Russell v. Ayer, 120 N. C. 180, 27 S. E. 133, 37 L. R. A. 246. In Jones v. Com'rs, supra, it was held that the necessity for observing the equation applied to all laws providing for revenues for the ordinary and necessary expenses of the state and county government, and all special acts authorizing counties to levy a special tax to meet the necessary expenses, such as building a courthouse, a bridge, or improving the roads, etc. It was therefore essential to the validity of the tax of 30 cents on property that a tax of 90 cents on the poll be levied and collected. We then have two provisions in article 5 of the Constitution; one requiring "the proceeds of the state and county capitation tax to be applied to the purpose of education," etc.; the other declaring that "every act of the General Assembly levying a tax shall state the special object to which it is to be applied," etc. If sections 1 and 2 are construed together, we have an express direction to the General Assembly to levy on every male inhabitant between certain ages a capitation tax, with the limit fixed at the amount of tax levied on property valued at $300, with the further limit that such capitation tax shall not exceed $2, followed by the provision that the proceeds of the capitation shall be applied, etc. These two sections express the purpose to require a capitation tax; to fix its limits; to establish an equation between such tax and the property tax; the application of such capitation tax. Section 3 prescribes a rule of uniformity. Section 4 deals with the state indebtedness, etc. Section 5 prescribes what property shall be exempt from taxation. Section 6 provides for the levy of county taxes. The very important command to the Legislature concludes the article with section 7—that "every act of the General Assembly," etc. Article 9, § 2, imposes the duty upon the Legislature to provide, by taxation and otherwise, for a general and uniform system of public schools, etc. Article 11 imposes the duty upon the General Assembly of providing for the poor, etc.

Adopting the construction placed upon the Constitution by this court in Jones v. Com'rs, supra, we are constrained to hold that the act under which the tax to work the roads of Macon county was authorized necessarily provided for the capitation tax, and that its collection is lawful. We are of the opinion that, in order to give full force and effect to section 7, the entire tax must be applied to the purpose for which it was levied and collected. We think that it would be doing violence to this section to say that it applied only to taxes levied on property. It would be a singular result if every tax levied by a county, by permission of the General Assembly to build a courthouse, bridge, or improve the roads, should carry with it a poll tax for an entirely different purpose. General taxes are levied for the support of the schools, the rate of which is fixed with reference to the amount to be received from polls, in accordance with section 1, art. 5. It is to be presumed that this tax, with the added amount from polls, is deemed by the General Assembly sufficient to meet the needs of the public schools. A tax is likewise levied in each county for the support of the poor, and the commissioners may, if they think proper, appropriate so much as one-fourth of the poll tax to that purpose. The provisions of section 2 of article 5 are fully met and complied with by confining its application to the capitation tax levied for the ordinary expenses of the state and county. The question, it must be conceded, is not free from difficulty. In Long v. Com'rs, 76 N. C. 273, Rodman, J., uses language which the plaintiff insists indicates an opinion different from that which we have expressed. It does not appear whether the tax levied for repairing the courthouse was by permission of the General Assembly. It does appear, however, that the entire levy did not exceed the constitutional limit. The question is not clearly presented. In Board of Education v. Com'rs, 113 N. C. 385, 18 S. E. 663, Avery, J., says: "The language of the Constitution is plain and peremptory, and forbids the application of the fund arising from the tax on polls to any purposes other than to education and the support of the poor, or of any greater proportion for the maintenance of the poor than that prescribed in the instrument, until the levy reaches the limit of two dollars." The only question decided in that case was that the Legislature was authorized to levy a tax for the payment of pensions under the power granted in article 11, § 7, and that it could appropriate so much of the poll tax to that purpose, under the provisions of article 2, § 5, as did not exceed one-fourth of the whole. The state, by general taxation and by special appropriation, provides for the maintenance of public schools. The Constitution appropriates the net proceeds of all fines, forfeitures, and penalties, and the proceeds of the sale of all public lands, etc. To adopt the construction of article 5, § 7, contended for by the plaintiff, we would be compelled to write into the section the words "on property," so that it would read, "Every act," etc., "levying a tax on property." This the court should never do. We must construe, and not make, the Constitution. To weaken the very essential safeguard against the abuse of the taxing power found in section 7, art. 5, would expose the property of the citizen to dangers which experience has shown to lurk in every form of government, because of the fact that "the power to tax involves the power to destroy." We should be slow to adopt a construction which would carry the capitation tax which must accompany every special tax for necessary purposes into a channel different from that "stated," setting at naught the peremptory command, "It shall not be applied to any other purpose." To do so would seriously embarrass the counties in meeting the ever-increasing demands of a progressive people for better roads, bridges, and public buildings.

It is suggested that, until the limit of $2 is reached, the provision of section 2 controls, and carries the capitation tax into the school and poor fund. We think it best to decide only the question before us. It is conceded that the limit had been reached in Macon county for general purposes, and that the levy authorized by the special act is in excess of the limit.

The judgment of his honor sustaining the demurrer must be affirmed.

JONES v. AMERICAN WAREHOUSE CO.

INJURY TO EMPLOYEES—CAUSES OF INJURY—EXPERT EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—NEGLIGENCE—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

1. Where there was evidence that plaintiff's injury was sustained by his falling from a truck six inches high, as claimed by defendant, and also that it was the result of being caught in a belt a week later and thrown against a post in the wall, as claimed by plaintiff, it was proper to ask a physician his opinion, under all the circumstances surrounding both accidents, as to which he would attribute plaintiff's injury.

2. In an action for personal injuries, a physician was asked, "A person falling vertically, what is the result?" and he answered, "It might cause concussion of the spinal cord." Held that, while the form of the question may be open to criticism, the answer was harmless, as it was merely what common experience would suggest to any mind.

3. Where a master directed a servant to do certain work in a manner not reasonably safe, and the performance of the work in the manner directed was the proximate cause of injury to the servant, the master was guilty of actionable negligence.

4. Where plaintiff had worked at a machine for four weeks, and the danger of being injured if he was caught in the driving belt and pulley attached to it was open, obvious, and known to him, and after such knowledge he continued to work at such machine, he assumed the risk incident thereto.

Montgomery, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by R. A. Jones against the American Warehouse Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff alleges: That he was in the employment of the defendant company in its finishing mill, near the town of Spray, N. C. That he was directed by the defendant's superintendent to work at a machine known as a "napper." That there was attached to said machine a large pulley, run by belting connecting with the shafting overhead. On the inner or lower side of the machine was a smaller pulley, which drove a fan, or other part of the machinery, and is run by a smaller belt. This smaller pulley is not grooved, and the belt at times slips, and has to be replaced by the operator. Defendant's superintendent, who had control of the department where plaintiff worked, and directed and controlled plaintiff, told him not to stop the machine when the smaller belt slipped—that he could safely replace the belt without stopping the machine—and ordered him not to stop the machine, but to replace the belt, if it should slip, while the machine was in operation. That plaintiff was ignorant of the machinery, having only a few months' experience, as defendant well knew. That plaintiff, under the command and direction of the superintendent, whom he thought an experienced operator and well acquainted with the machinery and its operation, attempted to replace the slipped belt as directed, when he was caught by the larger belt and hurled against the wall of the building—his back striking a post or wooden beam—and injured. That to attempt to fix said belt while the machine was in motion was a dangerous and hazardous undertaking, well known to defendant, or ought to have been well known to it, and, notwithstanding this fact, the defendant's superintendent carelessly, negligently, and recklessly ordered plaintiff, who was ignorant of the danger, to attempt to adjust the slipped belt during the operation of said machine. That, by reason of being thrown against the post as aforesaid, he was seriously injured, etc. The defendant admitted the manner in which the machine was constructed and operated, the way the belt was adjusted, etc., but denied the allegation in all other respects. It also alleged that the "napper" was the newest and most approved pattern, standard in make, and equipped with all approved safety appliances and safeguards in general use, etc.; that necessarily the operation of such machine was attended with some risk, which is apparent upon an inspection of it, and this plaintiff well knew when he accepted the employment; that he operated two months without injury, etc.; that he assumed the risk incident to the employment. Defendant also alleged that, if plaintiff was injured, it was the result of his contributory negligence. The court submitted upon the merits three issues: (1) Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of defendant? (2) Did plaintiff by his own negligence contribute to his injury? (3) Was there an assumption of risk on the part of the plaintiff? An issue as to damage. The jury answered the first issue, "Yes," and the second and third, "No." From a judgment upon the verdict, defendant appealed.

R. D. Reid, R. W. Winston, Pou & Fuller, Watson, Buxton & Watson, and Lindsay Patterson, for appellant. Glenn, Manley & Hendren, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts). The record contains 63 exceptions, many of which are directed to the same question, and are properly taken to save the point. There was a motion at the close of the testimony to nonsuit, which was properly denied, thus disposing of exceptions 1, 2, 8, 9, and 10.

We will first discuss the exceptions to the admission and rejection of testimony. Exceptions from 12 to 16, inclusive, cannot be sustained. Exceptions 17 to 18 are directed to the ruling upon the following question to Dr. A. P. Davis: "Suppose the facts to be, and the jury so find, that he [plaintiff] on the 28th or 29th of June fell from a truck six inches high to a floor, upon his buttocks, or partially so; that he made no complaint about it to any one as having received any injuries from it; that on the morning of the 3d of July he was thrown by a belt, with his back striking a studding in the wall; suppose the jury should find that to be the fact; and he worked then for a night, perhaps two nights, complaining of pain—to which of these causes would you attribute the injury?" To understand the purpose of this question, it is proper to say that there was evidence that on the 28th of June plaintiff was thrown from a truck six inches high, and caught on his buttocks and his hands; that he did not feel any pain from this fall; that he was caught by the belt and thrown against the post on the latter part of the night of July 2d. He explained the manner in which he was injured, etc. There was evidence tending to show that plaintiff had said that he sustained the injury by falling from the truck, and evidence that he said that he sustained it by being caught in the belt. Several physicians who attended him were examined as to his condition and the cause of it, etc. It was also in evidence that Dr. Davis had attended plaintiff. The plaintiff was insisting and seeking to show to the jury that he was injured by being caught in the belt, while the defendant was insisting and seeking to show that the injury was the result of the fall from the truck. It thus became relevant to have the opinion of the physician.

Dr. Davis testified that he saw plaintiff on August 10th, and the condition in which he found him (paralyzed, almost completely, from his lower extremities, etc.), and that he was permanently paralyzed (his limbs very much emaciated); that he would never walk, etc.; that his nerves were almost destroyed. In answer to the question objected to, Dr. Davis said: "Granting that the suffering was only after the last injury, I would more than likely attribute it to the latter." He was then asked: "A person falling vertically, what is the result?" Answer: "It might cause concussion of the spinal cord." The record shows that defendant objected to the question, but not to the answer. This is necessary to present the question of its admissibility upon appeal, when it is not responsive to the question. Perry v. Jackson, 88 N. C. 103; Bost v. Bost, 87 N. C. 477. Passing this objection, however, we think that, while the form of the question may be open to criticism, the answer is so vague and indefinite that no possible harm could have been done to the defendant. The physician simply said what common experience would have suggested to any mind. It would seem quite self-evident, without the aid of expert testimony, that if a man has a fall which causes no suffering, as in this case, one would more likely attribute the suffering to the last fall. This might have been found by the jury as a matter of common experience and observation or as material evidence. The exception cannot be sustained.

Dr. Thomas was asked the same question, and answered: "I would say this second injury, because a common fall—sitting-down fall on that end on a smooth floor—is so frequent, with no bad results. Still, from a direct violence against the spine, this is almost sure to produce some serious results." In this instance the defendant excepts to the answer as well as to the question. We can see no valid objection to the answer. The witness simply tells the jury what every man of common sense and observation knows to be true. This witness, after an examination as to the formation of the vertebrae, spinal cord, etc., was asked a hypothetical question as to whether, in his opinion, the injury to the plaintiff is permanent. The defendant objects to the question, but not to the answer. We can see no valid objection to either. There was a great deal of testimony introduced by both parties of this character. We think that the exceptions to it are without merit. It was very important to enable the jury to come to a satisfactory conclusion in regard to the cause of the condition in which the plaintiff was conceded to be. The physicians were intelligent and, so far as we can see, there was no marked difference in their opinions. All of the testimony showed that the plaintiff is seriously and permanently injured. We have examined the other exceptions to the admission and rejection of testimony, and find no error.

His honor instructed the jury upon each issue. Among other instructions, he gave the following:

"Negligence is a want of ordinary care—a failure to exercise that care which a man of ordinary prudence would have exercised under the circumstances. It is a failure to perform some duty imposed by the law. The law imposes upon the master the duty of using ordinary care to provide for the servant reasonably sound and safe appliances and machinery, and a reasonably safe place and methods to do his work; and on entering into employment the servant has the right to assume that these duties have been performed, and may, without blame, act upon this assumption until some defect becomes so apparent that it may be discovered by the exercise of ordinary care. The master is not required to furnish the best machinery and appliances, nor is he required to provide the safest place or methods, but such as are reasonably safe. The law also requires the servant to exercise ordinary care for his own safety. It is also a part of the contract of employment that the servant assumes the ordinary risk of his employment, and also the risk incident to dangerous work or dangerous methods of work, if they are obvious.

"If you find from the evidence, and by the greater weight of the evidence that the defendant directed the plaintiff to put the belt on the smaller pulley by placing his hands through the larger belt while in motion, and that this was not a reasonably safe way to do what he was required to do, and that while so doing he was injured, and that the unsafe way, as stated above, in which he was doing the work according to directions, was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, then it will be your duty to answer the first issue, 'Yes.'

"If the plaintiff has failed to satisfy you that the method adopted was not a reasonably safe method, the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.'

"If the plaintiff has satisfied you that the method adopted was not a reasonably safe method, and he has failed to satisfy you that this was the real cause of his injury, the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.'

"If the injury to the plaintiff was the result of an accident, the jury should answer the first issue, 'No.'

"If, upon a careful consideration of the evidence, you cannot find how the fact is from the evidence, the jury should find the first issue, 'No,' for the reason that the burden upon that issue is upon the plaintiff.

"While the law imposes a duty upon the master, it also imposes a duty upon the servant. It requires him to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, to use his intelligence and his senses, and it holds him responsible if he is injured by his failure to exercise such care. It requires him to observe the machinery at which he is working, and the appliances used, and to discover those dangers which a man of ordinary prudence would discover; and, if he fails to perform his duty, and is injured thereby, he cannot recover damages.

"If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff had worked at this napper machine for four weeks, and that the danger of being injured if he was caught in the driving belt and pulley attached to it was open and obvious and known to him, and that after such knowledge he continued to work at said machine, you will answer the third issue, 'Yes.'

"If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff knew of the danger of attempting to replace the belt on the pulley while the machine was in operation, and appreciated the danger, and continued to work at said machine, and attempted to replace the belt when it slipped off the pulley, then the plaintiff assumed the risk, and you would answer the third issue, 'Yes.'

"Assumption of risk does not mean that, in all cases where the defendant has knowledge of the defects of dangerous machinery and goes on with the work that he assumes the risk; but the law is that, where the defendant fails to perform its duty and furnish the plaintiff with safe and suitable methods of doing the work, the plaintiff will not be held to assume the risk in undertaking to perform a dangerous work, unless the act itself is obviously so dangerous that in its careful performance the inherent probability of the injury is greater than those of safety, or unless it is a danger ordinarily incident to the employment, or unless obvious, or one which the servant may discover by the exercise of ordinary care."

The court charged the jury fully upon the question of damages.

We have examined the charge and exception thereto with care, and find no error in the charge. The questions were largely for the jury, under the application of general and well-recognized principles of law. The charge is clear and full. The damages awarded are large, but that was a matter for the jury. The plaintiff is a physical wreck.

While we do not undertake to do more than suggest, from the cases which have been before us in which injuries have been sustained by operatives in cleaning or otherwise putting their hands into dangerous places while the machine is in motion, it would seem that economy, as well as a regard for the safety of operatives, would suggest that rules be made prohibiting, instead of commanding, such action by them. The courts recognize that persons working in mills and other employments where powerful and dangerous machinery is used assume certain risks, but it is the duty of superintendents and others having charge of the employes to use every reasonable precaution to protect them from injury.

The judgment must be affirmed.

WALKER, J., concurs in result.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). This action was brought to recover damages from the defendant because of personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff on account of the negligence of the defendant. The defendant denies that it was negligent, and avers that the plaintiff was injured by his own negligence, and that he assumed the risk of any injury which he suffered. The plaintiff, in his complaint, alleges that the defendant was negligent in two respects: First, that it furnished the plaintiff, carelessly and knowingly, a dangerous and unsafe machine with which to do his work; and, second, that it directed him to use the dangerous and unsafe machine in a manner which was not reasonably safe—the plaintiff being alleged to be an unskilled workman and ignorant of the nature of the machine—and that by reason thereof he was injured in the operation of the machinery. After the evidence was all in, the court said that the defendant need not offer evidence for the purpose of showing that the machine at which the plaintiff was hurt was a standard machine, as there was no evidence to the contrary. That was true, and he might have gone further, and said that the machine, by all the evidence, was without fault. In his charge, also, the judge eliminated from the case the allegation that the defendant had furnished an unsafe and dangerous machine for the plaintiff to do his work with, and told the jury that the negligence of the defendant depended upon the question whether the defendant adopted and required the plaintiff to use a method which was not reasonably safe. Nevertheless he afterwards instructed the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to provide for its operatives not only safe machinery, but reasonably safe methods. That was an erroneous instruction, even if it be conceded that the defendant was to furnish safe machinery, for there had been a great amount of evidence on the character and construction of the machine, offered by plaintiff in trying to prove an unsafe method of operating it; and, under the first branch of that instruction, the jury might have arrived at the conclusion that the machine itself was unsafe and dangerous, when that question had been eliminated by the judge, as a matter of law, upon the evidence from the trial of the case. Instead of giving that instruction, I think he should have said to the jury that all the evidence in the case went to show that the machine was a standard one, and, in that connection, that the only question for them to consider was whether or not the superintendent had compelled and directed the plaintiff to use the machinery in an unsafe and dangerous method.

The evidence in this case in some respects is most remarkable. The plaintiff himself testified that he was injured on the night of July 2, 1901, by being thrown by a belt in motion, attached to the machinery, against a post in the wall, while engaged in adjusting a part of the machinery in the manner he was directed to do by the defendant's superintendent. Several physicians, two of whom performed a surgical operation on him, attended the plaintiff in his sickness, and they testified that they examined him about the cause of his trouble, and that he told them he was hurt by having been thrown by one of the employes of the defendant, in a frolic, from a truck about six inches high, used in the warehouse of the defendant, and that he never mentioned to them that he had received any injury through the means of the defendant's machinery. He admitted himself that for months he had not told the managers of the defendant's warehouse that he had been injured by the machinery, and that it was 18 months after the alleged injury before this suit was brought. He also told his foster father—a man by the name of C. E. Jones—that he was hurt by being thrown from the truck by one of the defendant's employes, and he did not mention that he had been hurt by the machinery until some time after he had stated he had been hurt by being thrown from the truck. There was evidence offered and received tending to show that the plaintiff, while standing on a truck in the defendant's warehouse, was suddenly thrown to the floor, catching partly on his hands in a sitting position, by the truck having been kicked from under him by an employé of the defendant. Upon the evidence, the plaintiff's counsel asked Dr. Davis, an expert witness, this question: "Suppose the jury should find that he was injured on the 28th or 29th of June; that he fell from a truck 6 inches high to a floor upon his buttocks, or partially so; that he made no complaint about it to any one as having received any injuries from it; that on the morning of the 3d of July he was thrown by a belt, with his back striking a studding in the wall; suppose the jury should find that to be the fact; and he worked then for a night, perhaps two nights, complaining of pain—to which of these causes would you attribute the injury?" The question was allowed over the objection of the defendant. The objection was well taken, and the question ought not to have been allowed. It was incompetent. It is not necessary to go at length into a discussion of the question whether the evidence justified the recital in the question as to whether the plaintiff fell from the truck to the floor of the warehouse upon his buttocks. The evidence was that he fell from the truck to the floor, and caught upon his hands in a sitting position. The difference in statement as to how he fell may not be serious enough to amount to a reversible error; but there are faults in the question, both as to its substance and form, which make it under our decisions wholly incompetent. In the first place, there is no recital in the question of any evidence going to show the nature of the injury, the extent of it, or the condition of the plaintiff either before or at the trial; and, second, there is assumed in the question the conclusion that whatever injuries the plaintiff might have sustained (if they had been stated in the question) were caused by his falling from the truck, or by being thrown by the belt against the wall. That was the very question to be decided by the jury, and expert testimony on the part of the witness could only be admitted on the ground that his scientific knowledge could aid the jury in arriving at a conclusion. The condition of the plaintiff and the nature of his injuries, as brought out in the evidence, were not repeated to the witness, and his opinion asked thereon (in case the jury should find the evidence to be true) as to whether the fall from the truck, or being thrown by the belt against the wall, could or might have caused the injury to the plaintiff. It assumed that one or the other did cause the injury. It might have been that, if the question had been properly asked, the witness might have answered that, the facts being believed by the jury, in his opinion the plaintiff's injuries were or could have been caused by his having been thrown by the belt against the wall, or also that, in his opinion, the fall from the truck might have produced the same result. And he might have said, further, that, in his opinion, the injuries were more likely to have been produced by the one or the other, as his judgment and scientific skill might dictate. The question should have been stated in a hypothetical form, and not upon any assumption that the plaintiff's injuries had been received in either of the ways mentioned in question. I think there should be a new trial.

HOLLAND v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO.

MASTER AND SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—INJURIES —LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

1. A brakeman, whose duty it was, when his train went onto a siding, to lock a switch and to remain within 10 feet of it, after his train went onto a siding retired to the caboose; and another train ran into the switch, which was open, whereby he was killed. In an action for the death, it appeared that the engineer of the approaching train, running at a speed of 40 miles per hour, could not have seen the standing train until within 70 or 80 yards of it, owing to a curve at that point. Held, that the doctrine of "last clear chance" was not applicable as against the railroad.

Clark, C. J., and Douglas, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Moore County; Bryan, Judge.

Action by M. H. Holland, administrator, against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. D. Shaw, U. L. Spence, and Murchison & Johnson, for appellant. W. J. Adams and Seawell & McIver, for appellee.

MONTGOMERY, J. The plaintiff's intestate, employed by the defendant as rear brakeman and flagman on its extra freight train No. 578, going south, was on duty when, on the morning of October 18, 1902, the train passed into the siding over the switch at Rockingham, there to await the passage of other trains of the defendant. He was acquainted with the rules of the company, one of which (rule J) reads as follows: "When a train takes the side track to be met or passed by another train, the conductor or flagman must remain at the switch used by his train to enter the siding, and when the train is clear of the main line and the switch is properly set, he will take a position not less than 10 feet from the switch and give the 'go ahead' signal to the approaching train, and must remain not less than 10 feet from the switch until the approaching train has entirely passed the switch. No train will pass the switch which has been used by the train in taking the siding, unless the 'all right' signal is given." The signal used after dark must be white. When the train was well on the siding, the conductor went to the railroad office on business, and remained there until the collision hereafter to be described occurred; and the intestate went back to the switch, and, according to the evidence of the conductor, changed it and locked it to the main line. The intestate also had been ordered by the conductor when they left Raleigh that morning to "always, when he headed in a switch, to change it and lock it to the main line, and, in my absence, to look out for the safety of the train." The intestate left the switch, returned to the caboose, at the northern end of his train, entered it, and never returned to the switch. While train No. 578 (intestate's) was on the siding, two trains of the defendant (33 and 40), coming from the south and going north, passed along the main line in safety. Afterwards, probably 20 or 30 minutes, train No. 33, a fast passenger train, with engine and several heavy coaches, coming from the north and going to the south, with the right of way, and at a speed of 40 miles an hour, ran into the switch which the intestate ought to have closed and guarded, under the rules of the company and the instructions of the conductor, and collided with the caboose on train 578, and killed H. L. Holland, the plaintiff's intestate.

On the question of negligence the usual three issues were submitted to the jury, which, with their responses, are as follows: "(1) Was the death of Holland caused by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint? Yes. (2) Did Holland by his own negligence contribute to his death? No. (3) Notwithstanding the contributory negligence of Holland, could the defendant, by the exercise of ordinary care, have prevented his death? Yes."

At the request of the plaintiff, his honor instructed the jury as follows: "If the jury should find from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate was an employé upon the defendant's train, and was killed in the collision of the defendant's trains in the daytime, there is a presumption of negligence upon the part of the defendant, and in that case the burden is thrown upon the defendant to disprove negligence on its part." We think there was error in giving that instruction. So far as passengers are concerned, injuries suffered by them from contact with anything under the control and direction of the carrier, or which the carrier ought to have taken precautions against, or from the want or absence of anything which the carrier ought to have furnished, is sufficient to put him to his proof to show that he was not negligent; and therefore, upon that principle, a prima facie case of negligence is made out against a carrier upon the mere fact of a collision between trains. 2 Shear.

& Red. § 516. In such a case the maxim res ipsa loquitur applies. The affair speaks for itself. And it must be that the same rule applies as to employés of a carrier. In such case neither the passenger nor the employé has anything to do with the management or control or with the schedule of the trains. But in the case before us it cannot be said that the maxim res ipsa loquitur applies. One of the trains was on a side track, and had been there for some little time. Who was at fault because of the collision—whether the defendant, through its engineer of train 33, or the intestate whose duty it was to guard the switch against train 33—was a matter not explained by the collision itself, but dependent entirely upon the circumstances attendant upon the collision, to be shown by the evidence. And there was evidence, outside of the rules under which he was doing service, going to show that the intestate was negligent. It would be a strange rule of law, if, under such conditions, a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier, the defendant, should arise upon proof of the collision.

There was another error in the failure of his honor to give to the jury a special instruction, asked by the defendant, in the following words: "If you answer the first issue 'No,' you need not answer the other issues. That, if you answer the first issue 'Yes,' then, under all the evidence, you will answer the second issue 'Yes,' and the third issue 'No.'" There was exception made by the defendant for the failure to give each of these instructions. We think each of them should have been given. Rule J of the company, which we have quoted in full, and of which the intestate had full notice, required him not only when his train went in on the siding to change the switch, but it also required him to take his position at the switch, and remain not less than 10 feet from it until the approaching train had entirely passed the switch. The whole of the evidence tended to show that he left the switch, and went into the caboose, and was killed in it; having never returned to the switch. There is no dispute about the truth of that evidence, and but one conclusion can be drawn from it, in reason. Hinshaw v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1047, 24 S. E. 428; Neal v. Railroad, 112 N. C. 841, 17 S. E. 538. He neglected a duty to stand by and guard that switch, and the court should have instructed the jury to answer the second issue "Yes." It was a question of law, upon all the evidence. The jury answered the second issue "No," notwithstanding all the evidence tended to show that he did, and it is probable that the jury answered that issue as they did because of an erroneous instruction from the judge on that point. The following is that instruction: "If the jury find from the evidence, under the rules of the company, that Holland, the intestate, was required to throw the switch to the main line, lock it, remain at or near it, and failed to do so, and that by reason of such failure he was killed, and that such failure was the proximate [italics ours] cause of death, then he is guilty of contributory negligence, and the jury should answer the second issue "Yes." In actions for negligence, where the three issues are submitted, the matter of proximate cause cannot be considered by the jury on the second issue. Dunn v. Railroad, 126 N. C. 343, 35 S. E. 606.

We think, too, the jury should have been instructed to answer the third issue "No." There was evidence tending to show that, because of a sharp curve in the railroad track just before reaching the switch from the direction of Hamlet, the engineer of train 83 was prevented from seeing the switch signal at a greater distance than 70 or 80 yards—a distance too short in which to stop his train if he had discovered the danger signal at the switch; and the plaintiff contends that that faulty construction of the track, taken in connection with the location of the switch, was a continuing negligence on the part of the defendant, and that, even though the plaintiff might have been negligent in leaving the switch, yet the defendant, because of its continuing negligence, had the "last clear chance" to prevent the injury. We are not of that opinion. We think that the proximate cause of the injury was the failure to stand by and guard that switch; to stand there and see that it was locked to the main line; to see that it was kept locked to the main line until the very moment the engine of train 83 reached it; to stand there and see that no other person interfered with it. If he had stood there and discharged his duty, as the rules of the company and the instructions of the conductor required him to do, he could have prevented the accident, even though the engineer had failed to observe, or could not have observed because of a defect in the construction of the track, the signal at the switch in time to have stopped his train before reaching it.

New trial.

CONNOR, J. (concurring). His honor instructed the jury on the first issue that if they found that No. 83 was a first-class train, and No. 578 was an extra freight train, under the rules No. 83 had the right of way, and it was not the duty of the engineer to protect his train against the extra at Rockingham; that, under the rules of the company, the engineer had a right to presume that he could pass the switch at the siding where No. 578 was standing unless he was signaled not to do so; that if he did not know when he left Hamlet that No. 578 was on the siding, a quarter of a mile east of Rockingham, then he had a right to presume that his track was clear, and he would not be required to stop or slow up for the siding; that, if they believed the evidence, the engineer of No. 83 did not know that No. 578 was on the siding; that if the jury find from the evidence that it was the duty of the flagman, Holland, after his train, extra 578, had entered the siding at Rockingham, if they find that he had so entered, to remain at said switch, and to signal the engineer of No. 83 to come ahead if it was all right, or to stop if it was wrong, and that said Holland was not at said switch as No. 83 approached, then the engineer on No. 83 had the right to presume that the train on the siding had not used the siding switch, and that the same was set to the main track. The defendant asked his honor to instruct the jury that if they found that Holland, the intestate of the plaintiff, was required by the rules of the company to be at or near said switch north of Rockingham, about 400 yards from the station, when No. 83 passed, and he was not there, and they further "find that his failure to be there caused the said train to enter said switch, then you will answer the first issue 'No.'" His honor gave the instruction, adding the words, "provided you further find that the defendant used ordinary care." Defendant excepted. Defendant instructed his honor to instruct the jury "that if they find from the evidence, under the rules of the company, that Holland, the intestate, was required to signal train No. 83 as it approached the switch leading to the siding upon which extra 578 was, and that the switch was set to the siding, and that he failed to do so, and that his failure contributed to, and was the proximate cause of, his death, then you will answer the first issue 'No.'" His honor gave the instruction, adding the words, "If you find that defendant used ordinary care." Defendant excepted.

I am of the opinion that these two last instructions were complete and correct propositions of law, and that the words, "If the defendant used ordinary care," should not have been added. His honor had explained to the jury the defendant's measure of duty. Certainly, if the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of negligence, and such negligence was the proximate cause of his death, the first issue, "Was the death of Holland caused by the negligence of defendant, as alleged in the complaint?" could not have been answered in the affirmative, even if the defendant had not used ordinary care. It is not the failure to use ordinary care which gives a right of action, but it is such failure resulting in—that is, being the proximate cause of—the injury. Norton v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 910, 29 S. E. 886, and many other cases. The jury might well have concluded that, notwithstanding the finding that the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of his death, yet, if the defendant failed to use ordinary care, they should answer the issue in the affirmative. Of course, his honor did not intend to so instruct them, but I think his language capable of that construction. Again, the jury were left without any instruction as to what was meant by "ordinary care," as applied to the facts of this case as they might find them to be. If, as his honor had just told the jury, the engineer had a right to presume that the switch was set to the main track, and was under no obligation to slow down, I cannot see any evidence of want of ordinary care on his part. It is said that there was negligence in the construction of the road approaching the switch. In respect to this question there is not sufficient evidence in the case to enable me to form any opinion. I could not say, as a matter of law, that there was a want of ordinary care in the construction of the road. By the plaintiff's own evidence, the switch was in good condition and working order. Some one must have changed it after No. 38 and No. 45 passed. There is some evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's intestate did so. The witness Crump says that he saw the plaintiff's intestate, after No. 38 and No. 45 passed, about halfway between the caboose and the switch, when he said: "We will back out and go down on the main line, where Mr. Simpson is. I reckon we can get ahead of No. 33." The testimony of the witness is not very clear. In fact, there is an embarrassing want of clearness in all of the testimony. This was, however, for the jury.

I can see no reason for submitting the third issue in this case. There is to my mind no element of the "last clear chance" presented. The decision of the first issue practically settled the case.

In another trial there may be evidence in regard to the construction of the road and placing the switch, and the reasons for making the curve so near to the switch.

I concur in the opinion that there should be a new trial.

WALKER, J. (concurring). I concur in the result and in the opinion of Mr. Justice CONNOR. All things considered, the question, at last, is, was the situation a safe one if the intestate had kept the position assigned to him by the defendant, at or near the switch, so that he could prevent any interference with it and guard against any resulting danger? If so, his failure so to act was the proximate cause of his death, as it was the sole efficient cause. The company had provided a perfectly safe method for the management of its trains at that point, which, if adopted, would have saved the life of the intestate. As he alone disregarded it, and the engineer on No. 33 was not required to anticipate this negligence, his untimely death is referred by the law to his own fault in leaving his post of duty at a critical moment. If he did not leave the switch open, but it was changed by some one else after he left his place, or even by any accident, it could have been readjusted to the main track by him, if he had been there, and No. 33 would have passed, and not have taken the siding.

It is suggested that rule J was introduced by the plaintiff, and on objection by the defendant was withdrawn, and that this rule prescribed the duty of Holland in respect to the switch. Let this be granted, and there is still evidence in the case on the part of the plaintiff which shows that it was his duty to remain at the switch until No. 33 passed. Plaintiff's witness, Conductor Simpson, testified that he instructed Holland that morning to change the switch and lock it to the main line when he headed in, and in his absence to look out for the safety of the train. There was but one possible thing to do after locking the switch to the main line, in order to further protect his train, which was on the siding, and that was to watch the switch, and see that it was not changed by any one else so as to endanger his train. The conductor further stated that he instructed him to look after the switches in his absence. If he had done this, the accident would not have occurred. There was only one inference to be drawn from the evidence, and that was against the plaintiff.

DOUGLAS, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the opinion of the court in any aspect—either in its construction of the law or its understanding of the facts. The plaintiff, who knew nothing of the accident, introduced only two witnesses besides himself—Thompson and Simpson—both at the time of the accident being in the employ of the defendant, and now running as conductors on other roads. All the other witnesses were introduced by the defendant. The book of rules was produced by the defendant, and identified by defendant's witnesses alone. The record states that the "plaintiff offers in evidence the special rules printed on the time-table, numbered Q and J. Upon objection by defendant, rule Q was ruled out by the court, and plaintiff excepted." The record also states that "Plaintiff introduced in evidence Rules 47-I, 47-J and 47-K from the book of rules of defendant. Defendant objected to the introduction of these rules, as not being applicable to the train in question. Plaintiff withdrew 47-J and 47-K. Rule 47-I was admitted, and read in evidence, as follows: 'I. They are required to observe the position of all switches, and know that such switches are right before passing over them.'" It does not directly state whether rule J was admitted, but, in any event, there is no evidence whatsoever that the intestate had ever been given a copy of the time-table containing the rule, or, indeed, had ever seen or heard of it. The opinion says that the intestate had full notice of rule J. I find no evidence of that fact. If the opinion means that rule J was in the book of rules for which the defendant introduced the intestate's receipt, I can only say that I find no evidence of that fact. If it means that rule J in the time-table is the same as rule 47-J in the book introduced by the plaintiff, I see no proof of that; but, if there were, it was withdrawn upon the objection of the defendant, who contended that these rules were not applicable to the train in question. If these rules are not applicable to the train in question, they should not be ground for a new trial. There is no evidence that the intestate actually knew he was required to remain at the switch. The mere receipt of the book of rules by the intestate certainly does not tend to prove his knowledge of a rule that is not shown to have been in the book.

Simpson, the conductor of intestate's train, testified as follows: "When I went to the office, Holland was coming from the switch towards the caboose. I saw him change the switch and lock it to the main line. After my train went in, I saw him do that. * * * Q. Did you leave anybody especially in charge of it, except as regulated by the rules? A. No more than the instructions I gave to the man when I left Raleigh that morning—always when he headed in a switch to change it and lock it to the main line, and in my absence to look out for the safety of the train. * * * Q. How far was Holland from the switch when you last saw him? A. I guess he was 70 or 80 feet, coming towards the caboose. He was about where the frog would be—70 or 80 feet from the switch tank, coming towards the caboose. * * * I did not give him any instructions as to this certain switch, because I did not know that we were going to use that switch. My instructions were to look after the switches in my absence. * * * Q. You say you saw Mr. Holland go around there and throw the switch back to the main line? A. He got off the caboose at the switch, and threw it to the main line and locked it. Q. That was done in your presence? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that was the last time you saw Holland at the switch? A. Yes, sir. Q. When you saw him, he was going back to the caboose? A. Yes, sir." This evidence shows that the intestate was not told to remain at the switch, but was told to lock it to the main line; that he did so in the presence of his conductor, and came to the caboose with the assent of his superior officer, or at least in his presence and without any objection on his part; that no one saw him go near the switch again; and that two trains thereafter passed the switch in safety. The instruction of his conductor to "look after the safety of the train," if construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, as should be done on a motion for an adverse direction of the verdict, might mean that the intestate must go back and look after the train. We must remember that the intestate is dead—killed by the act of the defendant—and is not here to tell his story. Many a dead man is made to bear a living sin.

The opinion of the court says that it was error to give the following instruction: "If the jury should find from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate was an employé upon the defendant's train, and was killed in the collision of the defendant's trains in the daytime, there is a presumption of negligence upon the part of the defendant; and in that case the burden is thrown upon the defendant to disprove negligence on its part." The court seems to admit that it is correct as a general principle of law, applicable equally to employes as to passengers, but that it is not applicable to this case, on account of some assumed state of facts contrary to the verdict of the jury. I cannot concur in any such opinion. The opinion says that the following instruction should have been given: "If you answer the first issue 'No,' you need not answer the other issues. That if you answer the first issue 'Yes,' then, under all the evidence, you will answer the second issue 'Yes,' and the third issue 'No.'" The court again says that "the intestate had full notice of rule J," and bases its opinion upon such assumption of notice. I would be very glad to have evidence of this fact pointed out to me, as I have not been able to find it. It is not shown to be in the book of rules receipted for by the intestate, and I find no evidence whatever offered either by the plaintiff or the defendant that the time-table was ever issued to the intestate, or even ever seen by him. Moreover, the above instruction included the evidence of the defendant, the credibility of which can never be assumed in directing a verdict against the plaintiff. This goes far beyond Neal's Case. I am aware that this was held in Dunn v. Railroad, 128 N. C. 343, 35 S. E. 606, but I am not aware of any other case to the same effect. The contrary doctrine that no negligence can be considered that is not directly or concurrently the proximate cause of the accident, has been since fully recognized. In the recent unanimous opinion of Butts v. Railroad, 133 N. C. 82, 45 S. E. 472, this court held that "an instruction which makes the liability of the defendant depend on its negligence, without regard to whether such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, is erroneous." Edwards v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 79, 39 S. E. 730; Curtis v. Railroad, 130 N. C. 437, 41 S. E. 929. It will scarcely be contended that any difference in proof, either as to nature or amount, can be required to establish the negligence of the defendant, than that of the plaintiff. Both are entitled to the benefit of the same principles of evidence and the equal enforcement of the law.

The doctrine of the last clear chance would seem to apply to the action of the engineer on the incoming train, as he violated the rules of the company in passing the switch without receiving the "all-right signal," as required by rule J, and without "knowing that such switches are right before passing over them," as required by rule 47-I. Moreover, it would seem to be an act of continuing negligence on the part of the defendant to construct a side track and switch at the end of a curve, where they could not be seen in time to stop. In the equal administration of the law, it would seem that rules binding upon the intestate would be equally binding upon the defendant and its other agents.

STAFFORD v. BOARD OF CANVASSERS OF MINGO COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 20, 1904.)

ELECTIONS—CUSTODY OF BALLOTS—KEYS OF BOXES.

1. When the clerk of a county court has laid before the board of canvassers of the county, for the purposes of a recount, the ballots, poll-books, and other returns of the election, and, without just cause, has refused to receive back into his custody the ballots and care for them during the recesses of the board, while engaged in the recount, such board may lawfully commit the care and custody of the ballots to the sheriff of the county.

2. Retention of one or both of the keys to the ballot boxes, although the ballots are in the boxes, by the board of canvassers or a member thereof, does not justify the refusal of the clerk to preserve and be responsible for the ballots.

3. When all the ballots cast at all the precincts in an election held in the county have been kept in proper custody, and the packages of ballots voted at one of the precincts nevertheless bear evidence of having been tampered with, that fact does not vitiate the ballots cast at the other precincts.

Petition of John L. Stafford for a writ of mandamus to the board of canvassers of Mingo county. Writ denied.

John H. Holt, Geo. J. McComas, and S. D. Stokes, for petitioner. Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, John A. Sheppard, Wells Goodykoontz, and S. U. G. Rhódes, for respondents.

POFFENBARGER, P. John L. Stafford, who was a candidate on the Democratic ticket for the office of prosecuting attorney of Mingo county, at the election held in that county in November last, asks for a writ of mandamus to compel the board of canvassers of that county to reject all the ballots cast at said election in said county, and declare the result of the election between himself and his competitor, John A. Sheppard, the candidate for the same office on the Republican ticket, from the returns as certified by the precinct election officers, on the ground that all of said ballots are discredited and vitiated as evidence because of their having been in improper and illegal custody for several days, while the recount in said election was pending. Simultaneously with this application, like petitions, based on the same ground, were filed by the Democratic candidates for sheriff, house of delegates, assessor, commissioner of the county court for short term, and commissioner of the county court for full term.

The facts are as follows: After the board of canvassers had canvassed the returns of the election of the county and declared the result as ascertained by them from the face of the returns, the Republican candidates demanded a recount as to nine precincts specified by them. After having gone through the nine precincts and counted all of the undisputed ballots, without entering the result upon the record, but having their tellers make memoranda of the results of such counting, and laid aside for future action all the disputed ballots, the board of canvassers was asked by the Republican candidates to recount all the other precincts of the county. Thereupon the clerk of the court, in whose custody the ballots and other returns were, was required to produce them to the court. Though not required by law to be kept in the ballot boxes, the ballots of each precinct were in the ballot box used thereat, and locked up therein, each box having two locks and a separate key for each. Upon taking a recess, for some purpose, the board retained one of the keys to each of the ballot boxes, and directed the clerk to take charge of the ballots and boxes and keep them in his custody until the reassembling of the board, and during other recesses while the recount was pending. Because of the retention of the keys by the board, he declined to accept and take care of the ballots. Thereupon the board directed the sheriff of the county to guard and take care of the ballots and ballot boxes in the courtroom. There is some conflict between the petition and the return as to the circumstances which led up to this final action on the part of the board, but there is no substantial difference as to the ground upon which the clerk attempts to justify his act, nor as to the ground upon which the board relies for justification, in requiring the sheriff to guard the ballots. The petition alleges the retention of the keys, but the return denies it. All the ballots cast at all the precincts in the county remained in the courtroom, guarded by the sheriff, except as hereinafter stated, from the 18th day of November until the 25th day of November. At such times as the sheriff was compelled to absent himself for meals or other necessary purposes, he left another man of his selection in charge of the ballots. At times, while the ballots were so in the courtroom under the care of the sheriff, persons having business with the sheriff went in there and transacted the same with him, just as people would have gone into the clerk's office and transacted business with the clerk; and the sheriff and his assistant both swear that nobody was permitted to examine, or in any way interfere with, the ballots or ballot boxes while they so remained in his custody.

The sole question upon which this application turns is whether, under the circumstances, these ballots were vitiated by reason of their custody by the sheriff. It is unnecessary to enter upon a discussion of the extent of the power of the board of canvassers in respect to the custody of the ballots after they have been laid before them by the clerk. It is enough to say that, when the clerk of the county court refuses to take charge of the ballots and keep them during the recesses of the board, without just cause for such refusal, the law of necessity justifies the board in adopting some other means for the care and preservation of the ballots. The only matter relied upon by the clerk as justification for his refusal to take back and keep the ballots is the alleged retention of the keys to the ballot boxes. That is not sufficient. The law does not require him to keep them in the ballot boxes, nor under lock in any particular kind of a box or drawer, but only in his office. For protection against tampering, the law relies upon the seal on the bags containing the ballots. For anything the law says to the contrary, the clerk may keep these sealed packages on shelves or in open drawers or boxes in his office. They had been, for convenience, placed in the ballot boxes and locked up. Upon taking them back into his custody from the board, as was his legal right and duty, he would have been justified in breaking open the boxes and taking the packages out of them and locking them up in other receptacles, if he deemed it necessary to do so for their preservation. Suppose some one should steal the keys to the boxes from the clerk when he has placed the ballots in them for safe-keeping; would he be justified in casting them into the street, or refusing to perform his duty respecting them in any other way?

The petition suggests that as, in the further progress of the recount, and after the ballots, ballot boxes, and keys had all been returned into the custody of the clerk, it was found that the packages of ballots of one of the precincts bore evidence of having been tampered with, there is conclusive evidence of exposure and tampering with the ballots, either while they were in the custody of the sheriff or in the custody of the clerk, and that in either view of the matter they must be discarded entirely, all of the ballots of all of the precincts, unless it is proper to overcome the presumption of viciousness by extrinsic evidence. There is no evidence that any of the ballots of any of the other precincts have been tampered with. If they are, condemned, it must be because of the inference arising from the fact that the packages of the one particular precinct disclose evidence of having been tampered with. We do not think this proposition tenable. Let us suppose that the ballots have been in indisputably proper custody all the time, nevertheless it appears that one precinct or package bears evidence of having been tampered with; shall we say that this fact alone condemns all others, though such others bear no evidence of having been tampered with, and no evidence is offered tending to show that they have been violated? We know of no authority that goes so far. The books say that ballots are not to be rejected merely because there was possible opportunity to tamper with them, but that it must appear that they were probably tampered with. Ellis v. Elkin, 180 Mo. 80, 80 S. W. 833, 81 S. W. 1037.

Two pleas in abatement, tendered by the respondents, set up the pendency of mandamus proceedings in a circuit court, instituted prior to these applications, for the purpose of compelling the board of canvassers to reject all ballots found by them, in the progress of the recount, on which each of the poll clerks had not subscribed his name as required by the statute. No return was made to the alternative writs in those cases, and the board, being satisfied that they could not make sufficient returns to them, went on and rejected all ballots of that class. It is manifest that these proceedings are not for the same purposes as the writs applied for here. They were to compel the rejection of ballots of a certain class, while these applications are for writs to compel the rejection of all the ballots cast at all the precincts in the county for reasons other than those upon which the circuit court writs are founded. "To sustain the plea of a former suit pending, it must appear that the subject-matter and the relief sought in the second suit are the same as in the first suit." 1 Cyc. 27.

For the reasons given, the writs sought in petition No. 1 are refused.

Litigants are entitled to submit their causes to a tribunal free from prejudice and bias and whose integrity is above suspicion. Not only this, but a judge is entitled to avoid unnecessary and embarrassing positions, in which his reputation for judicial fairness may be subject to unjust criticism. Political prejudice or bias, I am aware, is no objection to a judge, yet it has been the prolific source of injustice and wrong, and even cruelty, from time immemorial, and always will be until the people adopt some way of selecting their judicial officers independent of their party affiliations and free from party obligations. Judges of courts of final resort should enjoy the approbation of the whole people without regard to party lines, and under no circumstances should they be offensively partisan. Private citizenship is preferable to a judgeship hampered with the lack of public confidence in the ability, integrity, or legal acumen of the incumbent. As this is the last act of my judicial career, I bid my colleagues, lawyers, litigants, and the people a kindly farewell.

STATE, to Use of CALHOUN'S ADM'R, v.
WOTRING et al.*

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

JUDICIAL SALE—BOND OF COMMISSIONER—CONSTRUCTION.

1. In a decree for a sale of land on terms of part cash, part credit, the special commissioner is required before sale to give bond conditioned according to law. The bond is conditioned that he shall "faithfully discharge his duties as such commissioner, and account for and pay over, as required by law, all money which may come to his hands by virtue of said office." The bond binds the principal and sureties for all money received by the commissioner, whether from the cash or deferred payments.

2. A bond given under a statute must be construed, as to the scope of its obligation, to cover the objects of the statute in requiring it, if its words will at all allow such construction, and the statute is to be regarded a part of it.

Error to Circuit Court, Preston County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by the state, for the use of Calhoun's administrator, against D. M. Wotring and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

P. J. Orogan, for plaintiff in error. Neil J. Fortney, W. G. Worley, and R. W. Monroe, for defendants in error.

BRANNON, J. In a suit in Preston county, Wotring was appointed a special commissioner to sell lands to pay various debts, on the terms of one-third cash, and the balance in two payments, in one and two years; and the decree required him, before acting, to give a bond in the penalty of $2,000, conditioned according to law. He gave the bond, with Dawson and Fortney as securities. The bond recites such appointment as special commissioner, and says: "Now, if said Wotring shall faithfully discharge his duties as such commissioner, and account for and pay over, as required by law, all money which may come to his hands by virtue of the said office, then the above obligation to be void." Wotring sold the land for $3,080, receiving the cash payment, and took from the purchaser two notes for balance of purchase. Wotring was directed and authorized by the decree confirming the sale to collect the notes and pay their proceeds to the persons entitled under the former decree. He paid over the cash payment, and collected, but did not pay over the money collected for, the notes; and Calhoun, who was decreed a debt in the case, brought an action on said bond, in which the facts were agreed, and the court gave judgment for the defendants, and Calhoun brought the case here. The decree which required the bond was the first decree, and the subsequent decree provided for no other or further bond. It did not limit the bond to any particular part of the sale proceeds.

The sole question is whether the bond covers the money arising from the notes given for the deferred purchase money, or only the cash payment. It is contended that this bond was intended to cover only the cash payment, and was so understood by the sureties; that Wotring had no authority by law to collect the notes, and that the sureties are not bound for it; that the court ought to have required a second bond in the second decree; and that this omission cannot operate to charge the sureties. By no means can we agree to this contention. Section 1, c. 132, Code, edition of 1887—the law at the time—demands a bond before sale. It prohibits a commissioner from receiving any money before giving the bond, and, in words, prohibits him from making sale until a bond has been given. Neeley v. Ruleys, 26 W. Va. 686. Therefore we cannot say that the law contemplates two bonds in case of sale for part cash and part credit; but we can say that it requires a bond before sale, which ought to be provided for in the decree of sale, and the bond is designed to cover all and any money arising from the sale, whether from an entire cash payment, or part cash and part credit sale. It was decided that payment to a commissioner, who was required to give, but did not give, bond, was not good, and the purchaser must again pay the money, and hence the change in the law demanding a bond before sale. The design is to protect the purchaser, creditor, and debtor having any interests in the proceeds of sale—all the proceeds—and we find no warrant for limiting the protection intended by the statute to any particular part of the proceeds. The statute neither makes nor implies any such distinction. What reason to say that the statute does not intend to protect parties entitled to the money, whether it come from cash or deferred payment? The hurt of defalcation is the same. Why is not Calhoun, whose money was to come from the notes, as much authorized to look to the bond as one whose money would come from the cash payment? The statute does not provide for two bonds. The bond taken under a statute is to be construed by it, if its words will admit of it, as the statute is part of the bond. State v. Nutter, 44 W. Va. 385, 30 S. E. 67; 9 Cyc. 756. So much for the object, letter, and import of the statute. Turn to the bond. Its contract and covenant make no such limitation. It is broad. It stipulates that the commissioner shall faithfully discharge his duties as required by law, and the law demands that he apply the money—any coming to him under the sale—as the decree requires. Not only this, but the letter of the bond is that he shall account for and pay over "all money which shall come to his hands." It recites that Wotring had been appointed to sell, and "collect and disburse the proceeds arising from the sale." This means all the proceeds. Notice the words "all money." No distinction is here made as to cash and credit moneys. It says all money coming "to his hands by virtue of said office." Did not this money come to his hands only as commissioner? It was by color of his office. Lucas v. Lock, 11 W. Va. 81, 89; Sangster v. Com., 17 Grat. 131. It is a rule that the obligation of sureties will not be strained and stretched beyond the letter of the bond (State v. Nutter, 44 W. Va. 385, 30 S. E. 67); but we do not do this in this instance. The letter of the statute, its spirit and object, and the very letter of the bond, bind them for all this money to the extent of the penalty of the bond. We are told that as the farm brought more than the penalty, and it is not likely the court intended the bond to go beyond the cash payment, and the parties so understood, these circumstances indicate that the bond was intended to go no farther. Why talk about silent intent and understanding, in the face of the words of the bond and the design of the statute? How can a court defeat the statute by guessing at the silent understanding? Such an understanding is not shown. If the design was to limit the bond to the cash payment, why did it not so provide? The decree made no such limitation in its requirement of the bond.

We reverse the judgment, and, upon the facts agreed, give judgment for the plaintiff.

HURSEY v. HURSEY et al.*

Nov. 1, 1904.)

MORTGAGE—DEED ABSOLUTE ON FACE—EVIDENCE—INTENT OF PARTIES.

1. If, in a suit to have a deed absolute on its face declared a mortgage, it appears, from all the evidence, that at the time of the execution of the deed the grantee paid a debt for the grantor, and that the parties intended that the sum so paid should be and continue a debt due from the grantor to the grantee and secured by the deed, such payment will be so treated in equity.

2. An admission by the grantee in such case of a declaration, made by him at the time of the conveyance, of his willingness to receive back, at any time within five years, the money advanced by him, coupled with the circumstances of retention of possession and payment of a large part of the taxes by the grantor, and continuous conduct of both parties of such nature as to indicate recognition of an equity or interest on the part of the grantor in the land, constitute sufficient ground for holding the deed to be in fact a mortgage.

3. When such deed is shown to have been intended to be a mortgage, a mere agreement of sale between the grantee and grantor, made long after the date of the conveyance, and without any new consideration moving from the mortgagor to the mortgagee, does not alter the character of the original transaction.

4. The intent of the parties at the inception of the transaction determines the character of the conveyance. If by this test it is shown to have been originally a mortgage, it remains a mortgage, unless the equity of redemption has been in some way extinguished.

5. Explanation of the retention of possession by the grantor, though sufficient to destroy the probative force of that circumstance when standing alone, will not overcome it and admissions by declaration and conduct on the part of the grantee.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Bill by Augustus M. Hursey against John H. Hursey and others. Decree for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. G. Smith and E. A. Brannon, for appellants. Raymond Maxwell, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, P. By this appeal the soundness of a decree of the circuit court of Harrison county, declaring a deed absolute on its face to be, and to have been originally intended by the parties to be, a mortgage, and the debt secured thereby to have been paid off, and ordering a reconveyance of the land to the grantor, is questioned. Hence an examination of the findings of fact in the case, as well as the law upon the subject, is necessary.

The tract of land involved is small, containing only 28½ acres, and was not of great value at the date of the deed, October 31, 1887, but has since proved to be valuable oil, gas, and coal land. On said date Augustus M. Hursey, being the owner of the land and owing certain debts, some of which were liens upon it, executed to his brother, John H. Hursey, the deed in question, which contains the following recital as to the consideration: "For and in consideration of the sum of fourteen hundred dollars paid to the party of the first part in the following manner, to-wit, that is to say, said party of the second part is to pay to one Elmer B. Hursey the sum of $208.00 being the balance of the purchase money due said Elmer B. from said party of the first part on the land hereinafter conveyed said party of the second part is to pay D. G. Watkins Ad'r of William F. Kidd the sum of five hundred and fifty-six dollars and fifty-three cents, being the balance due on a certain note, made by said party of the first part to said Kidd, which is secured by a trust on said land, said party of the second part is to pay Randolph Co. the sum of $163.24 being the amount of a judgment against party of the first part which is a lien on said land and the said party of the second part paid the sum of $471.18 the residue of said consideration to the party of the first part by crediting said party of the first part with the said sum of $471.13 on certain indebtedness owed said party of the second part by the said party of the first part."

As to the Elmer B. Hursey debt, the defendant, the grantee in the deed, filed as an exhibit a release of the deed of trust by which it was secured, dated February 21, 1890, reciting that the debt had been paid by J. H. Hursey. His payment of this debt seems not to be denied. As to the debt due D. G. Watkins, administrator of Kidd, he filed a copy of a release of the deed of trust by which it was secured, dated December 24, 1887, reciting that the debt had been paid "by J. H. Hursey for said A. M. Hursey, except the two credits of interest paid August 31, 1885, and July, 1886, which were paid by the latter to said decedent." John H. Hursey testifies that he paid all of this debt and the unpaid interest thereon, but A. M. Hursey swears he furnished his brother $210 of the money used for that purpose. The Randolph Company judgment was a judgment of a justice in favor of P. F. Randolph, dated November 30, 1886, for $161.04, and $2.20 costs. It remained unpaid until 1891, when the creditor, being under the impression that the lien had expired, took in lieu thereof, without releasing, however, three notes executed by J. H. Hursey, A. M. Hursey, and H. L. Hursey, for the sum of $49.50 each. On two of these he afterwards acquired a judgment for $76.83, and $3.60 costs, against A. M. and H. L. Hursey only, the other debtor being then a nonresident. Later he obtained a similar judgment on the other note for $59.14, and $3.40 costs. Then, as J. H. Hursey held the title to the land and was out of the state, he instituted a suit in equity, with an attachment against him, and thereby secured a lien on the land, and took a decree for $154.98, and $57.90 costs. J. H. Hursey satisfied this decree, taking a release dated November 30, 1895. As to it, he testifies that on the 24th day of December, 1887, he delivered to his brother, A. M. Hursey, sufficient money to pay off this debt, upon his agreement to so apply it, but that he used the money for other purposes and failed to pay the debt. A. M. Hursey denies this, and says that, although his brother furnished him nothing for that purpose, he had himself reduced the debt to about $41 by payments and credits for lumber. If so, he must have done it after September, 1891, when the notes were given, and this is negatived by the judgment and decree, all of which seem to have been by default. J. H. Hursey paid another debt of A. M. Hursey, not mentioned in the deed, which was originally about $102, but which, with interest and costs, when paid, amounted to about $171.90. A. M. Hursey does not claim to have paid any of this, but says the defendant should have avoided interest and costs by earlier payment.

As to the sum of $471.13 mentioned in the deed, J. H. Hursey insists it was credited on indebtedness due to him from A. M. Hursey, as stated in the deed; but the latter says he owed him nothing, and said statement was made simply for the purpose of making the detail of items correspond with the total amount of consideration named, and, further, that J. H. Hursey had another demand against him which he supposed would be covered by the item of $471.13. This was the Lowndes debt, for which J. H. Hursey was surety. He adds that they both thought the recital in question would be a protection in case he should become involved. The deed was acknowledged December 24, 1887, and on that date A. M. Hursey executed his note to J. H. Hursey for $241.87, bearing interest from date, and reciting that it was given for borrowed money. This note has never been paid. The plaintiff denies having owed to him or borrowed from him any money on that date. J. H. Hursey says that at the time of the execution of the deed and note he told the plaintiff he would be glad to accept for the land within five years the amount he had paid for it. In May, 1890, the defendant borrowed money on the land of Mary G. De Quaise. He borrowed a considerable sum of money from one Farland also, securing it by deed of trust on the land, but the date of this loan is not given. He says he borrowed that money to pay the M. B. Hursey debt and the Randolph debt, and that he paid Hursey December 24, 1887, and gave the plaintiff money to pay Randolph on the same day. He obtained a release from Watkins on that day, but not from Hursey. After this debt had become due, the land was advertised for sale, and, in order to procure money to satisfy it, the sum of $620 was borrowed from Leeman Maxwell, and payment thereof secured by a deed of trust on the land. Of this sum A. M. Hursey received $20 and J. H. Hursey $95.67, and the residue satisfied the Farland debt. The plaintiff negotiated this last loan, and the defendant says he gave him, or let him retain, the $20 for his trouble.

Both parties admit that at about the time of this last transaction, when the land was threatened with sale for the Farland debt, it was agreed that if A. M. Hursey would obtain the sum of $600, pay that debt out of it, and pay the balance to J. H. Hursey, and pay him an additional sum of $900 within three years, making $1,500 in all, the land should be reconveyed to him. The Maxwell loan was made August 18, 1898. The plaintiff produces certain letters to him from the defendant relating to the loan and their agreement, the first of which is dated August 11, 1898. In it, after having said he had requested the trustee to postpone the sale of the land, he uses the following language, relied upon by the plaintiff: "If he does not put the sale off probably you had better get that man that you expect to get the money off to go on day of sale and buy land for you if sale can be put off I will give you three years if you can get the six Hundred I am needing money very badly now I am building a House and am hard up." The next is dated August 18, 1898, and says, among other things: "He [meaning the trustee] will pay off the Farland note and send Balance to me he will also get the release of the Farland note and have it recorded I have told Thompson to draw an article of an agreement which you will sign." The next, dated August 24, 1898, says: "I have wrote to Thompson and told him to pay you the $20.00 you had not said anything to me about it & that is the reason why I did not tell him about it when I sent papers I hope things will be all right now and you will be able to pay Each year the amount you expect to pay and all will be all right. Gus I have built a house and have went in debt to build it so I hope you will have success in paying out so I can look for some money." Then follows one dated May 17, 1899, saying the writer is undecided about the leasing of the land for oil and gas on certain terms. To it he appends this: "I promised you the land for $1500.00 Dollars to be paid within three years from last August I think was the time. But you remember it spoken of that if during that time the land should become more valuable I would be entitled to more money. That land has cost me every cent of 2500.00 Dollars not saying anything about the interest on the money for ten years." Another dated March 1st, probably 1900 (the printed record says 1890, which is evidently a mistake), says: "I have had 2 or 3 letters from different parties there wanting to buy land or lease it is there any oil or gas excitement there. Now I thought there must be on account of getting letters from 2 or 3 different parties wanting to buy or lease. Gus the time is drawing near that the Maxwell note will have to be paid and you know that I will have to pay it or let the land be sold under the hammer which means great loss to any one that has to let property be sold that way of course you know what progress you have made toward the payment of the note by this time to fully know just whether or not you will be able to do so or not. If you feel that you will not be able to do so I think you should tell me so before the note is due so I could have a chance to sell the land and not have to let it go to a force sale I would like for you to have the land but if you cannot raise the money to pay Maxwell & then raise the money for me it had better be looked after before it is too late when it becomes known that you cannot raise the money for Maxwell the parties who would buy it would rather see the land go to a force sale so please rite me the facts in the case as to what amount you have paid on the debt." Another letter, dated August 18, 1900, says: "Your letter at hand in regard to land I had wrote you a letter yesterday did not get your letter until this morning Gus you did not make matters clear in regard to the Maxwell debt that is the mortgage that Maxwell holds againce the land that six hundred Dollars of course was borrowed for you and I give him a deed of trust on the land you promised to pay that six hundred dollars in 3 years and you thought you could then borrow the money to pay me I told you I would take fifteen hundred dollars but you was to pay the debt to Maxwell I suppose you understand that but you did not state it clear in your letter I will be willing to do the fair thing which I think I have done all the way through. The land cost me $1641.00 fourteen years ago I will be willing to take $1500.00 with the understanding that if the land should turn out to be valuable On count of oil gas or from any cause I think it would be no more than rite that I should have the amount in full and at least a part of interest that the money would of brought in that time." On September 6, 1900, he writes about the making of a deed, and asks for a blank. On the 2d day of April, 1901, John H. Hursey leased the land to O. A. Bingman and G. W. F. Randolph for oil and gas, receiving from them a cash consideration of $1,050, and then two days later obtained from them an additional cash consideration of $1,000 for one-sixteenth of the oil and one-half of the gas reserved in the lease. On the day of the date of the lease he wrote a letter notifying his brother of its execution, and asking the address of Maxwell, the holder of the deed of trust. On the 5th day of April, 1901, he wrote his brother as follows: "Gus you can rest easy now in regard to having a home there I can now lift the mortgage without selling land and if it turns out to be a good thing I surely will remember you all kindly It will take the most of the money I got for lease to pay Maxwell but I hope it will turn out that good money will come from it yet. Gus if you will send me the address of Maxwell I will write him and if he will Except the money now I will pay him and stop the interest." On July 26, 1901, he wrote another letter, saying: "Your letter at hand I will direct Thompson to make deed to hoom you may direct and that you will pay to him $900.00 for me and turn over to him the note I give to Maxwell and he can send them to me when he sends the other papers or after the matter is settled up I will write to Randolph & Bingman and direct them to transfer the lease to you that you may receive royalty and rental thereafter in fact I don't think there will be any need of a transfer of lease for I think the making of the deed to you will be all that is necessary." The other side of this correspondence is not given. John H. Hursey says he did not preserve his brother's letters, and his brother gives no clear statement of their contents. He claims to have had another letter which he is unable to produce, and in which he says John H. Hursey told him he had written Mr. Thompson that, in case the land went to sale, he should deduct from the proceeds thereof $1,641, and pay the residue to the plaintiff. If this occurred, it must have been about the time the land was advertised for sale for the Farland debt. These letters, his own testimony and that of his sister, Mrs. Cain, constitute all the evidence of admissions on the part of the defendant found in the record. Mrs. Cain says the defendant told her he had agreed to let the plaintiff redeem, but she fixes the date of this conversation in the year 1899, while the correspondence about the $1,500 proposition was proceeding.

In reviewing this decree, the rule according much weight to the findings of the trial court upon issues of fact must be kept in view. The oral evidence, as well as the inferences arising from some of the established facts, presents conflict. How much weight the circuit court may have given to the admissions of the defendant, both by declaration, in his testimony, and conduct during the course of the dealings between the parties, it is difficult to say, and the application of this rule forbids any interference with the decree, except after mature consideration and an abiding conviction that it is wrong. However, although firmly established and universally recognized and enforced by appellate courts, it lays no restraint upon the power of the court to make a full investigation and careful analysis of the evidence, with a view to ascertaining whether there is such conflict, and whether the decision rests upon findings of fact supported by substantial proof.

There is no evidence of any actual loan made at the time of the execution of the deed. For proof of the existence of any indebtedness to the grantee on the part of the grantor, nothing appears except the recital of the deed as to the $471.13, the note for $241.87, and the testimony of the defendant to the effect that there was such indebtedness. His testimony on that point is most unsatisfactory, for he does not pretend to indicate how this indebtedness was incurred. His conduct contradicts his testimony, for he paid the Lowndes debt, amounting originally to something over $100, and, when paid, to $171.30, not recited in the deed as a part of the consideration, but has never asserted or claimed, since that time, any demand against the plaintiff on account of this debt. He treats it as part of the money he claims to have paid for the land, and not as a debt due from the plaintiff. True, he was bound to pay it as surety, but it was still the debt of the plaintiff. The evidence of the plaintiff, respecting the recital and the note has been already referred to, and need not be repeated here.

If it be assumed that there was no such indebtedness, the transaction presents a rather anomalous feature. The defendant, upon the theory of the plaintiff, accepted these conveyances, assumed the payment of certain debts of the plaintiff, and agreed to hold the title to the land for him, carrying this indebtedness until such time as the grantor should be able to pay off the debts or reimburse the grantee for such debts as he might pay. At first this would seem to call for some discussion as to whether the principle announced in point 3 of the syllabus in Troll v. Carter, 15 W. Va. 567, applies, and prevents the assertion of a parol trust by the grantor under his own deed, absolute in form. But the operation of the statute of frauds, and the rule against varying or adding to a deed by parol evidence, is excluded by the existence of indebtedness shown in another way. The deed was not delivered until the 24th day of December, 1887, and on that day, as part of the same transaction, the grantee paid a debt of the plaintiff, one of the debts mentioned in the deed as hereinbefore shown. If the evidence shows the parties treated this sum as a debt, and intended it to be a debt due from grantor to grantee, it will be so held in equity. "It seems to be clear, and upon admitted principles of law, that on the payment of H. & A. to L. & T. of the money due from S. to L. & T., S. became the debtor of H. & A. for that amount, as it was paid at his request and for his benefit." Stephens v. Allen, 11 Or. 188, 3 Pac. 168. See opinion, page 192, 11 Or., page 170, 3 Pac. To the same effect is Brumfield v. Boutall, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 451.

"Once a mortgage, always a mortgage," is a maxim of universal application. Though its operation is subject to certain limitations, these must rest upon a new contract based upon a sufficient valid consideration. Without the introduction of some new element working a decided and substantial change in the relationship of the parties, that of mortgagor and mortgagee, when once established, must be observed, and the principles applicable thereto enforced, in the settlement of their rights. Jones on Mort. § 263; Russell v. Southard, 12 How. 189, 18 L. Ed. 927; Conway v. Alexander, 7 Cranch, 218, 3 L. Ed. 321. It takes a new agreement, based upon an adequate consideration, to do away with this relationship. There is in the mortgagor an equity of redemption, a valuable right, for the extinguishment of which a consideration is necessary. Villa v. Rodriguez, 12 Wall. 323, 20 L. Ed. 406. Possibly it could be donated, relinquished voluntarily, without consideration, as any other species of property may be, but the proof of such disposition of it must be positive, clear, and unequivocal. It must rest upon something more substantial than mere inference drawn from conduct or casual declarations of the parties. A subsequent agreement that a mortgage shall be regarded as an absolute conveyance will not be sustained unless shown to have been fairly made and without the exercise of undue advantage by the creditor. "Where an absolute deed is given as a security for a debt, chancery will treat it as a mortgage, though the defeasance rest in parol, especially if the grantor continues in possession. Where the deed was so executed, and the mortgagor afterwards took a lease of the premises from the mortgagee, and the mortgagee, with an intent to veil the transaction and cut off the equity of redemption, covenanted to reconvey to the mortgagor on the payment of a sum of money by a time specified, it was held that, although the lease and covenant gave the transaction the appearance of a conditional sale, still the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee was not thereby destroyed." Wright v. Bates, 13 Vt. 341. See, also, Henry v. Davis, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 40; Mills v. Mills, 28 Conn. 213.

As already stated, the defendant says he told the plaintiff, the grantor in the deed, at the time it was made, that he would be glad to accept within five years the amount he had paid for the land. At that time money was obtained from some source with which to pay a considerable part of the grantor's indebtedness, namely, the $556 debt due the estate of Kidd. The grantor says he furnished $210 of the money with which to pay it. Assuming that he did, more than $300 additional money was necessary. Either for this purpose or the payment of some other debts, money was obtained from Farland for which a deed of trust upon the property was executed. When this debt became due, and the creditor advertised the land for sale, the defendant seems to have relied upon the plaintiff to obtain the money from some source with which to save the land, and the plaintiff appears to have been very anxious to do so, and to have exerted himself to that end. When it seemed doubtful as to whether this would be accomplished, the defendant wrote his brother, saying that, if the trustee did not postpone the sale, he would better get the man from whom he expected to obtain the money to buy the land in for him (the plaintiff). By this he laid grounds for the inference that he felt that his brother had a deeper interest in the matter than he, and that the former must protect and save himself, and was at liberty to do so, if possible, by having some one purchase the property for his benefit. In the event of the postponement, and success in raising the sum of $600 by a new loan on the property, he wanted the excess over the amount necessary to discharge the debt, because he was needing money badly, and would give time for the payment of additional money which he hoped to get out of the land. Added to this is the further circumstance that the grantor was permitted to remain in possession of the property and use and occupy it as his own. No rent was ever demanded from him, and the payment of taxes seems to have been left to his care. During the whole period from 1887 to 1901 the taxes were for the most part paid by the plaintiff. On one occasion, when he was pressed by the officers for the taxes and unable to pay them, the defendant paid about $35. He may have paid for some additional years, but the taxes seem to have been paid in the main by the plaintiff. Possession of the land by the grantor, whether rent be nominally reserved or not, and if no rent is even professedly reserved, is entitled to very great weight, if unexplained. Vangilder v. Hoffman, 22 W. Va. 1 (Syl., point 7). It is insisted, however, that a sufficient explanation of this circumstance has been furnished by the defendant, who testifies that he permitted this by way of courtesy to his brother and two sisters who made their home there the greater part of the time. This position is taken upon the authority of Edwards v. Wall, 79 Va. 321. In that case, however, possession of the grantor was about the only circumstance relied upon by the plaintiff as evidence of the character of the conveyance, save that out of part of the lands sold the purchaser paid the grantor his debt, for the payment of which the land had been threatened with sale at the time of the conveyance. There was no evidence of any admission on the part of the grantee that the conveyance had any character other than that evidenced by its face. On the contrary, the notary who took the acknowledgment testified that, before the deed was signed and acknowledged, the grantor asked that some clause be put in reserving to him some right in the property, and that the grantee remarked that he would not put any provision in the deed, and that, if it were not signed as written, he would not touch it. Moreover, no claim that the deed was intended to be a mortgage was asserted until shortly before the suit was instituted. In the case now under consideration the defendant testifies to an expression made to the plaintiff at the time of the conveyance of his willingness to take his money back and release the land at any time within five years. Long before this suit was commenced, the sum which he was willing to take was fixed at $1,500. He says this was a contract of sale, but the plaintiff says it was an abatement of $141.87 from what the defendant had formerly fixed as the amount of the redemption money, and a continuation of the original agreement and understanding for redemption thus modified. Such a modification would not convert what was originally a mortgage into a contract of sale. To have that effect, the new agreement must be predicated upon a consideration, and it is not pretended that any was given or agreed to be paid to the plaintiff by way of extinguishment of his right to redemption. The conclusion of the trial court probably rests more upon the admission of the defendant to which reference has been made than any other circumstance. The great weight of such admission, or evidence tending to establish it, was adverted to in the case of Sadler v. Taylor, 49 W. Va. 104, 120, 38 S. E. 583.

He says he made that statement at the inception of the transaction, at the time of the conveyance. The intent at that moment determines the character of the conveyance. Sadler v. Taylor, cited; Hogg's Eq. Prin. 715; Dabney v. Green, 4 Hen. & M. 101, 4 Am. Dec. 503. Although he does not say a loan was made, or that he then said the deed was to be treated as a mortgage, or that he used the word "redeem," he did say he would receive back his money, and, of course, a reconveyance would follow. He does not say that agreement was for a repurchase. As to what he then said, his statement is indefinite, except in respect to his willingness to be reimbursed. That he clearly and fully admits, and the admission is to be construed in the light of the conditions then existing and the subsequent conduct of the parties, bearing in mind that doubtful cases are generally decided to be mortgages. Conway v. Alexander, 7 Cranch, 218, 237, 3 L. Ed. 321.

It has been truly stated that the defendant was not a money lender. He was a poor man himself, taking upon himself a great burden for the relief of a distressed brother and sisters. It may not be the ordinary case of a conveyance to secure an antecedent debt or a direct contemporaneous advance, and the motive for the acceptance of the conveyance may not have been that which usually impels such action. The defendant was surety for some of these debts, and this circumstance may have influenced him. But whatever his character, or the inducement to the conveyance, he obtained by it a position of advantage over the grantor respecting the title, and not in the usual and ordinary mode of purchase, and no reason is perceived why the general principles and rules governing inquiry into the class of conveyances to which this one is said to belong should not be applied.

Another objection to the decree is that it treats the indebtedness of the plaintiff to the defendant as having been satisfied by the oil lease bonus of $1,050 and the $1,000 realized from the sale of one-half of the oil and gas reserved. Counsel for appellants say the indebtedness amounted to $3,639, which exceeds the amount received by the defendant from the oil and gas by the sum of $1,589. This contention ignores some facts favorable to the plaintiff that are perfectly apparent from the face of the record. The Farland loan paid all, or the greater part, of the large Kidd debt. If the defendant's evidence is true, it paid about $300, and the plaintiff received the balance of that loan. That loan itself was paid out of the Maxwell loan, and the plaintiff put into his own pocket practically all of what remained of the Maxwell loan. It also includes $713, the aggregate of the $241.78, and the $471.18 recital of the deed, the doubtful characters of both of which have been adverted to. As to the amount of the indebtedness, the evidence conflicts violently. The trial court has passed upon it, and no ground is perceived upon which the finding can be disturbed. There is evidence, both direct and circumstantial, to sustain it.

For the reasons above stated, the decree should be affirmed.

WEIMER, WRIGHT & WATKINS v. TALBOT et al.*

Nov. 22, 1904.)

SURETY—SUBROGATION — ASSIGNMENT—JUDGMENT LIEN — SATISFACTION — LIMITATIONS—ACTIONS BETWEEN SURETIES—DEFENSES—EVIDENCE—MEASURE OF LIABILITY.

1. The right of a surety who has paid the debt of his principal to be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the creditor against his co-sureties may be assigned, and, under the assignment, enforced by the assignee.

2. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, decrees adjudicating liens against certain land, ordering a sale of the land, confirming the sale thereof, and ordering payment of the liens out of the proceeds by the special commissioners into whose hands the proceeds of sale have come, in sufficient amount to satisfy a certain one of the liens so fixed, and all others prior thereto, is sufficient proof of satisfaction out of the proceeds of the land of the lien in question.

3. Where a judgment has been kept alive by the issuance thereon of successive executions, as provided by section 10 of chapter 139 of the Code, and finally satisfied out of the lands of one of several co-sureties for the debt out of which the judgment originated, and the assignee of such surety, holding his right of subrogation against other sureties, brings his suit for enforcement of that right against the lands of one of the other sureties within 10 years from the return day of the last execution issued on the judgment, and the rights of no third parties have intervened which will be prejudiced by the enforcement of the lien by way of subrogation, such suit is not barred by either the statute of limitations or laches.

4. An allegation, by way of defense to such a suit, of payment made by a third co-surety of his portion of the judgment, is not supported by oral testimony of the existence of a release of the judgment as to the land of such co-surety, without production of the release, or a copy thereof, showing payment by him, or proof of satisfaction of the lien as to such land in some way other than by payment out of the proceeds of the lands of the other surety, sold as aforesaid for the satisfaction thereof.

5. Allegations, by way of defense to such a suit, that there remains in the hands of a special receiver in a chancery cause against still another surety, brought for the enforcement of liens against his lands, a fund, which has not been disposed of, derived from rents accruing under a decree by which the lands of such surety were rented, and that the lands of such surety were sold in such suit for an amount more than sufficient to pay all of the liens thereon, and that the judgment in question was barred from participation in the proceeds thereof by the failure of the creditor to assert it in said suit, are not sustained by oral testimony, based on information only, to the existence of such fund, in the hands of such special receiver, and to the understanding of the witnesses testifying that there was a surplus of the proceeds of the lands after satisfying all the judgments asserted in said suit, none of the decrees in said suit being produced in support of the allegation, notwithstanding the nonproduction of the papers in the cause is justified by proof of their loss.

6. The measure of liability of the co-surety in such case is the whole amount of principal and interest paid for him, with interest thereon from the date of payment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by Weimer, Wright & Watkins against James W. Talbot and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

J. Hop Woods, for appellants. Ice & Ice and C. F. Teter, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, P. The assignability of a right of subrogation against a co-surety, proof of payment of a judgment out of the proceeds of real estate of the assignor judicially sold to satisfy it, and maintenance of the lien of the judgment by issuance of executions thereon, are the important subjects for consideration in disposing of this cause.

On the 1st day of February, 1886, the Farmers' Bank of Philippi obtained a judgment, in the circuit court of Barbour county, against J. W. Talbot, principal debtor, and John F. Woodford, J. E. Heatherly, Henry A. Call, J. M. Woodford, Jacob W. Robinson, and Anthony T. Daniels, sureties, for the sum of $1,781.80, with interest thereon from January 30, 1886, and $3.75 costs. Talbot was then insolvent. Execution was immediately issued, went into the hands of the sheriff February 15, 1886, and was returned unsatisfied by order of plaintiff's attorney on February 27, 1886. One month later J. M. Woodford assigned and transferred all his personal property to trustees by a written contract, which may be seen by reference to the case of Heatherly v. Bank, 31 W. Va. 70, 72, 5 S. E. 754. On the 10th day of May, 1886, said bank instituted a suit in equity against said J. M. Woodford and numerous other defendants, some of whom are judgment creditors, for the purpose of subjecting Woodford's real estate to the satisfaction of the liens thereon. On the 10th day of July, 1886, after the commencement of said suit by the bank, Welmer, Wright & Watkins recovered a judgment against said Woodford for $354.87 and $12.20 costs, and on the same day Greer & Laing obtained a judgment against him for $983.64 and $12.20 costs. On this last judgment, $323.62 was paid March 5, 1887. Some time in the year 1887 James E. Heatherly, one of the sureties for the Talbot debt, commenced a suit in equity to restrain the Bank of Philippi from enforcing payment of its judgment against him, and obtained a decree on the 22d day of July, 1887, adjudicating that the personal property assigned to said trustees by Woodford should be treated as a payment pro tanto of judgments, debts, and liabilities due from Woodford to said bank, and that the principal debtor and all the sureties except Heatherly should pay the said judgment of $1,781.80, then amounting, with its interest, to $1,981.74, and awarding execution thereon. On the 30th day of July, 1887, the execution was issued, and on the 3d day of October, 1887, returned unsatisfied in consequence of an appeal from the decree awarding it. The nature of that decree, and the disposition of the appeal from it, will appear by reference to Heatherly v. Bank, 31 W. Va. 70, 5 S. E. 754. Pending these proceedings, Greer and Laing commenced a chancery suit against Woodford to enforce satisfaction of their lien, and, after the decision of this court in Heatherly v. Bank, the three causes—Farmers' Bank of Philippi v. Woodford et al., Heatherly v. Bank, and Greer and Laing v. Woodford et al.—were heard together, on the 19th day of July, 1889, when a decree fixing the liens upon Woodford's property, and directing a sale thereof, was entered. Sale was afterwards made and confirmed by a decree entered on the 30th day of October, 1889. From these decrees an appeal was taken, and they were reversed and the causes remanded, as shown in Farmers' Bank v. Woodford, 34 W. Va. 480, 12 S. E. 544. The modifications of the decrees directed by this court related to the priorities of liens and distribution of proceeds of the sale of the real estate. The sale itself was not disturbed. Upon the mandate of this court, the circuit court on the 4th day of June, 1891, made another decree, altering the order of payment, and directing a distribution of the proceeds of sale to the creditors in the order of preference thereby fixed.

Out of the proceeds of the personal property which went into the hands of Teter and Call, trustees, the circuit court, by its first decree, applied $524.02 on the judgment of $1,781.80 as of the 26th day of September, 1887. This application of the trust fund was one of the errors corrected on the appeal. By the last decree, it was ascertained and determined upon the mandate of this court that the Farmers' Bank of Philippi had the sixth lien upon the real estate of James M. Woodford for the sum of $1,981.95, with interest from September 26, 1887, on account of said judgment of $1,781.80, subject to a credit of $594.13, as of November 4, 1889, paid by John F. Woodford, instead of the eighth, as determined by the first decree. By said decree the court ascertained that the judgment of February 1, 1886, with interest, costs, and damages, amounted on the 19th day of July, 1889, as to James E. Heatherly, to $2,357.69. Execution for that amount was awarded against him, and was issued on the 8th day of July, 1891, and returned September 7, 1891, "No property found." It was also ascertained that the judgment, as to all the other defendants was of the original amount, subject to the credit aforesaid, and execution was awarded against them accordingly, and issued on the 8th day of July, 1891, and returned on the 26th day of September, 1891, by order of the attorney for the plaintiff. Prior to its return the officer made this memorandum on it: "I levied this execution on money in the Tygart's Valley Bank sufficient to pay exe. on September 5, 1891." Early in these proceedings, to wit, October 22, 1887, James M. Woodford executed to Greer & Laing and to Welmer, Wright & Watkins a written assignment of "whatever right or cause of action" he had or might have "for contribution or subrogation or otherwise" against his co-sureties, or either of them, "in the judgment for $1,781.80, with cost," etc. These assignees brought this suit on the 28th day of March, 1900, less than nine years from the date of the issuance of the last execution on the judgment, to be substituted and subrogated to the rights of James M. Woodford against John F. Woodford for the amount paid on said judgment out of the proceeds of the sale of said James M. Woodford's real estate in excess of his equitable portion thereof, which the plaintiffs allege was one-half, less the payment of $594.13 paid by said co-surety; the principal debtor and all the sureties except James M. Woodford and John F. Woodford having been insolvent, by reason of which nothing was collected from any of them on account of said judgment. There is some contention of payment made by Heatherly, one of the sureties, and of ability to pay by the estate of Robinson, another one of the sureties, but these questions, for convenience, will be postponed for the present.

That an equitable claim, such as the right of a surety who has paid the debt of his principal, or more than his equitable part thereof, to be subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the principal against his co-sureties, is an equitable demand for money, which may be assigned in equity, would seem to be too plain to require any citation of authority. Although originally a matter of equitable cognizance, contribution between sureties long ago became a legal right, enforceable by courts of law. Brandt on Sur. & Guar. § 289. The right to recover at law seems to be limited to an aliquot part of the debt, to be determined by a division according to the whole number of co-sureties, solvent and insolvent. But in equity a surety who pays the debt of his principal is entitled to have, as contribution from his solvent co-sureties, a pro rata amount of the sum paid by him, based upon the number of solvent co-sureties, excluding the insolvent ones. Brandt on Sur. & Guar. § 288; Story's Eq. Pl. § 496; Preston v. Preston, 4 Grat. 88, 47 Am. Dec. 717; Dent v. Wait's Adm'r, 9 W. Va. 41. Whether the right in this case is legal or equitable is immaterial. As an equitable demand for money, an assignment of it is enforceable in a court of equity. However, authority for the proposition is not wanting. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 271; Pierce v. Garrett, 65 Ill. App. 682; York v. Landis, 65 N. C. 535; Bait v. German, 3 Pa. 300; Hare v. Headley, 54 N. J. Eq. 545, 35 Atl. 445.

It is not upon nonassignability of the right, however, that the defense is based. One contention is that payment of the judgment out of the proceeds of the sale of James M. Woodford's real estate is not proved. The decrees hereinbefore referred to are exhibited with the bill, and relied upon as proof of payment. They show that the property was sold for $7,510. The debt in question was made by the last decree, sixth in order of payment, and these six liens amounted, in the aggregate, to only $2,834.66. There were judgments amounting to $4,186.72 which had preference of payment out of the fund arising from the sale of the personal property, but that fund amounted to $4,200.52, which was probably sufficient to cover all of these judgments, with the interest thereon. Whether it was or not, the decree gave preference over the bank judgment to only one of these judgments—that of A. Block & Co. for $325, which was one of the first six liens, and included in the total of $2,834.66. Hence there can be no doubt as to the sufficiency of the proceeds of the sale of the real estate to pay the judgment in question. But it is urged that the decrees do not show that it was paid. This contention is based upon certain recitals in the decrees. One is in the decree of July 19, 1889, and is as follows: "But no part of the proceeds of the sale of said lands shall be applied to the satisfaction of said debt of $1,757.79 until execution thereon has been issued and returned." This is the same judgment reduced by an erroneous application thereto of part of the proceeds of the personal property which was corrected on the appeal as above stated. Other recitals relied upon are in the decree of October 30, 1889. They are as follows: "But nothing herein contained shall be construed to release the said proceeds arising from the sale of said lands of James M. Woodford from the lien existing thereon in favor of the Farmers' Bank of Philippi for his equitable share of its demand against him and others for said sum of $1,757.79, when the same shall be ascertained after allowing him credit of $542.02, with interest thereon from the 26th day of March, 1886, paid by him upon the original judgment of $1,781.80, mentioned in said decree of sale. * * * It is further ordered that, whatever sum may be paid on said debt shall be applied as a credit on the said debt eighth in order of priority aforesaid, as of the date of payment thereof, nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent said special receiver from issuing other executions for the said debt or any balance thereof, and the amount so paid by said J. F. Woodford shall be a credit on said execution, but shall be no release to him of the balance thereof." Another is in the last decree, carrying out the final decree of this court, and reads as follows: "In case execution shall issue upon the said debt of $2,359.89 against said Heatherly, subject to the credit of $594.13 as of November 4, 1889, paid by J. F. Woodford, or in case execution shall issue against the other defendants therein for the sum of $1,781.80, and $3.75 costs, with interest from February 1, 1886, subject to the credit aforesaid, and the said debt shall be paid by any of the said defendants therein except by the principal, J. W. Talbot, then in that event it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the proceeds of J. M. Woodford's lands, in or which may come into, the hands of said commissioners, applicable to the payment of said debt of $1,961.95, decreed to the Bank of Philippi, shall be liable to such co-surety for his equitable proportion of said debt for which he is liable, but all questions touching the amount thereof are reserved for such order of the court as may be necessary and proper to protect the rights of all the sureties in said judgment." From what has been said, it must be apparent that the recitals in the first two decrees are now without effect, for they were reversed and held for naught in so far as they fixed the order of distribution of the money. The recital in the last decree does not stay the distribution of the fund, but only reserves to the court the power to enforce contribution among the sureties. This contention, however, is set at rest and shown to have no foundation by another part of the last decree, which orders payment of the proceeds upon the debts in the order fixed by that decree. It reads as follows: "It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the said commissioners, J. Hop Woods and Chas. F. Teter, shall withdraw the fund deposited in bank by a former order herein, and, with it and the proceeds of the uncollected notes for the purchase money of the lands of the said James M. Woodford, pay the debts, so far as said funds will avail, in the order herein mentioned, after payment of costs and expenses as herein provided." The stay in the decree of July 19, 1889, if not released by the action of this court on the appeal, is undoubtedly released by the decree of June 4, 1891. It shows conclusively that the money in the hands of the special commissioners was appropriated to, and directed to be paid on, this debt; and it would be a most violent presumption to say that these commissioners, special officers of the court, had not paid over the money.

Laches and the statute of limitations are relied upon as other defenses. The answer to this is that the assignment made by Woodford to the plaintiffs carries the benefit of the judgment lien upon the property of John F. Woodford held by the Farmers' Bank of Philippi. On satisfaction of the judgment, James M. Woodford became entitled to all the rights to and securities for that debt held by said bank. By his assignment to the plaintiffs he invested them with the same rights, including the benefit of the lien of the judgment upon the lands of John F. Woodford. That lien was not allowed to lapse. As already shown, executions were issued upon it within two years; and, before the expiration of ten years from the date of the first of the executions, another one was issued on the 8th day of July, 1891, by reason of which the lien would continue for another period of ten years. Before the expiration of that time, this suit was brought to enforce the lien. Hence neither the statute of limitations nor the principle of laches applies. Code 1899, c. 139, § 10. The lien of a judgment ceases to exist when the right to sue out execution or to bring a scire facias or action thereon is barred by the statute of limitations, and not before. Shipley v. Pew, 23 W. Va. 487. "Where execution issues within two years as aforesaid, other executions may be issued on such judgment without notice, within ten years from the return day of the last execution issued thereon, on which there is no return by an officer, or which has been returned unsatisfied." Code 1899, c. 139, § 10. Since the lien exists as long as execution may issue on the judgment or scire facias, or action thereon may be had, neither the statute nor laches can bar it, for the lien gives a clear right to satisfaction of the judgment, and equity will enforce it. Its existence precludes the possibility of any waiver, abandonment, lack of diligence, or any other element of laches.

That the right of subrogation may be lost by lack of diligence in its assertion against third parties is not overlooked, but here the rights of no such persons have intervened. Such lack of diligence is termed laches in Gring's Appeal, 89 Pa. 336, but it is more like an estoppel in pais than laches. Laches presupposes a right of action founded upon contract or cause of equitable relief between parties to a contract or a transaction out of which an equity arises. It is a failure to prosecute in time that cause of action, or until after such changes in condition as render the enforcement of the right inequitable. 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. 97. Estoppel in pais extends beyond the parties to the cause, and operates in favor of third parties. Herman, Est. & Res. Jud. § 7, cls. 3, 4; Bates v. Swiger, 40 W. Va. 420, 21 S. E. 874. However the principle may be classed, there are no facts calling for its application.

Whether, in the absence of a lien, the enforcement of which gives equity jurisdiction as long as it exists, the right to contribution in equity, where the plaintiff seeks more than an aliquot part of the debt, determined by a division by the whole number of the sureties, because of the insolvency of some of them, is barred by the five-years statute of limitations, does not arise here. Part of such claim would be a legal demand, as to which there is concurrent jurisdiction in equity. As a whole, it would be a demand cognizable only in equity, unless the statute has wrought a change in that respect. Section 3 of chapter 101 of the Code of 1899 gives to a surety having right of action for the amount paid by him a summary remedy. It says he may, "by motion in the circuit court of the county, obtain judgment or decree against any person against whom such right of action exists for the amount so paid, with interest from the time of payment, and five per centum damages on said amount." Section 5 of said chapter says that, if the principal debtor be insolvent, the surety against whom a judgment or decree has been rendered may obtain a judgment or decree, by motion in the circuit court, against any co-surety or his personal representative for his share, in law or equity, of the amount for which the first-mentioned judgment or decree may have been rendered, and, if the same has been paid, for such share of the amount so paid, with interest thereon from the time of such payment. The object of these two sections seems to be not to do away with any distinction there may be between law and equity jurisdiction, but only to provide more simple and speedy remedies for the surety in both forums. Under the third section, he may have either a judgment or a decree by motion. Under the fifth section, he may have, by motion, either a judgment or decree, if a judgment or decree has been rendered against him on the contract for which he was surety. Construction of these provisions is not proper here, however. Nothing in the case calls for it.

The answer relies upon payment by Heatherly of his portion of the judgment, and an attempt is made to sustain this affirmative allegation by the evidence of a witness who says that the release deed book in the clerk's office of the county court shows that Heatherly's share has been paid. Neither the release itself, nor a copy thereof, is produced, and the witness does not undertake to say by whom the payment was made. His testimony is only secondary evidence, and therefore could not be considered, had proper objection to it been made; and, if it were competent, it fails to show that Heatherly paid any portion of the judgment. It only shows a release of the judgment, without indicating who paid it. Payment out of the proceeds of Woodford's real estate would justify the execution of the release, and may account for its existence. This evidence is wholly insufficient to sustain the allegation of payment by Heatherly.

Another defense is that there is in the hands of C. F. Teter, special receiver in the chancery cause of P. C. Robinson v. J. W. Robinson, one of the sureties for the bank debt, a sum of money amounting to $1,000 or $1,500, belonging to the estate of said Robinson, and derived from rents of his real estate under a decree in said chancery cause of Robinson v. Robinson. The object of that suit seems to have been to enforce the lien of a judgment against Robinson's land, and the real estate was evidently placed in the hands of a special receiver and rented for a time before it was sold. The claim is that these rents were never applied to the payment of any judgments, and still remain in the hands of a special receiver. The only evidence of this is the testimony of John F. Woodford and L. D. Robinson, a son of the said J. W. Robinson, who died before the institution of this suit. The record of the chancery suit of Robinson v. Robinson, which would show what became of these funds and the proceeds of his lands, is not produced. It is said to have been lost. But the order book would undoubtedly show something concerning the disposition of his estate. None of the decrees in that case are produced in the effort to substantiate this contention, and this testimony is open to the objection interposed to the evidence offered concerning the alleged Heatherly payment. It proves nothing. John F. Woodford testifies that it is his understanding that Robinson's real estate sold for more than enough to satisfy all the liens upon it, and that, but for the failure of the Farmers' Bank to present in that suit its judgment against Robinson, that surety would have paid out of the proceeds of his real estate his portion of the debt. This, again, is only secondary evidence, offered without any foundation for it having been laid, and it falls far short of proving the affirmative matter of defense alleged. The witness does not state what the judgments against Robinson amounted to, the amount realized from the sale of his real estate, the costs of the suit, or any of the facts upon which the issue made depends. He does not even say of his own knowledge that there was a surplus, but only that it is his understanding. Whether, if proved, the matter relied upon would be a good defense, it is unnecessary to inquire.

The defendant also relied upon the alleged levy of the execution of July 8, 1891, upon money in the Tygart's Valley Bank, to which reference has been made. The officer who made the memorandum on the execution testifies that there was in fact no levy made. He saw no money, had none in his hands, nor any dominion over it, but made the memorandum upon the assurance of the cashier that the money would be forthcoming at any time he might want it. Moreover, he amended this return, if such it may be considered, before delivering up the execution. The memorandum was made on September 5, 1891. On September 26, 1891, the attorney for the plaintiff indorsed upon the execution an order directing it to be returned unexecuted. On the execution, the officer wrote, "Returned unexecuted by order of Att'y for plaintiff." Reading all these indorsements together, it is manifest that the return was made on or after September 26, 1891, and it negatives effectually the inference of any satisfaction of it, or liability for the amount of it by the officer, arising from the memorandum made on September 5, 1891.

It follows from these conclusions that the circuit court erred in dismissing plaintiffs' bill. They are clearly entitled to enforce the lien of the judgment against the real estate of John F. Woodford for one-half of the judgment of February 1, 1886, with interest thereon from said date, and $3.75 costs, less the sum of $594.13 paid by said John F. Woodford November 4, 1889.

By the decree satisfied out of the proceeds of the lands, the principal sum in the judgment, and the interest thereon to September 26, 1887, were aggregated; the amount ascertained to be $1,961.95, and interest allowed on the aggregate from said date; and the proceeds of the land sold were held liable to contribution in favor of any of Woodford's co-sureties who might satisfy the decree, on the basis of said aggregate sum, subject to the credit aforesaid. Under section 18, c. 131, of the Code, a decree for the principal, with interest added to the date of the decree, June 4, 1891, could have been made, allowing interest on the aggregate from that date. Hence the law authorized a decree for interest upon interest after decree, in that way and to that extent, in favor of the creditor against all the sureties; and, upon his satisfying the decree with such interest, the same right passed to J. M. Woodford against his co-sureties, together with the right to interest on the whole amount paid by him for his co-sureties from the date of payment. Though it is the lien of the original judgment his assignees are now enforcing, a decree based upon the same lien has rightfully augmented the principal sum by the addition thereto of accumulated interest as aforesaid. This sum was further increased by the interest thereon until the date of payment, subject to deduction of the amount paid by John F. Woodford, as of the date of that payment, and one-half of the judgment, with interest thereon as aforesaid until paid, and costs, and interest on the aggregate from the date of payment, subject, however, as to said one-half, to a deduction, as of November 4, 1889, of the sum of $594.18, paid by John F. Woodford, is the measure of liability of said John F. Woodford by way of contribution. "The amount of the payment made, with legal interest, is the measure of recovery." Faires v. Cockerell, 88 Tex. 428, 31 S. W. 190, 639, 28 L. R. A. 528; 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 207. Out of that sum, if sufficient, the plaintiffs are entitled to have satisfaction of their judgments, and, if insufficient to pay them in full, it is to be applied on them pro rata. But the amount for which decrees are to be entered can be more conveniently ascertained, under these principles, in the circuit court, than here.

For the reasons above stated, the decree complained of will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree for the plaintiffs in accordance with the principles and directions herein stated, and for such further proceedings as the rules and principles governing courts of equity may require.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1904.)

RES JUDICATA—ACTION ON JOINT NOTE—JUDGMENT—MERGER.

1. A. instituted his action against S. & Bro. only upon two joint promissory notes made by S. & Bro. and H. Judgment was recovered by him in the action against S. & Bro. for the full amount due upon the notes, which judgment remained in full force and effect. At a subsequent term, A. caused the action to be reinstated upon the docket, remanded to rules, summons to be issued thereout and served on H., who appeared at the next term and pleaded the judgment against S. & Bro. as a bar to the suit against him. The court sustained the plea and dismissed the suit at the costs of the plaintiff.

Held, no error.

Error to Circuit Court, Grant County; R. W. Dailey, Judge.

Action by Aaron Armentrout against S. H. Smith & Bro. and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Reynolds & Foreman, for plaintiff in error.
A. J. Welton and H. B. Gilkeson, for defendants in error.

MILLER, J. S. H. Smith & Bro. and John G. Harman executed to Aaron Armentrout

their two joint promissory notes—one for $290 and the other for $200. On the 27th day of January, 1897, Armentrout sued out of the clerk's office of the circuit court of Grant county a summons, commencing his action against S. H. Smith and R. C. Smith, as partners, composing said firm, requiring them to answer him of a plea of trespass on the case in assumpsit. At the February rules, next thereafter, he filed his declaration in the action, in which he counted on said notes against Smith & Bro., and also against Harman, but Harman was not included in or served with the summons, nor was he otherwise brought before the court. In this condition of the case, judgment was taken by default against Smith & Bro., only, for $338.20, the amount due to the plaintiff upon the notes sued on. Afterwards a motion of the plaintiff to have the judgment set aside was overruled by the court, but "without prejudice to the right of said Armentrout to bring suit on said notes against the said S. H. and R. C. Smith and John G. Harman." Later a new action was instituted against the Smiths and Harman upon the notes, totally disregarding the former action and judgment therein. Harman pleaded the former judgment in bar of the second action against him. His plea was sustained, the action dismissed at the costs of the plaintiff, and the judgment of dismissal affirmed by this court. Armentrout v. Smith et al., 52 W. Va. 96, 43 S. E. 98.

After the affirmance of the last-mentioned judgment, the circuit court, on motion of the plaintiff, reinstated the original action on the docket, awarded summons thereout against Harman, and remanded the case to the rules to be matured thereat. Summons was issued and served on Harman, who at the March term, 1904, appeared and moved the court to dismiss the action, but admitted that, if plaintiff was entitled to judgment against him therein, such judgment should be for $366.28, with interest thereon from that date. The court sustained his motion, dismissed the action, and rendered judgment against the plaintiff for costs. That judgment is now before us for review on writ of error. Harman was not a party to the original action at its commencement, or when judgment was rendered therein as aforesaid against Smith & Bro., his co-makers of the notes. The process to commence a suit shall be a writ, commanding the officer to whom it is directed, to summon the defendant to answer the bill or action. Code 1890, c. 124, § 5; Gelser Mfg. Co. v. Chewing, 52 W. Va. 523, 44 S. E. 193. The last-mentioned judgment became and is now final and binding upon the plaintiff, Armentrout, and defendants S. H. and R. C. Smith. That suit was ended by the judgment therein. "It is res judicata. The original cause of action is gone." 1 Herman, Est. & Res. Jud. § 124. No other or further judgment could or can be rendered against Smith & Bro.

*Rehearing denied January 3, 1905.

upon the notes. The reinstatement of the first action on the docket and issuance of summons thereout against Harman, if it had any legal effect, was a new action against him alone for the recovery of the money due upon the notes, which before that time had been adjudicated between Armentrout, payee, and Smith & Bro., co-promisors therein with Harman. Such action cannot be maintained. 1 Herman, Res. Jud. § 564, says: "So, in an action brought against two or more of the makers of a joint and several note or bond, without including all, it discharges the remainder of them; the obligation being lost in the judgment that binds only those parties against whom it is rendered. A judgment on a bond or contract extinguishes that bond or contract, because there cannot be liabilities on both instruments, and, as a judgment and a bond both import an absolute liability, the legal obligation of the inferior obligation must be considered as at once blotted out. So a judgment against a joint debtor on a joint cause of action merges the liability of all." 2 Black on Judg. § 770, cites the Supreme Court of Wisconsin as follows: "It is perfectly well settled that if the holder of a joint debt or obligation sues one of the joint debtors, and obtains judgment thereon against him, and then sues another of the joint debtors for the same debt or obligation, the latter may plead such judgment against his co-debtor and bar the action. This is so, because the joint debt is merged in the judgment against the debtor first sued, and, being indivisible, it cannot be merged or canceled as to one, and be existing and operative as to another, joint debtor." With reference to the number of the defendants, and who must be joined, 2 Tuck. Com. 212, says: "There is, however, this objection, in the case of a joint contract, to the nonjoinder of one or more of the several parties liable: that, if judgment be obtained against one in a separate action against him on such contract, the plaintiff cannot afterwards proceed against the parties omitted, and consequently loses their security." Freeman on Judg. § 231; Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 342, 344. Code 1899, c. 125, § 52, provides that "where, in an action or suit against two or more defendants, the process is served upon part of them, the plaintiff may proceed to judgment as to any so served, and either discontinue it as to the others, or from time to time, as the process is served as to such others, proceed to judgment as to them until judgments be obtained against them all." This statute applies only to joint defendants against whom process has been issued, but not served as to one or more of them. It permits the plaintiff to obtain judgment in the pending action against those served, and to have execution and judgment lien as to them, although the others also sued and jointly liable may not be before the court. In Snyder v. Snyder, 9 W. Va. 415, it is held that "a further exception to the rule that in a joint action there must be a joint judgment is found in the fifty-second section of chapter 125 of the Code." The opinion, on page 420, states that "under this statute there may be had as many several judgments on a joint obligation as there are parties to the obligation, dependent wholly upon the service of process." In the former opinion in this case (52 W. Va. 96, 98, 43 S. E. 98) the court says: "The statute, being in derogation of the common law, must be construed strictly, and its meaning cannot be so extended as to authorize separate actions on a joint contract against each of the obligors. To hold this would be to entirely destroy the distinction between joint and several contracts, and to make all contracts several. The motion to set aside the judgment in the first action, which was overruled, has nothing to do with the question in controversy, as, under the statute, that judgment, though not set aside, would not be a bar in the same suit to new process, and a separate judgment against a defendant not served, for the statute expressly authorizes this course. Because, however, the statute authorizes a new summons and a separate judgment in the same suit, it cannot be held to authorize a new suit on the same cause of action, without regard to the first." The court then holds that "section 52, c. 125, Code 1899, so far changes the common law as to permit a plaintiff to take several judgments against several joint obligors, as they are served with process in the same suit. It does not authorize more than one suit against all or any of the obligors, whether served with process in the first suit or not. As to the bringing of more than one suit on the same joint cause of action, the common-law rule remains unchanged." Armentrout v. Smith et al., 52 W. Va. 96, 43 S. E. 98. No action having been commenced or prosecuted by the plaintiff against Harman on the notes, or either of them, in controversy, until after the said judgment was rendered thereon against Smith & Bro., which has not been reversed or in any way impaired, the alleged cause of action as to Harman was and is merged in and extinguished by that judgment.

For the reasons stated, the judgment complained of is affirmed.

UHL v. OHIO RIVER R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 13, 1904.)

WATER COURSES—OVERFLOW—RAILROADS—DEFECTIVE CULVERTS—VERDICT—FAILURE TO OBJECT.

1. Overflow waters of a natural stream in times of ordinary flood or freshet, flowing over or standing upon the adjacent lowlands do not cease to be part of the stream, unless and until separated therefrom so as to prevent their return to its channel.

2. Failure of a railroad company to make culverts in an embankment constructed by it for its roadbed, on lands subject to such overflow, of sufficient size to permit the water behind the embankment to rise and fall as fast as the stream does, is negligent and unskillful construction, making the company liable in damages for resulting injury.

3. When no objection, by motion to set aside or otherwise, has been made, in the trial court, to a verdict rendered, subject to the action of the court upon a demurrer to the evidence, it cannot be disturbed in the appellate court on the ground of excessiveness or paucity of damages.

Error to Circuit Court, Wood County; L. N. Tavenner, Judge.

Action by Winnie Uhl against the Ohio River Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. W. Vandervort and Van Winkle & Ambler, for plaintiff in error. V. B. Archer and Wm. Beard, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, P. This case calls upon the court to say whether injury to real estate resulting from interference with the overflowing waters of a navigable river, at a point outside of its banks, by means of an embankment, gives a right of action for damages. There is practically no controversy as to the facts, and in all material respects the question is one of law. The defense is predicated mainly upon three propositions: First, that such waters are deemed to be surface waters; second, that, even if, by the common law, such waters, in England, constitute part of the river, the rivers of this country, by reason of their size and character as great navigable bodies, would, on the general principles of that law, be excepted from the rule, and classed with the waters of the sea; third, that the overflow was the result of an extraordinary rise in the river, the consequences of which the defendant was not bound to anticipate or provide for in the construction of its embankment.

Winnie Uhl was the owner of a lot situated in the town of Williamstown, on the Ohio river, with a frontage of 37 feet on a street running practically parallel with the river, and lying between the lot and the river. From the street the lot falls away into a depression, in the lowest part of which there is a small channel, in which, during part or all of the time, there is a stream of water, fed by springs, which carries, in addition to the water from the springs, the surface water from the basin. Passing on below the limits of plaintiff's property this depression reaches the river at some point not far distant. The defendant located its railroad on the street in front of plaintiff's property, and, passing on down the river, crossed the depression a short distance below it. In the construction of its road the defendant threw up an embankment in the street in front of plaintiff's property, the top of which is three feet above the level of the lot, and maintained it at about the same height to a point beyond the depression. At the crossing of the drain, the elevation is 10 to 15 feet, and at that point a small opening is made in the fill, called a "culvert." The culvert is three feet square on one side and eighteen inches by two feet on the other. It is sufficient to carry the waters accumulating in the drain from the springs and from the surface, but insufficient to let in the waters from the river, when rising, fast enough to make the rise in the basin keep pace with that of the waters of the river, and to allow the waters in the basin to subside, when the river is falling, as fast as the river goes down. In the flood of 1898 this resulted in the injury complained of. The river rose rapidly, and attained a very high stage. When the river reached the top of the railroad company's embankment, the water in the basin had not attained that height by about seven feet, according to the testimony of witnesses, and the waters from the river flowed over the embankment, and fell upon the plaintiff's premises, tearing up and washing away the soil, undermining the foundation of buildings, flooding a cellar, loosening from its anchorage a frame building called a "cooper shop," containing tools, materials, and barrels, and causing the same to float, and finally to be carried away. When the river subsided, the outflow of the waters in the basin was so impeded by the embankment, with its insufficient culvert, that water remained upon the lot much longer than it would have done but for the interference of the embankment.

In order that the discussion of the main proposition may be unembarrassed by any consideration of the rules of pleading, the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration will be passed for the present.

The space taken up in the briefs with the discussion of the distinction between the principles of the common law and the Roman civil law governing the rights of parties in respect to surface waters and of the decisions in those states which have adopted the principles of the civil law on that subject serves the purpose of a caution to the court to observe that distinction in attempting to analyze the cases as reported, and deduce from them rules and principles applicable to the questions here presented.

In Neal v. Railroad Co., 47 W. Va. 316, 34 S. E. 914; Jordan v. Benwood, 42 W. Va. 312, 26 S. E. 266, 36 L. R. A. 519, 57 Am. St. Rep. 859, and other cases, this court declares the common-law rule on the subject of surface waters to be the law of this state. By that law the owner of property may consume the surface water of his premises, or obstruct or divert the flow of it, without incurring any liability to his neighbor, whether above or below him, although he may be injured by the act; provided that the interference does not amount to a collecting of the surface water on his own land into a body and discharging it as such upon his neighbor's premises. See Gillison v. Charleston, 16 W. Va. 283, 37 Am. Rep. 763; Knight v. Brown, 25 W. Va. 808; Railroad Co. v. Carter, 91 Va. 587, 22 S. E. 517; Gould on Waters, § 271; Field v. Inhabitants, 36 N. J. Eq. 118. Neither the decided cases nor the text-books point out any material distinction between the two systems of law respecting the rights of riparian owners as regards natural water courses. Hence, if the waters of a river which spread over the adjacent lowlands in times of freshets and floods are not surface waters within the meaning of the common law, as to which only that law departs from the principles of the civil law, but remain part of the stream, there is no basis in reason or law for any conflict in the decisions respecting the rights of riparian owners as to property affected by such water. As the Roman civil law makes no distinction between the waters of natural streams and surface waters, it is reasonable to assume that the courts of those states which have adopted it would be uninfluenced in classifying waters, and determining what are and what are not surface waters, by any insensible bias or prejudice, such as might induce courts of the other states to include in surface waters what does not properly belong to that class. But, as the distinction is usually comparatively unimportant in those courts, it may be assumed that they have not bestowed upon the subject as much care and labor as have the courts that observe the other rule. Making due allowance for all this, we are disposed to avail ourselves of such light on the question as those decisions may afford.

In Ohio the civil law is followed. Butler v. Peck, 16 Ohio St. 334, 88 Am. Dec. 452; Tootle v. Clifton, 22 Ohio St. 247, 10 Am. Rep. 732. The Supreme Court of that state, in Crawford v. Rambo, 44 Ohio St. 279, 7 N. E. 429, declines to consider overflowing waters of a river as surface water. In the opinion, at page 282, 44 Ohio St., and page 431, 7 N. E., Minshall, J., says: "It is difficult to see upon what principle the flood waters of a river can be likened to surface water. When it is said that a river is out of its banks, no more is implied than that its volume then exceeds what it ordinarily is. Whether high or low, the entire volume at any one time constitutes the water of the river at such time; and the land over which its current flows must be regarded as its channel, so that when, swollen by rains and melting snows, it extends and flows over the bottoms along its course, that is its flood channel, as when, by droughts, it is reduced to its minimum, it is then in its low-water channel. Surface water is that which is diffused over the surface of the ground, derived from falling rains and melting snows, and continues to be such until it reaches some well-defined channel in which it is accustomed to and does flow with other waters, whether derived from the surface or springs; and it then becomes the running water of a stream, and ceases to be surface water."

Georgia is classed as a state in which the rule of the civil law is adhered to, though the court has made no express declaration to that effect; and in O'Connell v. Railway Co., 87 Ga. 246, 13 S. E. 489, 13 L. R. A. 394, 27 Am. St. Rep. 246, Lumpkin, J., in an able opinion, expressly repudiates the theory that such waters are surface waters within the meaning of either the civil or the common law, and the decision of the case rests upon that ground. In the opinion, at page 253, 87 Ga., and page 491, 13 S. E., 13 L. R. A. 394, 27 Am. St. Rep. 246, it is said: "The surplus waters do not cease to be part of the river when they spread over the adjacent low grounds, without well-defined banks or channel, so long as they form with it one body of water eventually to be discharged through the channel proper."

In Missouri the common law was at one time rejected in so far as it relates to surface waters, and afterwards adopted. In McCormick v. Railroad Co., 57 Mo. 433, and Shane v. Railroad Co., 71 Mo. 237, 36 Am. Rep. 480, it was held that an owner of land could not stop the natural flow of surface water, or divert its course so as to throw it upon the land of his neighbor. In the latter case the court held that "overflowing water from a river in time of flood is surface water within the meaning of this rule." The decision was by a divided court, and the opinion somewhat inconsistent, as declared in the case next to be noticed. The principle of these two cases was discarded in Abbott v. Railroad Co., 83 Mo. 271, 53 Am. Rep. 581. This was a case of obstruction to a natural water course by the erection of a bridge, but the second count in the petition charged an interference with the surface waters "which fell and ran down from higher ground," and the case did not concern the overflow of the river.

The Minnesota court, up to 1888, did not seem to have taken any position with reference to the two systems of law, and in Byrne v. Railroad Co., 38 Minn. 212, 36 N. W. 339, 8 Am. St. Rep. 668, it is expressly held that: "The water which in times of ordinary high water overflows the banks of a stream, and is accustomed to flow down over the adjacent lowlands in a defined stream, is subject to the law relating to water courses, rather than to that of surface water." This implies a leaning toward the common-law rule, otherwise it would be unnecessary to note any distinction between the two kinds of water. In Oregon the court, without considering the doctrine of dominant and servient heritage of the civil law respecting surface water, held that: "A stream does not cease to be a water course and become mere surface water because at certain points it spreads over a level meadow several rods in width, and flows for a distance without defined banks before flowing again in a definite channel." West v. Taylor, 16 Or. 165, 13 Pac. 665.

In Iowa the court seems to lean toward the rule of the civil law, and in Sullens v. Railroad Co., 74 Iowa, 659, 38 N. W. 545, 7 Am. St. Rep. 501, it is held that where, by building an embankment across a wide creek bottom, a railroad company caused the surface water of the bottom to flow into the channel, and then to leave it far above the culvert, and flow over plaintiff's land, and then be turned back into the channel again above the culvert, the water was no longer to be considered surface water. This seems to have been nothing more than an interference with a natural water course. The embankment and culvert caused the creek to leave its course and spread over the land, and then go back into its course. Hence the decision has very little bearing on this question. In Moore v. Railway Co., 75 Iowa, 263, 39 N. W. 390, the court decides that water which, in the time of a freshet, leaves the channel of a stream, and spreads over the bottom land, and is forced back into the channel again by a railroad embankment built across its course, is not to be regarded as surface water in considering the sufficiency of the culvert constructed in the embankment. This seems to be another case of mere obstruction to a natural water course.

Coming now to the decisions of courts which apply the principles of the common law in determining the rights respecting surface water, we find that in Indiana it has been held in more than one case that the waters of a river spreading over depressions in the land in the time of a flood are held to be surface water. Turnpike Co. v. Green, 99 Ind. 205; Railroad Co. v. Stevens, 73 Ind. 278, 38 Am. Rep. 139.

In New York, the surplus water of a stream when flooded is undoubtedly regarded as a part of the stream. Thus, in Wallace v. Drew, 59 Barb. 413, it is held that: "It is well settled that every person through whose land a stream of water flows may construct embankments and other guards on the bank to prevent the stream washing the bank away and overflowing and injuring his land. But in doing this he must be careful so to construct them as not to throw the water upon his neighbor's lands, where it would not otherwise go in ordinary floods; otherwise he will be liable for the injury. But this rule does not apply to floods altogether extraordinary and unusual." This proposition was adopted from Angell on Water Courses, § 334, and that work adopts it from Rex v. Trafford, 1 B. & Ad. 874, a case to be noticed later on.

Though not exactly in point, Burwell v. Hobson, 12 Grat. 322, 65 Am. Dec. 247, is said to bear upon the question, and tends strongly to uphold the view that flood waters are to be considered a part of the stream. The syllabus reads as follows: "H., owning lands on both sides of a creek which frequently overflowed its banks, built a dike along the south side of it, to protect his low grounds on that side of the creek; and this caused the creek to overflow the land on the north side still more. At his death his lands were divided by commissioners, who allotted to one of his children the land on the south side of the creek, and to another (W.) the land on the north side; and in their report they made no allusion to the dike. The son receiving the land on the south side of the creek afterwards sold it to B., and then W., owning the land on the north side, commenced to build a dike on that side, to protect his lands, which would have the effect to destroy the dike built by H. and overflow the low grounds on the south side. B. then filed a bill to enjoin the building of the dike on the north side. Held: (1) B. is entitled to have his dike as it was when H. died, and to have his lands protected thereby; and W. has no right to build a dike on his side of the creek, which would destroy the dike of B. and overflow his low grounds. (2) Equity will interfere to prevent the building of the dike, and will compel W. to abate so much of his dike already built as would injure the dike and low grounds of B." This case follows the principle laid down in Angell on Water Courses, just referred to, and is based upon the English decisions. It is urged that the embankment made by the ancestor was not for the purpose of controlling the flow of the water when the stream was within its banks, but only to protect certain land when it overflowed its banks. By this dike he had thrown the water to one side of the stream, and left the land on that side to his son, subject to the burden of the surplus water. While owner of the entire tract, the ancestor had altered the course of the stream on his own premises, as he had a clear legal right to do (Gould, Wat. § 213), but after the division of the estate neither of the several owners could so interfere with the stream as to injure the other. When, by the counter dike, the superabundant waters of the flood stage were confined within the channel, kept off the land, and caused to overflow land on the opposite side, the court declared the act to be an actionable obstruction of the stream, and not a mere rightful repulsion of surface water.

The claim of analogy between the case of Burwell v. Hobson and the case now in hand seems to be sustained by the views of Judge Moncre in applying to that case the principle declared in Rex v. Trafford, 20 Eng. C. L. 498, in which the overflowing waters of a stream formed the subject-matter of the controversy. Embankments, called "fenders," had been erected by the owners of lands bordering on a stream to prevent it from overflowing their lands in times of freshets and floods. These embankments were increased in height from time to time and finally resulted in throwing such a large body of water into the channel of a river into which the brook emptied that it endangered certain canal banks and aqueduct and obstructed navigation in the canal. Neither the aqueduct nor the canal banks was in any degree the cause of the overflow. It had occurred before the erection of the canal, and in times beyond the memory of man. Arches had been made in the aqueduct at points distant from the river to permit this overflowing water to pass through it. Upon the special verdict showing all the facts, the court of King's Bench held: "That the defendants were not justified, under these circumstances, in altering for their own benefit the course in which the flood water had been accustomed to run; that there was no difference in this respect between flood water and an ordinary stream." In the opinion Lord Tenterden, C. J., said: "The consequence of a judgment requiring the fenders to be reduced may be the production of much mischief in times of flood, not only to the lands of the defendants, but also to a considerable tract of country, unless some other method can be found of carrying off the flood water. But this consequence cannot be properly attributed to the erection of the canal as any blame either in its projectors or present proprietors. On the contrary, it distinctly appears that at the formation of the canal a sufficient provision was made for carrying off the flood water in the course which it had previously taken by the erection of the three arches; and these arches would continue to be sufficient, notwithstanding any increase of water by the improved drainage of the country above, if the ancient course and outlet of the flood water had not been obstructed by the erection of the fenders. Now, it has long been established that the ordinary course of water cannot be lawfully changed or obstructed for the benefit of one class of persons to the injury of another. Unless, therefore, a sound distinction can be made between the ordinary course of water flowing in a bounded channel at all usual seasons and the extraordinary course which its superabundant quantity has been accustomed to take at particular seasons, the creation and continuance of these fenders cannot be justified. No case was cited, or has been found, that will support such a distinction." In Burwell v. Hobson, Judge Moncre says the King's Bench judgment in Rex v. Traford was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber, "but that court agreed in the principle laid down by the court of King's Bench, though it did not discover upon the special verdict a finding of sufficient facts to warrant its application to the case."

Lawrence v. Railroad Co., 71 Eng. C. L. 643, deals expressly with the subject of flood waters as affected by a railroad embankment. The facts were such as to make it identical in principle with the case now in hand. They are stated by Patteson, J., as follows: "The plaintiff, * * * brings this action for an injury to his land by its being flooded, as he alleges, by the fault of defendants in constructing their railway across the lands of other persons without leaving sufficient openings for the passage of flood water, whereby they were obstructed and penned up and forced upon the lands of the plaintiff." In the opinion he says: "The railway passes across the lowlands adjoining the river Dun, over which the flood waters of that river used to spread themselves. Those lowlands were separated from the plaintiff's land by a bank constructed under certain drainage acts, and which protected the plaintiff's lands from floods. By the construction of the defendants' railway without sufficient openings those flood waters could not spread themselves as formerly, and were penned up, and flowed over the bank on the plaintiff's land. Prima facie, this would give the plaintiff a cause of action; and the question is whether the company are protected by their act." The court held: "That, although the company were not required by their act to make flood openings to their embankment, and would not be compellable by mandamus to make them, yet, as they might, by proper caution, have prevented the injury sustained by the plaintiff, an action on the case was maintainable against them for such injury." This means that the act of constructing the embankment was not wrongful, because the act of Parliament had authorized it, just as we hold now that the construction of a work of internal improvement authorized by law cannot be enjoined or controlled by the court, but that the company constructing such works is answerable to the landowner for such damages as may result to him, and particularly for damages resulting from negligent or unskillful construction of the work. Arbenz v. Wheeling, etc., Co., 33 W. Va. 1. 10 S. E. 14, 5 L. R. A. 371; Mason v. Bridge Co., 17 W. Va. 396; Spencer v. Railroad Co., 23 W. Va. 406. By saying that prima facie this would give the plaintiff a cause of action, the judge meant that, if the construction of the railroad had not been a public work, authorized by law, it would have been wrongful, and the embankment might have been abated as a nuisance.

These English decisions must be accepted as being declaratory of the common law. They were adopted and approved as correctly announcing the law by the Virginia court prior to the division of the state. The interpretation put upon them by that court must be accorded great weight here, because the Virginia decisions rendered prior to the division of the state are as binding upon this court as its own decisions. The two cases above referred to deal with the flood water of streams, and apply the same principles to it that are applied by the common law to natural water courses themselves. They utterly preclude the assumption that such waters are surface waters, and class them with the waters of natural streams.

In some of the American cases in which ordinary flood waters are held to be waters of the stream, stress seems to be laid upon the fact that the flood waters maintain a current, and do not stand upon the ground as backwater, motionless as a pool. Lawrence v. Railway Co. seems clearly not to recognize any such distinction, for in the course of the opinion it is said the flood waters of the river used to spread themselves over the lowlands, just as they do in this country, and that, by the construction of the railway embankment, they were prevented from spreading themselves as they had formerly done, and flowed over the bank onto plaintiff's lands. This imports that by the railroad embankments the waters were confined to smaller limits, and thereby raised to a higher level, so that they overflowed the bank, which had formerly been of sufficient height to protect plaintiff's land. At any rate, they are not referred to as waters flowing over the land outside of the banks of the river and maintaining a current.

The Indiana decisions are clearly at variance with the application of the principles of the common law made by the English cases. They recognize nothing as overflowing river water unless it flows practically all the time. Such waters as are alluded to in Lawrence v. Railway Co. and Rex v. Trafford as flood waters flowing beyond the limits of the stream are classed as surface waters, although they maintain a current over the land. Thus, in Taylor v. Fickas, 64 Ind. 167, 31 Am. Rep. 114, the court, in its opinion, at pages 172 and 173, 64 Ind., 31 Am. Rep. 114, says: "In the complaint before us there is no averment of any water course, except, indeed, by way of parenthesis, that the place, during floods, is a part of the Ohio river; but the facts averred clearly show that it is not upon the bed of the river, nor within its channel, nor between its banks; in short, that it is no part of a water course, but that the flow is over the entire surface of the land, is occasioned by temporary causes, and is not usually there. The rights of the appellee therefore are such as a proprietor may have in surface water, which, as we have seen, is a part of his land; and the injuries or inconveniences which the appellant is alleged to have suffered are such as arise from the changes, accidents, and vicissitudes of natural causes." The reason for this departure is found in the nature and situation of the lands of that state, for in the same case—which is referred to in subsequent cases as a leading case in that state—the court says: "The doctrine contended for by the appellant, applied to the vast alluvial regions—so generally level, subject to occasional inundations—bordering upon the Ohio river, and lying along other rivers and large streams within this state, would very much embarrass agricultural and general improvement by preventing proprietors of lands from securing their fences by planting trees or other permanent methods, and in some instances, perhaps, render large portions of our richest soil useless. While the owners of lands may not obstruct water courses to the injury of others, they must be permitted to fence and cultivate their fields and improve their lands in the way which best subserves their interests, without being responsible for the accidents of floods or the shiftings of surface water occasioned thereby, although sometimes slight and temporary injuries may result therefrom to adjoining owners. These are accidents, which must be borne alike by all." This sounds very much like a declaration of state policy, designed to facilitate the cultivation of vast areas of low and swampy lands, subject to frequent overflow, in the interest of the general welfare of the people of those sections of that country and of the whole state; but the situation may fully justify it as a necessary modification.

Though the flow or current of a water course is one of its pronounced characteristics, it is at variance with common knowledge and reason to say that only such water of a stream as is perceptibly moving may be considered a part of it. When one stream, uniting with another, obstructs its flow by reason of its running bank full, while the other is low, and causes such other stream to be filled with back water, can it be said that, so long as the backwater stands, it is only surface water? Are all the motionless pools within the banks of a river, produced by the windings of its channel and current, to be called surface water? Nobody has ever ventured such an unreasonable suggestion. If it be conceded that the running waters of an overflowing river on the lowlands outside of its banks do not cease to be part of the river—as clearly they do not—what reason can be assigned for a distinction outside of the banks which cannot exist within them? The standing waters are supported and maintained by the great body of water forming the river. From bank to bank, surface to bed, within the banks and beyond them, as far as the water stands or flows, all the atoms or parts are, for their positions, interdependent and inseparably united save when absolutely severed. If, from the lowest point in the bed a large quantity should be removed, a subsidence of the entire surface would result, each particle finding a lower level by the law of gravitation. That part of the water which flows is simply seeking what the standing water has already found, its level. By nature, it is all one body, until severed in some way, and the law suggests no reason or principle upon which what clearly is not severed can be deemed to have been cut off.

No doubt such water often becomes so separated from the river as to justify its classification as surface water. On the lowlands along our rivers there are depressions having no outlets to the river or elsewhere, and in which, when filled, the water must stand until it passes away by evaporation through the air and percolation through the soil. These are filled by overflow in times of flood, and upon the recession of the river are left full of water. This overflow water is thereby effectually severed from the waters of the river, and no doubt becomes, under the decisions, surface water.

The suggestion that the rules governing the rights of riparian owners in respect to our great rivers should be different from those applicable to the small English streams is a novel one, not expressed by any of the decided cases. Shall they be likened unto the high seas merely because our public policy has classed them as navigable waters beyond the limits of tide water, while the English streams are not, and because we deny to riparian owners any exclusive right to the bed or shores, inconsistent with the public right of navigation, as a matter of public necessity and convenience in the interest of commerce and the public welfare? If we did so, we would do it for a reason other than that assigned as justification for embanking against the waters of the sea, namely, that their breaking in upon the land is due to unknown causes, and cannot be anticipated. They suddenly come where they have never before been known to occur, and may never be repeated, unlike the floods of inland streams, recurring year after year in obedience to well-known natural laws and causes. Everybody is bound to take notice of them, and as to them no man can be heard to set up his ignorance. The public nature of our natural streams argues the exact contrary of the proposition suggested. Neither by embankment nor other structure can a riparian owner obstruct or alter them to the injury of the public. The sea may be fenced out to the utmost extent of man's ability, and there will still remain ample room for the world's commerce; but a very small obstruction may seriously impair the usefulness of a great river.

The tremendous extent and weight of the overflow of our great rivers makes it all the more necessary to adhere to common-law principles. A diversion of the course of these irresistible bodies of water results in great injury and possible disaster. It is only because of their comparative alightness in quantity and incapacity to do injury that the law allows the owner of land to do as he pleases with the surface waters on them, or that would come upon them. When he collects and forms them into a body, and thus makes them injurious and hurtful, the law prohibits him from turning them upon his neighbor. The clearing away of the forests, by reason of which the streams rise higher and more quickly than when the fallen leaves, moss, and muck held back the waters in the forests, and the draining of the swamps and low lands, only emphasize this view. Of all these changes persons dealing with the waters of the river must be deemed to have notice, too.

For the foregoing reasons we conclude that the overflow water of a river at times of ordinary flood, whether standing motionless on the adjacent land or sweeping over it, do not cease to be part of the river, unless so separated from it as to prevent its return. From this it follows that by preventing the gradual rise of the water over plaintiff's lot by damming it and raising its level so as to cast it down in the form of a cataract or waterfall upon her grounds, and thus causing injury which would not otherwise have occurred, is such an interference with the stream as, by the common law, gives a right of action; and the same legal result arises from the prevention of the outflow of the water from the basin, in consequence of which it remained upon the land longer than otherwise it would have remained there, unless the flood was extraordinary, an act of God. A larger culvert would have rendered the embankment uninjurious to plaintiff's property in these respects, and the failure to make it of sufficient size to carry the water is negligent construction. Though the defendant could lawfully build the embankment, in doing so it was bound to use the engineering knowledge and skill ordinarily applied in the erection of such works. It must be carefully and skillfully done. Taylor v. Railroad Co., 33 W. Va. 39, 10 S. E. 29. Whether a flood is extraordinary is generally, though not always, it seems, a question of fact for the jury. Railway Co. v. Gilleland, 56 Pa. 445, 94 Am. Dec. 98; Brown v. Railway Co. (Pa.) 38 Atl. 401. If, therefore, the evidence is such as would warrant a finding that the flood in question was not extraordinary, the demurrer to the evidence cannot be sustained on the theory that it was extraordinary as the demurree is entitled to the benefit of all inferences of fact that may be fairly deduced from the evidence. Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 345; Gunn v. Railroad Co., 42 W. Va. 676, 28 S. E. 546, 36 L. R. A. 575; Mapel v. John, 42 W. Va. 30, 24 S. E. 608, 32 L. R. A. 800, 57 Am. St. Rep. 839. According to the evidence the river is subject to frequent rises of varying height and rapidity. That of 1884 was higher than that of 1898. The water had been on a level with the street 10 or 12 times in a period of 50 years. One witness says that of 1898 was an unusual flood, but a jury would not be bound to accept his opinion. The facts attending the rise in question were not shown to have been without precedent as in all cases in which great floods have been classed as acts of God, such as the Johnstown Flood (Long v.

Railroad Co., 147 Pa. 343, 23 Atl. 459, 14 L. R. A. 741, 30 Am. St. Rep. 732; Wald v. Railroad Co. [Ill.] 44 N. E. 888, 85 L. R. A. 356, 53 Am. St. Rep. 332; the flood of 1852 in the Congaree river, the greatest freshet ever known in that country (Lipford v. Railroad Co., 7 Rich. Law [S. C.] 409), or that which submerged Chattanooga in 1867, and broke up all roads leading into it, and as to which the proof showed "beyond question that such a flood had never occurred" at that place "within the memory of man; the old inhabitants who had witnessed other remarkable overflows since 1826, never having seen such a one" (Railroad Co. v. David, 6 Helsk. [Tenn.] 261, 19 Am. Rep. 594). The evidence shows variableness and irregularity in the rises to which the river is subject, and one much higher than that of 1898 had occurred just about the time the road was built. Unlike the ocean tides, freshets and floods in streams are governed by no fixed rules as to volume or the time in the which it gathers, and the facts disclosed by the evidence are not such as would call upon a jury to pronounce the flood extraordinary in character.

Practically all that is urged upon the demurrer to the declaration, not disposed of by the general principles already discussed, is that the declaration does not aver that the defendant constructed the embankment, nor the height attained by the water, and the rapidity with which it rose. The amended declaration does aver the building of the embankment by the defendant, and no principle of pleading requiring so much of detail as is suggested by the other objection is referred to. A declaration need not set out evidential facts.

The jury fixed the damages at $362, of which $337 is for the cooper shop and contents washed away and $25 for injury to the surface of the lot. No objection to this finding was made in the trial court by motion to set the verdict aside or otherwise, but the plaintiff in error now insists that the judgment should be reversed because the embankment did not cause the loss of the cooper shop with its contents, the water having been so deep it would have floated away anyhow, and because some of the tools and materials in it were the property of plaintiff's husband, he having purchased them. This is an exception to the action of the jury in assessing the damages, which cannot be made in the appellate court. Only the rulings of the trial court may be reviewed here. Upon the demurrer we can only say whether the evidence sustains plaintiff's right to the damages, for that is all the lower court considered. It was not requested to rule upon the correctness of the finding of the jury as to the quantum of damages. Its action is a prerequisite to the exercise of any jurisdiction by this court. Riddle v. Core, 21 W. Va. 530; State v. Phares, 24 W. Va. 657; Brown v. Brown, 29 W. Va. 777, 2 S. E. 808; Proudfoot v. Clevenger, 33 W. Va. 267, 10 S. E.

Seeing no error in the judgment, we must affirm it.

RICHARDS v. OHIO RIVER R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 20, 1904.)

RAILROADS — NEGLIGENT MAINTENANCE — ACTION FOR NUISANCE.

1. One who purchases a lot near an existing railroad, and sustains damages from its negligent construction and maintenance, is not barred of recovery of damage by reason of the fact that the railroad had already been constructed before his purchase.

2. Action by one coming to a nuisance for damage from it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Wood County; L. N. Tavenner, Judge.

Action by A. S. Richards against the Ohio River Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. W. Vandervort and Van Winkle & Ambler, for plaintiff in error. V. B. Archer and Wm. Beard, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. A. S. Richards brought an action against the Ohio River Railroad Company to recover damages to a house and lot in Williamstown from flood water of the Ohio river, charging that the negligence of the company consisted in making an embankment for its road in a street in front of his house, and failing to make a culvert under its road of sufficient capacity to allow the flood water to rise equally on both sides of the embankment, causing the water to dam up against the embankment and flow over and down from it with heavy fall upon the lot, and barring the outlet of the water accumulated in a depression between the embankment and the hill in the subsidence of the flood equally with the subsidence of the water of the river, causing the water to stand longer on the lot than it would were the culvert larger. There was a judgment on demurrer to evidence for the plaintiff. The case is similar to the case of Uhl v. Ohio River Railroad Company (decided this term) 49 S. E. 378. I do not think it necessary, for the law governing the case, to write an opinion, as the law is amply laid down in the opinion by Judge Poffenbarger in that case.

There is a feature of this case different from the Uhl Case. In this case Richards purchased his property after the railroad had been constructed. This is merely mentioned, but not relied upon as a defense. No authority is cited upon it. It is not supposed the duty of the company to put in a proper passage for water was passed from Richards' grantor to him; but the duty continued, from year to year, as between the company and any one owning the lot, it being no less the duty of the company to protect Richards, though he bought after the construction of the railroad, than it had been to one owning the lot before and after such construction. As the construction and maintenance of the railroad was pursuant to law, we cannot say that its presence was per se a nuisance, but its negligent construction and maintenance was a private nuisance in nature as to Richards—the same, in effect, as to him, as if unauthorized, because of negligence. The authority did not authorize negligence. It is a private nuisance in such case. Jaggard on Torts, 788; Taylor v. Railroad, 33 W. Va. 39, 10 S. E. 29. He had right to assume that the duty would be performed, and was not in any way bound to refrain from buying a residence there because the railroad was already there. If one comes to a nuisance, that does not debar him in legal proceedings for harm from it or to restrain it. 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 691; 2 Jaggard on Torts, § 236, p. 774; 1 Wood on Nuisances, §§ 76, 802. The same principle applies in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

STOCKTON et al. v. CRAIG et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

TAXATION—LANDBOOKS—POWER OF ASSESSOR AND CLERK OF COUNTY—TAX DEED—PAYMENT OF VOID TAXES—CLOUD ON TITLE.

1. Section 10, c. 54, p. 83, Acts 1875, as amended and re-enacted by section 10, c. 73, p. 104, Acts 1879, as amended and re-enacted by section 10, c. 12, p. 115, Acts 1881, and now in force as section 10, c. 29, Code 1899, authorize the assessor or the clerk of the county court to restore to the landbooks, at the instance of the owner, any lands omitted therefrom by reason of a sale to the state for delinquent taxes, if such sale is for any cause illegal and invalid, within five years from the time such lands are omitted from such books; and the failure of the owner to have such lands so restored to the proper books within such time subjects them to forfeiture under section 6, art. 13, Const., and section 39, c. 31, Code 1899.

2. A suit to cancel alleged fraudulent and void decrees and deeds as a cloud upon title to land cannot be maintained by those having no present interest in or title to such land, either legal or equitable.

3. The payment of taxes by adverse claimants of land under fraudulent and void tax decrees and tax deeds does not inure to the benefit of the delinquent owner, so as to prevent the forfeiture of his title for nonentry on the landbooks.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nicholas County; W. G. Bennett, Judge.

Bill by Charles Stockton and others against James S. Craig and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

E. B. Dyer and Price, Smith & Spilman, for appellants. Alderson & Horan and Brown, Jackson & Knight, for appellees.

DENT, J. Charles Stockton and others, claiming to be the heirs at law and legal representatives of Aaron Stockton, John B. Clopton, Wm. E. Clopton, Zachariah Lewis, and Sarah Ann E. Foster, appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Nicholas county dismissing a bill of review filed by them for errors of law in a certain suit in chancery in said court finally determined, wherein they were plaintiffs, and James S. Craig and others were defendants. The two errors relied on are, first, that the court decided the original suit contrary to law; second, that the court refused to continue the case to permit the plaintiffs to take depositions. If the circuit court was right as to the first proposition, the second becomes wholly unimportant. The undisputed facts are as follows:

"By three several patents, all bearing date on the 30th day of August, 1845, the commonwealth of Virginia granted to Aaron Stockton, John B. Clopton, Wm. E. Clopton, Zachariah Lewis, and Sarah Ann E. Foster three several tracts of land, containing 1,183¼ acres, each, situate in Nicholas county. The said three tracts of land were entered on the landbooks of said county in the names of said patentees in the year 1846, and remained so charged for each and all the years from that date until the year 1881, except for the year 1853, for which year they were omitted from said books, but in the year 1854 were again re-entered and charged to said parties on said books, with the memorandum, 'Re-entered by Auditor's receipt produced,' and all the taxes for said years, to wit, from 1846 to 1861, were paid by said patentees. There are no landbooks for the county of Nicholas, either in the county clerk's office of said county, or in the auditor's office, for the years 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864. For the year 1865 said three tracts of land were charged on said landbooks in the names of said patentees, and remained so charged for the years 1866, 1867, and 1868. For the years 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, the said three tracts were omitted from said landbooks. In the year 1873 these said three tracts of land were all again entered on the said books in the names of the patentees, and charged with the back taxes for nine years, and said three tracts of land remained so charged upon the said landbooks in said names for the years 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, and one of said tracts for the years of 1878 and 1879. For the year 1874 said three tracts of land were returned delinquent, and were certified by the auditor to the sheriff of Nicholas for sale in 1875, but were redeemed from said sheriff before the sale by the payment of the taxes for the year 1873, and the back taxes for the nine years prior thereto, and the taxes for the year 1874.

"John M. Hutchinson, commissioner of school lands in said Nicholas county, filed his petition in the circuit court of said county on the 9th day of August, 1875, in which he set out the granting of these three tracts of land, of 1,183 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres each, by the commonwealth of Virginia, as aforesaid, and averred in said petition that said tracts of land were transferred to the said grantees, and regularly charged with the taxes chargeable thereon, first on the landbooks of Nicholas county for the year 1846, and regularly for succeeding years, down to and including the year 1866, but that the assessors' landbook for the year 1867 does not show any charge or assessments of taxes on the first of the said tracts of land, and that said tract was dropped from said books, and has not been charged with the taxes thereon for any year or years since the said year 1866, and that the others of the said tracts of land were charged on said books up to and including the year 1868, and that the said two tracts of land were dropped from the landbooks of the said county for the year 1869, and are not charged with any taxes thereon for any year since that time. The said petition further falsely stated, as is apparent on the face of the record, and beyond all contradiction, that said three tracts of land were sold and purchased on behalf of the state of West Virginia in the years 1850, 1856, and 1860, and were never redeemed from said sales. The certificates of the auditor and of the clerk of the county court, exhibited with the bill and the answers, show beyond controversy that said allegations of the petition were false and altogether without foundation, and that there never was any sale of said three tracts of land, or any of them, to the state of Virginia. The petition further falsely alleged 'that for five successive years after the year 1869, to wit, for the years 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, the owners of the three tracts of land have not been charged with any state or other tax thereon, nor has any state tax been charged on either of said tracts, for any one or more of said years on any part of said land on the landbooks of Nicholas county aforesaid; that the said three tracts of land are forfeited to the state of Virginia, and are now forfeited to the state of West Virginia, and are therefore liable to be sold for the benefit of the school fund.' As before stated, these three tracts of land had all been re-entered on said landbooks in the year 1873, and charged with the back taxes, and were again charged on said books for the year 1874; and this fact must have been, and was, well known to the defendant James S. Craig, who has been the recorder of said county. It is further shown by the record that this petition of John M. Hutchinson is in the handwriting of the defendant James S. Craig, and it is charged in the bill that said Craig fraudulently entered into a combination or conspiracy with the said Hutchinson for the purpose of having the lands sold, in order that he, the said Craig, might become the purchaser thereof, and thus defraud the true owners, and that he and the said Hutchinson knowingly and falsely misstated the facts in regard to the assessment aforesaid in order that by imposition upon the court a decree of sale might be obtained.

"On the same day on which this petition was filed, to wit, on the 9th day of August, 1875, an order was entered by the said circuit court directing said Hutchinson, school commissioner, to make sale of said three tracts of land, with direction to have same surveyed before such sale. It further appears from the record that said Hutchinson at once advertised said lands to be sold on the 12th day of October, 1875, at which sale the defendant, James S. Craig, became the purchaser of lot No. 6, of 200 acres, lot No. 7, of 267 acres, lot No. 8, of 186 acres, lot No. 10, of 111 acres, lot No. 11, of 650 acres, lot No. 15, of 400 acres, lot No. 16, of 500 acres, at the aggregate price of \$156.50; and that Joseph Rader, assignee of M. L. Rader, became the purchaser of lot No. 1, of 261 acres, lot No. 2, of 130 acres, lot No. 3, of 146 acres, at the aggregate price of \$124.50; and that Joseph Rader and A. F. Rader became the purchasers of lot No. 4, of 218 acres, lot No. 5, of 130 acres, at the aggregate price of \$127.50; and that A. F. Rader became the purchaser of lot No. 12, of 180 acres, lot No. 13, of 225 acres, and lot No. 14, of 137 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres, at the aggregate price of \$35.28. By a decree entered on the 7th day of August, 1876, the report of said sales and said sales were confirmed, and said commissioner directed to execute deeds to the purchasers for the lots purchased by them, respectively, upon the payment of the whole of the purchase money. By deed dated the 13th day of March, 1877, said John M. Hutchinson, commissioner of school lands, conveyed to the defendants James S. Craig and John S. Conner (it being stated in said deed that Craig had assigned to said Conner half of the lands purchased by him) the lots of land out of these three tracts, of 1,183 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres each, purchased by said Craig as aforesaid, with the statement in said deed that said three tracts of land had become forfeited and delinquent to the state. By deed dated the 5th day of January, 1891, James S. Craig, describing himself as former commissioner of school lands, conveyed to the defendant M. L. Rader the whole of lots Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and the undivided one-half of lots Nos. 4 and 5; the deed stating that Joseph Rader had directed the conveyance to be made for the lots purchased by him to the said M. L. Rader. This deed expressly excepts and reserves from the operation thereof 'one-half undivided of said Lots No. 4 of said 218 acres and No. 5 of said 130 acres,' which reserved and excepted two lots were purchased by A. F. Rader, and duly confirmed to him by the decree of confirmation last aforesaid. That the foregoing are the only deeds ever made, and it does not appear in the record that any deed was ever made to the said A. F. Rader for the undivided half of said lots Nos. 4 and 5, nor any deed to the said A. F. Rader for lots Nos. 12, 13, and 14.

"It further appears from the record that said lots Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 were never entered upon the landbooks in the name of the said Raders, or any of them, or any person claiming under them, until after the making of said deed of January 5, 1891, nor were any taxes paid by them upon any of said lands until the year 1891. In other words, although said lands were claimed to have been purchased in 1875, and the sales confirmed in 1876, none of said lots were charged to said purchasers, or any taxes paid thereon, from 1875 to 1891, a period of 16 years. It further appears from the record that said lots Nos. 12, 13, and 14, claimed to have been purchased by A. F. Rader in 1875, were never entered upon the landbooks or charged with taxes in his name, or any taxes paid on the same or any one of them. And there is nothing in said record to show that said A. F. Rader ever did comply with the terms of the sale by the payment of the deferred payments for said last-mentioned lots. It further appears from the record that the order of sale of August 9, 1875, directed the notice of sale to be published in the Greenbrier Independent, a newspaper published in the town of Lewisburg, and also to be posted at the courthouse door of Nicholas county and at least four of the most public places in said county, for 30 days next preceding the sale, and that the commissioner was directed to have proper surveying done, and that the plat and description of each tract surveyed be returned with his report. It does not appear in the record that the notice was ever posted at the courthouse door or anywhere else in Nicholas county, but it was published in the Greenbrier Independent. A copy of the notice so published is found in the record, stating that the sale would be had 'at public auction in front of the courthouse door in Nicholas county, West Virginia, on Tuesday, the 12th day of October, 1875.' In that notice no intimation was given that said lands would be sold in lots or parcels, but a statement was made that three tracts, of 1,183 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres each, would be sold. The order entered on the 7th day of August, 1876, confirming the sales of the lots to Craig and the Raders, states that these lands were sold 'in front of the courthouse door of said county on the 11th and 12th days of October, 1875,' notwithstanding said three tracts were advertised to be sold on the 12th day of October, 1875; and the deeds made to defendants Craig and M. L. Rader both state that such sales were made on the 11th and 12th days of October, 1875. It thus appears that the sales actually took place one day in advance of the date stated in the public notice. It is further shown by the record that these three tracts of land were returned in the name of the said patentees for the years 1875 and 1876, and were certified by the auditor for sale in 1877, and were sold for said taxes on October 10, 1877, and were purchased by the sheriff of said county for the state of West Virginia, and were subsequently certified by the auditor to the clerk of the circuit court of Nicholas county, as required by law, to be sold for the benefit of the school fund, and that for the year 1877 said tracts of land were returned delinquent, and were sold for such delinquency by said sheriff on October 28, 1879, and purchased by the defendant J. S. Craig, but no deed was ever obtained by said Craig under said sale, and therefore he obtained no right thereunder. It is further shown by the record that the report of the sale in 1877 for the taxes of 1875 and 1876 aforesaid was not returned by the sheriff within the time required by law."

The statement of facts so far is taken from the brief of counsel for appellants. The following additional facts appear from the record: That after the purchase of said lands at the sheriff's sale on October 28, 1879, for the taxes due thereon for the years 1877 and 1878, C. I. Lewis, representing the plaintiff's title and interest, offered to redeem the lands from Craig, to which Craig consented, and tendered him a receipt therefor as follows: "Received May 18th, 1880, of C. I. Lewis twenty-eight dollars and 85 cents taxes and interest to this time at the rate of 12 per cent. on three tracts of land of 1,183 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres each sold by the sheriff of Nicholas county on the 28th day of October, 1879, one tract for the taxes of 1877 and 1878 and the other two tracts for the taxes of 1877 and the three tracts purchased by me for the aggregate sum of \$26.97. But this acceptance of said sum by me is not to prejudice the rights or title of any party or parties obtained under a sale made by John M. Hutchinson, Commissioner of School Lands under a decree for the sale of said three tracts of land made by the Circuit Court of the County of Nicholas about the year 1874." This Lewis refused to accept, and deposited the sum necessary for redemption with the clerk of the county court. He left it there for a short time, and then withdrew it, thus abandoning all thoughts of redemption. A portion of the lands was continued on the taxbooks for the year 1879, and in the year 1881 they were again sold for taxes. From this time on down to the present time the lands have not been assessed to the original patentees—a period of more than 15 years to the beginning of this suit, and almost 25 years to the present date. During all this time the portion claimed by J. S. Craig and J. S. Conner has been assessed in their names, and they have paid the taxes thereon from and including the year 1878 down to and including the present time. That said lands have not since been returned delinquent, but the appellees claim that they had actual, open, notorious, continuous, and exclusive possession thereon under their purchase from the commissioner of school lands, ratified and confirmed by the circuit court on the 7th day of August, 1876.

The first question that demands consideration is as to whether the plaintiffs have shown any right to maintain this suit. It is admitted that the state purchased the lands in the year 1877 for the taxes delinquent thereon for the years 1875 and 1876; that notwithstanding such purchase the lands remained on the landbooks until the year 1879, when they were again sold for taxes, and purchased by Craig, who never obtained a deed therefor. They were then dropped from the landbooks, and no attempt has ever been made by plaintiffs, or those under whom they claim, to restore them thereto. Thus plaintiffs' title has long since been forfeited to the state, both by Constitution and statute, for nonentry on the landbooks for a period of upwards of 15 years, unless they have shown a good, legal excuse for not making such entry. They do not claim that they ever made any effort to redeem the lands or have such entry made, but rest their case solely on the claim that because the state purchased these lands in the year 1877 for the taxes of the years 1875 and 1876, and such sale was void because the sheriff failed to make his report in the time required, such void sale excused them from making any attempt to restore their lands to the landbooks, and that the afterward continuance thereof on the landbooks up until the year 1879 was also illegal and void by reason of such void sale. In short, that such sale was void to invest their title in the state, but valid to suspend their title in the air, and furnish them a just, equitable excuse for their total lack of diligence and regard for the just duty they owed the state for more than 20 years, beginning with their delinquency for the year 1875. Plaintiffs, to sustain this contention, rely on the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States in Sayers v. Burkhardt, 85 Fed. 246, 29 C. C. A. 187, which holds that, "where lands have been purchased by the state at tax sale, they cannot be forfeited for nonentry on the landbooks for taxation under the statute of West Virginia which provides that lands so sold shall not thereafter be entered for taxation unless redeemed." Supported by the decision of this court in the case of Totten v. Nighbert, 41 W. Va. 800, 24 S. E. 627, in which it is held that "where land has been sold for taxes, and purchased for the state, and the clerk of the county court illegally places such land on the landbooks for succeeding years in the former owner's name, and such land is again delinquent, and sold, by direction of the auditor, for the taxes of such succeeding years, such sale is illegal and void, and the purchaser acquires no title by reason thereof." These decisions are both in harmony with each other and the statute which they construe, but do not in any sense sustain plaintiffs' contention that, if the sale to the state is void, the lands cannot be restored to the landbooks on request of the original owner, in discharge of the requirements of the Constitution and the statute. When the state once acquires the title of the landowner, either by purchase or forfeiture, its title becomes absolute, and it cannot be divested thereof in any other manner than is authorized by law. State v. Swann, 46 W. Va. 128, 33 S. E. 89; State v. Sponaugle, 45 W. Va. 415, 32 S. E. 283, 43 L. R. A. 727; McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561. No title remains in the landowner, and therefore the replacement of the lands on the landbooks before redemption or sale would be illegal and void. If the sale to the state, however, is for any reason illegal and void, no title passes, but the title remains in the landowner, who is presumed to know the law, and it is his duty to take steps immediately to restore the land to the proper books; and, if he fails to do so for five consecutive years, such title as remains in him is forfeited to the state. Simpson v. Edmiston, 23 W. Va. 675. The clerk, the assessor, and the landowner are all presumed to know the law, and presumed to know when a sale is illegal and void, and their ignorance of law furnishes no excuse for disobedience thereof.

It is maintained that the clerk is a mere ministerial officer, and that it is his duty, under his oath, to obey the plain mandate of the statute, without investigating the validity or invalidity of the sale. To the contrary, the law presumes that the clerk knows the law, and, knowing it, knows when a sale is valid, or invalid, and must act accordingly to comply with his oath of office; and the plea of ignorance will furnish him no excuse, and will not make any illegal act done by him legal. The clerk's ignorance cannot make that legal which is illegal, or make that illegal which is legal. The oath he takes is "that he will support the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of this state, and that he will faithfully discharge the duties of his said office to the best of his skill and judgment." Though his skill and judgment may sometimes be in error, yet they cannot make law, after the manner of the errors of courts of last resort, although they may excuse him from intentional wrong. While both the assessor and the clerk are administrative officers, and belong to the administrative branch of the state government, yet, in restoring lands to the landbooks, improperly omitted therefrom, they act judicially.

Section 10, c. 54, p. 83, Acts 1875, provides that "when the assessor shall ascertain that there is any land in his district which has not been entered in his landbook, or after being so entered, has from any cause, been omitted for one or more years, he shall make an entry thereof, and of the name of the owner * * * and shall charge the same with all the taxes which should have been charged or collected thereon since the twentieth day of June, 1863, with lawful interest thereon." By section 10, c. 73, p. 107, Acts 1879, this section was amended and re-enacted by adding thereto, after the word "omitted," "for a period of less than five years," in lieu of "for one or more years," thus subjecting it to the constitutional limit of forfeiture, and also omitted therefrom, "since the twentieth day of June, 1863." By chapter 12, p. 111, Acts 1881, the clerk of the county court is directed to make out the landbooks, and authorized to correct any mistakes he may discover therein. Section 10 (page 115) is continued in this act substantially as formerly, with the following clause added thereto, "And if the clerk of the county court make any such discovery [that is, that any lands have been omitted therefrom for a period of less than five years] he shall enter the same in the landbooks and inform the proper assessor thereof, who shall assess the same as aforesaid and certify his assessment to the clerk; and the clerk shall thereupon charge said real estate with taxes as aforesaid." This section, materially unchanged, has been continued to the present time. Section 10, c. 29, Code 1899. Thus both the clerk and the assessor, in ascertaining what lands have been improperly omitted from the landbooks for any cause, are clothed with judicial powers, often nominated quasi judicial; and, when a landowner seeks to have his land restored to the landbooks because illegally omitted for any cause, the duty is imposed on them of investigating the grounds of illegality, and if found to be true, and forfeiture has not yet accrued, of restoring such lands, with all unpaid taxes, with legal interest thereon chargeable against the same, to the landbooks. Thus the state is made whole, and the landowner redeems his land from delinquency and sale, and prevents forfeiture thereof.

In Welty's treatise on the Law of Assessment, § 25, p. 87, the law is stated as follows: "In the exercise of the functions and in the discharge of the duties of his office, an assessor acts both judicially and ministerially; that is, some of his acts are judicial, and some ministerial. When it becomes necessary to determine a question of law or fact, the act is judicial." The acts of assessors in determining what property is liable to taxation are judicial in their character. Throop on Public Officers, 571; Wheeling Bridge Co. v. Paull, Judge, 39 W. Va. 142, 19 S. E. 551; Cunningham v. Brown, 39 W. Va. 588, 20 S. E. 615; Charleston Bridge Co. v. County Court, 41 W. Va. 658, 24 S. E. 1002.

It is therefore plain that either the assessor or the clerk had authority to restore these lands to the landbooks on application of the owners at any time before they became forfeited by reason of nonentry, provided the former purchase by the state was illegal or void for any cause; and, having the power, it was incumbent on them as a duty to do so when thereto requested. Whatever title remained in the owners became forfeited to the state after they had been off the landbooks for five consecutive years. Hence, whether the sale to the state was valid or invalid, the landowners lost their title, and it became absolutely vested in the state. Having no title or no suable interest in the subject-matter of the suit, they cannot maintain the same. King v. Mullins, 171 U. S. 404, 18 Sup. Ct. 925, 43 L. Ed. 214; King v. Panther Lumber Co., 171 U. S. 437, 18 Sup. Ct. 573, 43 L. Ed. 227. Without title either legal or equitable, plaintiffs cannot attack the defendants' title papers as being fraudulent and void and creating a cloud on their lost title, since the fraud alleged had nothing to do with the loss of their title. The cancellation of defendants' papers would not restore their lost title. The rule is stated in 17 Am. Plead. & Prac. 300, as follows: "A bill to quiet title or remove a cloud cannot be maintained by any one who is not interested in the title. The plaintiff must have some title, either legal or equitable, for it is a general rule that he must recover, if at all, upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of that of his adversary. Want of title in the plaintiff renders it unnecessary to examine that of the defendant."

It is insisted that as the purchase by the defendants, under which they hold, was by a decree of the circuit court at the instance of the commissioner of school lands, plaintiffs are entitled to the benefit of all taxes paid by such purchasers to prevent forfeiture of their land, under the decision of Lynch v. Andrews, 25 W. Va. 751, and Sturm v. Fleming, 26 W. Va. 54. These cases hold that there was such privity between the purchaser at a judicial sale and the person whose land was sold that if such sale, and the deed made in pursuance thereof, should thereafter be set aside, the payment of taxes by the purchaser would prevent the forfeiture of the title to the state during the period covered by such annulled sale and deed. This arises from the fact that the titles are the same, and temporarily vested in the purchaser, and, as he pays the state taxes during the interim, the title cannot possibly be forfeited, but that the purchaser would have the right to reimbursement of the taxes from the owner of the land, whose title is restored or freed from cloud. In the present case there was no such judicial sale as would create or continue a privity between the original owners and the purchasers. Such owners were not parties to the proceedings, nor were they entitled to be. McClure v. Maitland, 24 W. Va. 561. Their title was not sold, but it was only such title as the state had at that time. If any-privity existed, it was between the state and the purchasers. If the state had no title, then the decree of confirmation and deeds in pursuance thereof furnished mere color for the beginning of a new title, bringing this case clearly within the rule of Simpson v. Edmiston, 23 W. Va. 675; State v. McEldowney, 54 W. Va. 695, 47 S. E. 650.

Having reached the conclusion that the plaintiffs have lost their title, whether the purchase by the state in 1877 is valid or invalid, it becomes wholly unnecessary to inquire into the validity of such purchase, for the afterwards forfeiture for nonentry renders the state's title, though otherwise defective, absolute and indefeasible.

It is said by Mr. Justice Harlan in the case of King v. Mullins, 171 U. S., on page 435, 18 Sup. Ct. 937, 43 L. Ed. 214, that this "is a case of sheer neglect upon the part of the landowner to perform the duty required of him by the Constitution and statutes of the state." Plaintiffs' counsel avers in his brief that "the evidence in the case at bar shows that the commissioner of school lands refused to proceed against these lands, and thereby deprived the former owners of their right of redemption, or the right to contest the validity of the sale," and relies on this fact to give a court of equity jurisdiction, and cites King v. Mullins as upholding his conclusion. Counsel certainly had some other case in his mind when preparing his brief, for it is alleged in plaintiff's bill that the commissioner of school lands was about to bring proceedings to sell their lands as forfeited to the state, and they pray "that the said F. B. Smith, commissioner of school lands as aforesaid, be inhibited, restrained, and enjoined from proceeding against said lands as forfeited and subject to be sold by him for the benefit of the school fund under and by virtue of said pretended forfeiture and sale aforesaid." So that plaintiffs not only claim that the sale was void and prevented forfeiture, but satisfied the delinquency of the land, and relieved them from the necessity of redeeming the same and paying any taxes thereon for the past 20 years. How long they expect this to last, does not appear. Certainly they can hardly claim that the failure of the sheriff to return his report of sales within 10 days would render the land wholly immune from taxation. Not only have plaintiffs failed to make any attempt to redeem their land, but they pray an injunction to prevent such opportunity being afforded them. A more inequitable plea could not possibly be presented. Courts of equity help those who are willing, anxious, and ready to do equity, and do not permit themselves to be used as instruments to deprive the state of its just taxes on lands held only under its grants. No title is good without a grant, directly or indirectly, or mediately or immediately, from the state, and they who expect to keep their titles from returning to their original source must pay the taxes lawfully assessed and assessable against the same. Before the plaintiffs can prevail in equity, they must redeem their title from the state in the manner pointed out by law. Until they do so, they cannot maintain this suit. Davis v. Living, 50 W. Va. 431, 40 S. E. 385; State v. Sponangle, 45 W. Va. 415, 32 S. E. 283, 43 L. R. A. 727; Totten v. Nighbert, 41 W. Va. 95, 24 S. E. 627; King v. Mullins, 171 U. S. 404, 18 Sup. Ct. 925, 43 L. Ed. 214; King v. Panther Lumber Co., 171 U. S. 437, 18 Sup. Ct. 573, 43 L. Ed. 227.

The plaintiffs' bill was properly dismissed. The decree is affirmed.

BRANNON, J. I concur in the decision made in this case, because I think that time denies relief to the plaintiffs. So many years have passed since the purchase by Craig, and the means of information to the owners of the land that it was not in fact delinquent open to them. They could have learned the facts by the slightest diligence and care. In fact, they did know of them long ago—as far back as 1879. The bill is predicated upon fraud. Equity does not allow a man to lie supine through a generation. I think, therefore, laches bars the bill, and also the statute of limitation. But I am not as yet ready to hold that when land is sold to the state for delinquent taxes, even where the sale is void for irregularity, its nonentry on the taxbooks after such sale will work its forfeiture. Section 23, c. 29, Code 1899, provides that "real estate purchased for the state at a sale for taxes shall not be thereafter entered on the land books, but the auditor shall keep a register thereof." Here is a positive prohibition against the entry of such land on the taxbooks, and I cannot see how the owners can be remiss to the extent of the forfeiture of their land. They can redeem and reassess. We cannot say that, if not re-entered for taxes, the owners cheat the state out of her taxes, as the land is hers, and she can sell it and take all its proceeds, if she chooses to deny them the excess over her taxes and interest and damages; and, under the statutes as they are, on redemption or sale she gets back all her taxes, with 12 per cent. interest. She can lose nothing. The land is hers, and not taxable. State v. McEldowney, 54 W. Va. 695, 47 S. E. 650; State v. Belcher, 53 W. Va. 359, 44 S. E. 216; Totten v. Nighbert, 41 W. Va. 800, 24 S. E. 627. In Sayers v. Burkhardt, 85 Fed. 246, 29 C. C. A. 137, it was held that, "where lands have been purchased by the state at a tax sale, they cannot be forfeited for nonentry on the landbooks for taxation, under the statute of West Virginia, which provides that lands so sold shall not thereafter be entered for taxation unless redeemed." But it is said in this case that, where the tax deed is void for irregularity, it is the duty of the clerk or assessor, on request of the owner, to restore the land to the taxbooks, and that that owner must cause him to do so by request or mandamus. I cannot see clearly, as yet, that in the face of a statute prohibiting the assessment of such land a clerk or assessor can assume the function of passing upon the validity of the tax sale—generally a most intricate and delicate question of law—and thus exercise judicial functions. The sale is colorable—its validity colorable—and I cannot see how it can be overthrown by the clerk or assessor.

LIPSCOMB'S ADM'R v. CONDON et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1904.)

ATTACHMENT—SHARES OF STOCK—PERSONAL ESTATE—GARNISHMENT—CERTIFICATE OF STOCK—SALE—TRANSFER ON BOOKS—TITLE ACQUIRED—CLAIM OF THIRD PARTY—JURY TRIAL—WAIVER.

1. By the common law, shares of stock in a corporation, being in the nature of choses in action, intangible property incapable of manual seizure, are not subject to execution or attachment. They are by statute.

2. Section 9 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1899, giving the plaintiff in an attachment proceeding a lien on the personal property of the debtor from the time of the levying of the attachment, or serving a copy thereof on the garnishee, on all the personal property, choses in action, and other securities of the defendant in the hands of the garnishee, and on any real estate of the debtor levied on by virtue thereof, from the suing out of the same, includes shares of corporation stock in the terms "personal property, choses in action and other securities."

3. Such shares are personal estate, and a species of incorporeal property.

4. In a proceeding by the creditor of a shareholder to subject his shares to the payment of his debt, the corporation in which the shares are held should be made the garnishee.

5. A certificate of stock is not the stock itself, but is evidence of its existence and ownership.

6. Though, when issued, such certificate is a muniment of title, it is not essential to the existence of the property represented by it.

7. A certificate is not necessary to a sale of shares. The beneficial interest in them is assignable by parol, the ownership passing immediately on consummation of the sale, by force of the contract, as in the case of ordinary choses in action, and not by operation of law.

8. A sale of shares for which no certificate has been issued may be evidenced by an informal written instrument, executed and delivered by the transferor to the transferee, without a power of attorney entitling the latter to have the same transferred on the books of the company.

9. In this state a shareholder may, upon his demand, obtain a certificate of his shares, but unless demanded by him it need not be issued, and he may freely transfer the shares without it if they are fully paid up, or security for the balance due on them, satisfactory to the board of directors, be given.

10. Section 21 of chapter 53 of the Code of 1899, requiring corporations to keep transfer books and the shares to be assigned therein, is intended for the protection and convenience of the corporation and its shareholders.

11. The books and papers of a private corporation under the laws of this state are not public, but private, records and documents.

12. An unregistered transfer of shares of corporation stock, for which no certificate has been issued, if made for a valuable consideration and without fraud, vests in the transferee a title to the shares superior to the claim of a subsequent attaching creditor of the transferor.

13. In the absence of fraud and statutory regulations, a creditor proceeding by execution or attachment only obtains such rights in the property seized as his debtor had at the time of the seizure.

14. The rights of a creditor respecting shares of corporation stock for which certificates have not been issued, alleged to be the property of his debtor, are the same as in the case of an ordinary chose in action.

15. When, under the provisions of section 23 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1899, a petition is filed in a suit in equity founded upon an attachment, setting up title by purchase, and the plaintiff in the cause relies upon fraud in the alleged purchase to defeat the claim of title so set up, the trial of the issue must be upon the petition without any other pleading, and by jury, unless trial by jury is waived.

16. In such case it is reversible error to hear and determine the issue upon the petition, and answer thereto, and depositions of witnesses, according to the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

17. Waiver of the right of trial by jury must be by consent entered of record. It cannot be merely inferred from the fact that the court tried the case without objection.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by Lipscomb's administrator against Levi Z. Condon and Albert N. Horner. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. B. Maxwell and Dailey & Bowers, for appellants. F. M. Reynolds and J. P. Scott, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, P. This is a suit in equity against a nonresident defendant to subject to the payment of a debt, amounting to $5,000 and interest, by process of attachment and garnishment, certain shares of stock in a corporation, which, the bill alleges, are the property of the defendant. The case presents a number of questions which seem never to have been passed upon by this court.

In the absence of any statute upon the subject, shares of stock in a corporation are not subject to execution. Cook, Cor. § 480; Clark, Cor. 1147. By that law intangible property incapable of manual seizure and delivery cannot be taken on execution. Attachment, being a purely statutory remedy, reaches only such property as is made subject to it by the statute. Hence, if the statutes governing the remedy by attachment do not make shares liable under it, it is clear that they cannot be subjected to the payment of debts by such proceeding. Drake, Attach. § 244; Haley v. Reid, 16 Ga. 437; Foster v. Potter, 37 Mo. 525; Howe v. Starkweather, 17 Mass. 240.

By section 20 of chapter 53 of the Code of 1899 it is declared that such shares shall be deemed personal estate. Section 9 of chapter 106 gives the plaintiff in an attachment proceeding a lien from the time of the levying of his attachment or serving a copy thereof, as provided in that chapter, "upon the personal property, choses in action, and other securities of the defendant against whom the claim is, in the hands of, or due from any garnishee, on whom it is so served." By these provisions the Legislature has expressly made choses in action liable to garnishment, and shares of corporate stock are almost universally held by the courts to be property of that nature. Thomp. Com. Cor. §§ 1070, 2587, 4571; Cook, Cor. § 12; Clark, Cor. § 377. If there were no adjudications upon the subject, there would be no reason to hesitate in saying that shares of stock are subject to attachment under these statutes. Although this court has not construed them, similar statutes have been passed upon in many of the states. In Railroad Co. v. Payne, 29 Grat. 502, shares in a railroad company were held liable under a statute which made the attachment a lien upon all the "estate" of the debtor. In delivering the opinion of the court, Moncure, P., said such shares were plainly within the letter, as well as the spirit, of the law. In Bank v. Byram, 131 Ill. 92, 22 N. E. 842, it was held that the words "rights and effects" of the debtor in the general attachment law were broad enough to cover shares of stock. In Curtis v. Steever, 36 N. J. Law, 304, the words "rights and credits" in the general attachment law were sufficient. It is now well settled by the authorities that, in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, shares of stock, although incorporeal in their nature, are personal property. Clark, Cor. 1142, 1143. As our statute makes them personal property, and subjects apparently all forms of property to the process of attachment by giving a lien on the real estate, personal property, and choses in action and other securities of the debtor, it would be very difficult to find a plausible technical ground upon which to except them, and utterly impossible to say, in view of the vast amount of money and property represented by corporation stock and the extent of its use for purposes of credit, that the Legislature did not intend that it should be subject to the attachment laws.

Nor can there be any doubt that, in the matter of procedure, the corporation itself may be made the garnishee. Whatever interest the shareholder has is in the custody and control of the corporation. A share of the capital stock of a corporation is the interest or right which the owner has in the management of the corporation, in its surplus profits, and, upon dissolution, in all of its assets remaining after the payment of its debts. Clark, Cor. 1141. The certificate of stock representing the share of the owner may be in the hands of some person other than the debtor or the corporation, but the certificate is not the share itself. For most purposes it is not regarded as property, but only as evidence of the existence and ownership of the shares named and described in it. 10 Cyc. 588. Where the proceeding to subject stock by attachment is under the general attachment laws, the corporation is made the garnishee. Railroad Co. v. Paine, 29 Grat. 502. Special statutes usually make the corporation the garnishee. Drake, Attach. § 259.

In this case the stock, against which the proceeding is, stands on the books of the company in the name of the debtor, but is claimed by a third party under an alleged purchase thereof from the debtor, made long before the order of attachment was served upon the company—in fact, years before this suit was brought. Is the lien of the attachment superior to the title of the purchaser? The assignment of the shares was not made by delivery of share certificates, but by a mere written assignment of the shareholder to the purchaser, specifying the number of shares. It does not appear that any certificate had ever been issued, nor that any demand for the transfer of the stock from the seller to the buyer on the books of the company had ever been made. The circuit court found and held that for the purposes of this suit the stock was the property of the debtor, and decreed it to be sold; but whether it did so upon the ground that the sale was fraudulent, or that an unregistered transfer of the stock is not good as against an attaching creditor, does not appear.

"The decided weight of authority holds that he who purchases, for a valuable consideration, a certificate of stock, is protected in his ownership of the stock, and is not affected by a subsequent attachment or execution levied on such stock for the debts of the registered stockholder, even though such purchaser has neglected to have his transfer registered on the corporate books, thereby allowing his transferror to appear to be the owner of the stock upon which the attachment or execution is levied." Cook, Cor. § 487. This author says it is so held in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Delaware, Nebraska, Tennessee, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas, and Washington, independently of any statute on the subject. In a large number of states the purchaser, in such case, is protected by statute. In still other states a purchaser does not acquire any right to the stock as against an attaching creditor of the debtor, unless it is transferred to him on the books of the company before levied upon. The difference in the decisions is attributable, for the most part, to the peculiar terms of the statutes of the several states bearing upon the question, and to differences in construction of like and similar statutes by the courts of different states. Where there is no statute expressly or impliedly forbidding a sale of stock without registration, it is generally, if not universally, held that the purchaser takes the legal title without a transfer of the stock on the books. Even in those jurisdictions in which the statute declares that the stock shall be transferable only on the books of the corporation, it is held that an unregistered transfer or assignment gives the purchaser a perfect equitable title as between him and the assignor, and any person claiming under the latter.

The reasoning of the court in Scripture v. Francetown Soapstone Co., 50 N. H. 571, on this subject seems to be in perfect consonance with the rules and principles upon which contracts and rights of property stand. The court said, in part: "It seems too clear for argument that the ownership of the shares passes from the seller to the buyer by force of the contract of sale, and not by operation of law; and, if that be so, the buyer's title, so far as the seller is concerned, attaches the moment this contract is fully consummated between them. This kind of property, being an intangible right, somewhat akin to the right to receive money due upon a bond or other chose in action, is incapable of actual manual delivery. All the seller can do, that corresponds at all to the delivery of personal chattels in other cases of sale, is to hand over to the buyer his certificate, with a sufficient assignment, by deed or otherwise, to entitle him to a transfer of the shares on the books of the company. When the seller has done this, his power and duty in the matter are ended, and it is at the option of the purchaser whether the transfer shall be recorded or not. If the purchaser omits to have the record made, he can claim no rights as a member of the corporation; and he also incurs the further risk of having his title defeated by a subsequent attachment or sale to a bona fide purchaser. It is difficult to see any substantial difference between the position of this plaintiff after the sale and assignment of the shares to him by the owner, and before a transfer was made on the books, and that of the grantee in a deed of land before his deed is recorded. In both cases the seller has parted with his title, and, as to him, the buyer has acquired it. It is only third persons in either case whose rights or interests are affected by the omission. In the case of an unrecorded deed the grantor continues to be clothed with evidence of ownership after the conveyance, very similar to that which remains with the seller of shares before the transfer has been entered on the books. The record shows that he is still the owner of the land, when in fact he is not; and, so far as any interest a creditor can have in the matter is concerned, the same is precisely true in the case of shares in a corporation, sold, but not transferred on the books. The statutes which we hold require the transfer of shares to be entered on the books of the corporation kept for that purpose are certainly no more explicit and absolute than that which requires the recording of deeds. The object of the law, so far as creditors are concerned, is the same in both cases. As between the parties the title passes by contract, and not by the record in both cases alike."

It is to be observed that the New Hampshire court holds that the statute making the stock transferable only on the books of the company is in the nature of a registration law for the benefit of purchasers and creditors, in consequence of which an unregistered purchase is not good against a subsequent attachment; but it does hold that, as between the parties, the equitable title passes, notwithstanding the statute. Many of the courts hold that under such a statute the legal title passes as between the parties, while only an equitable title passes as against the corporation and bona fide purchasers. Clark, Cor. 1785. "In those states in which an unregistered transfer conveys the legal title to the shares, and not merely an equitable title, an unregistered transfer will necessarily convey a good title as against subsequent attaching or execution creditor of the transferor, whether the latter has notice of the transfer before his levy or not, unless the circumstances are such as to estop the transferee to set up his title, or the transfer is fraudulent as against the creditors of the transferor. In those jurisdictions in which it is held that the legal title remains in the transferor, the courts have not agreed as to the effect of an unregistered transfer as against an attaching or execution creditor of the transferor." Clark, Cor. 1794. "If a transfer on the books of a corporation is not required by the charter or by-laws, nor by any general law, it is not necessary to give a transferee a perfect title. In such a case a transfer by delivery of the certificate of stock duly assigned, although not registered on the books of the corporation, will prevail in all jurisdictions over a subsequent attachment by a creditor of the transferor, whether he had notice of the transfer or not. And the same is true where registration of transfers is required by statute, not for all purposes, nor for the protection of creditors, but merely for the protection of the corporation and its creditors. 'It requires a clear provision of the charter itself, or of some statute,' said the Massachusetts court, 'to take from the owner of such property the right to transfer it in accordance with known rules of the common law. And by those rules the delivering of a stock certificate, with a written transfer of the same, to a bona fide purchaser, is a sufficient delivery to transfer the title as against a subsequent attaching creditor.'" Clark, Cor. 1798; citing Boston Music Hall Ass'n v. Cory, 129 Mass. 435. In the earlier Massachusetts cases, the contrary of this doctrine had been held, and, since the decision of the case just referred to, the Legislature of that state has passed a statute conforming to the principles announced therein.

In Continental Bank v. Elliott National Bank (C. C.) 7 Fed. 369, holding that an unrecorded transfer of national bank stock will take precedence of a subsequent attachment in behalf of a creditor without notice, Lowell, J., delivering the opinion, discusses the question most lucidly and exhaustively, reviewing many of the authorities, both American and English. In speaking of the statutes concerning transfers of the shares upon the books of the company he says: "No doubt it is sometimes intended as a record of persons liable for the debts of the company, and is so in the case of national banks; but the great weight of authority is that it is not intended for the benefit of creditors of the individual shareholder. Some of the courts hold that the unrecorded transfer passes only an equitable title; others, that it gives a legal title. I assume that by the decisions in the courts of the United States only an equitable title is acquired. That point is unimportant." Again, he says, at page 371: "It is a general rule that creditors, whether they proceed by an attachment on mesne process, seizure on execution, creditors' bill, or through an assignee in bankruptcy, must take their debtor's property subject to all equitable as well as legal charges, liens, or opposing titles. Willis, J., in giving judgment in the Queen's Bench in 1868, in a case quite analogous to this, against the right of seizing shares of the apparent owner, said that it was a rule applied by that court more than a hundred years before, in the analogous case of the statutory execution under the bankrupt law, that the creditors can have no more than a debtor was entitled to in equity or at law. Pickering v. Ilfracombe Ry. Co., L. R., 3 C. P. 235, 251. It has been the law of the Lord Mayor's Court in London, from the time of Richard I, that an equitable assignment of a chose in action should prevail against an attachment. Westoby v. Day, 2 E. & B. 605. This application of the rule obtains in Massachusetts, and in the United States generally, though a few courts hold otherwise." It is proper to say here that it is the rule in this state. Neill & Ellingham v. Produce Co., 41 W. Va. 37, 58, 23 S. C. 702; Wall v. Railroad Co., 52 W. Va. 485, 492, 44 S. E. 294, 64 L. R. A. 501, 94 Am. St. Rep. 948; B. & O. R. Co. v. McCullough, 12 Grat. 595.

Except in those cases in which a statute is held to have inhibited any transfer except on the books of the company, the delivery of the certificate with an assignment to the transferee passes either a legal or an equitable title to the shares; but, in this case no certificates appear to have been issued, and there was no delivery of any certificate between the parties. The only evidence of the assignment is a written instrument not under seal, purporting to make over, transfer, and assign, for a valuable consideration, the shares therein described. Is this sufficient to pass any title? The shares exist independently of any certificate. They are a species of incorporeal property. "A share certificate is merely the paper representative of an incorporeal right, and stands on a footing similar to that of other muniments of title. It is not in itself property, but is merely the symbol or paper evidence of property; hence the proprietary right may exist without a certificate." 10 Cyc. 588. "This legal relation, and proprietary interest on which it is based, are quite independent of the certificate of ownership, which is a mere evidence of title. The complete fact of title may very well exist without it." Mr. Justice Matthews, in National Bank v. Watson-town Bank, 105 U. S. 217, 222, 26 L. Ed. 1039. "Millions of dollars of capital stock are held without any certificate, or, if certificates are made out, without their ever being delivered. A certificate is authentic evidence of title to stock; but it is not the stock itself, nor is it necessary to the existence of the stock. Crumlish v. Railroad Co., 40 W. Va. 627, 22 S. E. 90. It certifies to a fact which exists independently of itself. And an actual subscription is not necessary. There may be a virtual subscription, deducible from the acts and conduct of the party." Mr. Justice Bradley, in Pacific National Bank v. Eaton, 141 U. S. 227, 234, 11 Sup. Ct. 984, 35 L. Ed. 702. Other cases to the same effect are First National Bank v. Gifford, 47 Iowa, 575; Brigham v. Mead, 10 Allen, 245; Curtis v. Crossley, 59 N. J. Eq. 358, 361, 45 Atl. 905; Agricultural Bank v. Burr, 24 Me. 256; Cattle Co. v. Burns, Walker & Co., 82 Tex. 50, 56, 17 S. W. 1043.

A share of stock being an incorporeal right, incapable of manual delivery, and the certificate being nothing more than evidence of its existence and of title to the share in the holder, it is obvious it may be assigned without a certificate, and in the mode adopted by the defendant here and his transferee; but for this there is authority. "Subscription rights in a proposed corporation need not be evidenced by written instrument in any particular form, but may be established by parol. A subscription right in a proposed corporation is assignable by parol, and ownership passes immediately on consummation of the sale, and by force thereof, and not by operation of law." Manchester St. Ry. Co. v. Williams (N. H.) 52 Atl. 461. A certificate of stock is important for many purposes, but not for the purpose of a transfer as between parties. Id. 464; Brigham v. Mead, 10 Allen, 245; Field v. Pierce, 102 Mass. 253, 261; Cattle Co. v. Burns, Walker & Co., 82 Tex. 56, 17 S. W. 1043; Baker v. Wasson, 53 Tex. 150; Agricultural Bank v. Burr, 24 Me. 256, 267; Curtis v. Crossley, 59 N. J. Eq. 351, 361, 45 Atl. 905.

As, by the assignment or transfer from the debtor to his transferee, evidenced by the informal written instrument executed and delivered by the former to the latter, title to the stock, legal or equitable, passed, what is the status of that title as against the attaching creditor, assuming that it is only the equitable title? In addition to the authorities already noted as maintaining its superiority to the attachment lien, the following is quoted from that latest and invaluable work, Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure, vol. 4, p. 632: "The right of a creditor to property attached must be determined by the state of the title at the time the attachment was made, and, in the absence of fraud and statutory regulations, he only obtains the rights which the debtor had in the property at the time, for the creditor is not in the position of a bona fide purchaser." The rule applies where the debtor holds title to property subject to a valid outstanding charge or lien, whether the lien arises by agreement of parties, by operation of law, or a prior garnishment. Id. 633. The only exception to the rule, independent of statute, is that of the participation of the adverse claimant in the fraudulent purpose of the debtor, in which connection it is to be noted that, in the case of a sale of personal property, retention of possession by the seller is strong evidence of fraud, when the sale obstructs the rights of a creditor. Id. 635. It makes the sale prima facie fraudulent. Davis v. Turner, 4 Grat. 422; Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Grat. 198; Dance v. Seaman, 11 Grat. 778; B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Glenn, 28 Md. 287, 384, 92 Am. Dec. 688. What effect this rule of evidence is to have is an inquiry which more properly arises on the question of the validity of the sale, to be disposed of in a subsequent portion of this opinion.

As a rule, those courts which hold an unregistered transfer not good, as against the creditors of the transferor, do not put it upon the ground that the presence of the shares on the books of the corporation in the name of the transferor, after the sale, is tantamount to the retention of the possession of tangible personal property after sale, and is therefore evidence of fraud. The Supreme Court of New Hampshire, in Pinkerton v. Railroad Co., 42 N. H. 424, and in Scripture v. Soapstone Co., 50 N. H. 571, puts it partially upon that ground. In the former case the court said that the Legislature had made plain its intention that the entry upon the stock record should be the appropriate indication of ownership, as it had made provision in regard to returns of stock by the clerks or treasurers for the purposes of taxation, private liability, and attachment, and, in the case of manufacturing corporations, had ordained by express provision that a transfer of stock should avail nothing against an attachment until entered upon the corporation records. Whether, in the absence of such statute, the court would have arrived at the same conclusion, nobody can tell, but there is no reason to assume that it would. In 1887 the Legislature of that state made an unregistered transfer good against an attachment. Laws 1887, p. 417, c. 16. In Connecticut the original idea was that no title, either legal or equitable, could pass by a transfer unless recorded on the books of the corporation. Marlborough Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 2 Conn. 579; Northrop v. Turnpike Co., 3 Conn. 544; Northrop v. Curtis, 5 Conn. 246; Oxford Turnpike Co. v. Bunnel, 6 Conn. 552. This position, however, was abandoned in Colt v. Ives, 31 Conn. 25, 81 Am. Dec. 161, propounding the quere whether, by an unregistered transfer, an equitable title passed, and holding that, if so, it was not good against an attaching creditor unless the transferee did all he could to have the transfer made before the attachment was levied. The statutes of Connecticut seem not to have been so rigid in their requirements in respect to the registration of stock as those of New Hampshire. The court, in the case last cited, after referring to the rule that possession of tangible property is an indication of ownership, says: "So, in respect to the assignment of ordinary choses in action, there must be notice of an assignment to the debtor; the assignment conveying but an equitable interest in the thing, and notice to a trustee being in equity the ordinary and only practicable mode in which an assignee can protect his interest. And in the case of the purchase of stock in a corporation there must be such a transfer of it as the Legislature in the charter or by statute prescribes. And notice of the assignment of choses in action, and the transfer required by statute of corporate stock, stand in lieu of the taking and retaining of the possession of personal chattels sold, being the only possession the nature of the property admits of." As to choses in action, this is good law when applied to the case of a subsequent purchaser for value and without notice. But is it good law as to a creditor whose rights rise no higher than those of his debtor? That it is not considered sound, even in Connecticut, is evidenced by later decisions of that court. In Mowry v. Hawkins, 57 Conn. 453, 18 Atl. 784, the court said: "In the absence of fraud, stock may stand in the name of one which belongs to another, without being liable to attachment for the debts of the nominal owner. This must be so as to all creditors who have not been misled or deceived by it, and as to those who are advised as to the true state of the title." This proposition was referred to in Skiff v. Stoddard, 63 Conn. 198, 28 Atl. 874, 28 Atl. 104, 21 L. R. A. 102, as established Connecticut law. In New York Commercial Co. v. Francis, 83 Fed. 769, 28 C. C. A. 199, the proposition is applied as sound Connecticut law; the court saying in its opinion: "It is one which we are satisfied is in accordance with the general rule and with the principles of justice, unless the equitable owner is prevented by an estoppel from showing the truth, or there has been some illegality or violation of a statutory requirement." In Alabama an unregistered transfer is not good against an attachment, because the statute expressly declares that the holder of stocks in corporations must have the same transferred on the books of the company within 15 days, else the same shall be void as to bona fide creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice. In Arkansas the statute gives precedence to the attachment unless a certificate of transfer is filed with the county clerk. In California, Colorado, and New Mexico the statute declares that no transfer of stock shall be valid for any purpose whatever until entered on the corporate books. In Indiana the attachment prevails because the statute declares that stock shall be transferable on the corporate books, and not otherwise. In Iowa the statute says transfers shall not be valid except as between the parties until a registry is had on the corporate books. See Cook, Cor. § 49, note 5. In Vermont the statutes were much like those of New Hampshire when Cheever v. Meyer, 52 Vt. 66, was decided, and the decision was rested wholly upon statutory grounds, treating the statutes as registration laws for the protection of creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice. The early cases in Massachusetts, giving precedence to the attachment, rested upon the same ground. In Fisher v. Bank, 5 Gray, 373, holding that shares in a bank whose charter provides that they shall "be transferable only at the banking house and on its books" cannot be transferred in any other way, so as to give the transferee a good title against a creditor of the vendor who attaches them without notice of the transfer, the decision was based wholly upon the statute. As before stated, this rule has been overturned in that state by a statute. Before the passage of the statute, the court, in Dickinson v. National Bank, 129 Mass. 279, 37 Am. Rep. 351, in construing the United States statute concerning national banks, which did not say the stock was transferable only on the books of the bank, although the by-laws of the corporation did say so, held that an unregistered transfer must prevail over an attachment in favor of a creditor of the transferor.

The proposition asserted in Colt v. Ives, 81 Conn. 85, 81 Am. Dec. 161, the soundness of which has been hereinbefore questioned, is the doctrine asserted in Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russell, 1, and confirmed in Foster v. Cockrell, 3 Cl. & Fin. 466, to the effect that, of two innocent purchasers of a merely equitable interest, he shall be preferred who first gives notice to the trustee or holder of the legal title. The Connecticut court seems to have treated a creditor as standing on the same footing as a purchaser for value without notice. The fallacy and unsoundness of it is clearly shown in the opinion in Continental Bank v. Elliot National Bank (C. O.)

7 Fed. 369, 375. Lowell, J., said: "(1) Though the corporation is for some purposes a trustee for the shareholders, the latter have an independent legal property in their shares which they can convey, and whether their actual conveyance is legal or equitable is of no consequence. (2) The doctrine applies in England only to purchasers, and not to creditors seizing or attaching, even though a statute gives a right to seize all shares standing in the debtor's name in his own right. This statute was once held by the Queen's Bench to mean that the creditor might seize what the register showed to be apparently the property of the debtor (Watts v. Porter, 3 E. & B. 743); but this has been overruled on the ground that the Legislature cannot be supposed to have intended to take one man's property for another man's debt, without the most explicit statement of such a purpose, and therefore the 'right' refers to the equitable as well as legal right. Dunster v. Lord Glengall, 3 Ir. Ch. 47; Scott v. Lord Hastings, 4 K. & J. 633; Beavan v. Earl of Oxford, 6 D., M. & G. 524; Eyre v. McDonald, 9 H. L. 619; Robinson v. Nesbitt, L. R., 3 C. P. 264; Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Co., L. R., 3 C. P. 235; Gill v. Continental Gas Co., L. R., 7 Ex. 619. A few courts in this country have carried the doctrine of Dearle v. Hall so far as to uphold the garnishment of a nonnegotiable debt which had been equitably assigned without notice. We have already seen that this is not the law in England nor in Massachusetts. Neither is it the law of the United States generally. Drake, Attachments, c. 24; Cornick v. Rickards, 3 Lea, 1. The Supreme Court of Tennessee in that case refused to extend the rule to shares of stock, though it applies in that state to choses in action. As shares are not choses in action, and as attaching creditors are not purchasers, Dearle v. Hall is not in point."

We have a statute on this subject, and it does not extend the principle so as to protect creditors. Assignees of choses in action are required to "allow all just discounts, not only against themselves, but against the assignors, before the defendant had notice of the assignment." Code 1899, c. 99, § 14. Discounts are not the debts of the assignor or assignee.

Another statute gives the right to any person to set up against an attachment any interest in, or lien upon, the property attached which he may have, without regard to notice. Code 1899, c. 106, § 23; First National Bank v. Harkness, 42 W. Va. 156, 24 S. E. 548, 32 L. R. A. 408; Crim v. Harmon, 38 W. Va. 596, 18 S. E. 753.

This inquiry as to the grounds upon which some of the courts give precedence to an attachment over an unregistered transfer results in the conclusion that they put it upon the statutes either authorizing or requiring transfer to be made on the books of the corporation, some of them adopting the view that, as there can be no visible change of the possession of a share, the Legislature intended the record to take the place of visible possession, by way of analogy to the common-law rule relating to tangible property, and others adopting the view that the statutory provision is in the nature of a registration law for the protection of the public. It has been shown that, where the former theory was adopted, it has either been abandoned or displaced by statutes. Moreover, there never was any basis for the assumption of legislative intent to require recorded evidence of ownership of shares, when the statute did not make the record a public one. It might as well be assumed that some record ought to show who owns other choses in action, evidenced by notes, bonds, and other obligations. The latter has been almost universally condemned as imputing to the Legislature an intent not warranted by the language of the statute or the nature of its subject-matter. Of it, Thompson, Com. Cor. § 2411, says: "But this view, which makes the stock and transfer books public records, open to the inspection of the public, is plainly untenable unless the statute law (as it does in some states) obliges the corporation to expose such records to the inspection of the public. Otherwise, they are strictly private records, sustaining no analogy to the records of transfers of title required to be made and kept in public recording offices; and even these last records import no notice except in those cases where the statute law expressly so provides."

Our statute, viewed in the light of the foregoing authorities and principles, affords no ground for a conclusion that an attachment in favor of a creditor of a transferrer will prevail over the title, be it legal or equitable, of a transferee, when the transfer is not entered upon the transfer book of the corporation. It does not say the stock shall be transferable only on the books of the corporation. It is silent as to what shall constitute a transfer. The provisions relating to transfer are found in sections 21, 22, and 35-38, of chapter 53, of the Code of 1899. The last-mentioned section has no important bearing upon this question, and the others read as follows:

"21. A transfer book shall be kept by the corporation in which the shares shall be assigned under such regulations, if there be any, as may have been prescribed by the by-laws.

"22. No share shall be transferred without the consent of the board of directors, until the same is fully paid up, or security given to the satisfaction of the board for the residue remaining unpaid. And where bond and security have been given to the corporation for any sum remaining unpaid upon stock, no transfer shall affect the validity of such bond and security."

"35. The board of directors shall cause to be issued, if demanded, to any person appearing on the books of the corporation to be the owner of any shares of its stock, a certificate therefor, under the corporate seal to be signed by the president and such other officer, if any, as the board may direct; which certificate shall show the amount paid on each share.

"36. A stockholder to whom such certificate has been issued shall not be allowed to transfer the shares therein mentioned, or any part thereof, without delivering up the said certificate to the corporation to be canceled, unless the same be lost or destroyed, or sufficient cause be shown to the satisfaction of the board of directors why it cannot be produced.

"37. If any person, for valuable consideration, sell, pledge or otherwise dispose of any shares belonging to him to another, and deliver to him the certificate for such shares, with a power of attorney authorizing the transfer of the same on the books of the corporation, the title of the former shall vest in the latter so far as may be necessary to effect the sale, pledge or other disposal of the said shares, not only as between the parties themselves, but also as against the creditors of and subsequent purchaser from the former owner, but subject nevertheless to the provisions contained in the nineteenth section of this chapter."

It is to be observed that no certificates of stock are required to be issued unless demanded by some person appearing on the books of the corporation to be the owner of the shares. While a certificate, when issued, is generally deemed by the courts to be a muniment of title, our Legislature, not deeming it essential to the existence of the shares, nor expedient on the ground of public policy, has failed to require corporations to issue them, unless demanded. The demand may be made by any person appearing on the books of the corporation to be the owner of the shares. He is an owner before he acquires a certificate. The certificate is clearly only evidence of title, which exists without it and independently of it. He may exercise his own pleasure about taking a certificate. If he does accept one, however, then he is placed under restrictions as to the mode of transfer, imposed by section 36, and his transferee is given special protection by section 37. These two sections will be further discussed later on. They clearly do not inhibit a transfer without a certificate, for they only relate to stockholders who have taken certificates, and a stockholder is not bound to take a certificate in order to complete his title. They clearly do not cover the whole subject of transfer. Section 22 imposes no conditions upon the exercise of the right to transfer, except that, if a share is not fully paid up, no transfer of it shall be made without the consent of the board of directors, unless security for the residue remaining unpaid, satisfactory to the board, be given. If the board of directors consent,

It may be transferred, although not paid up nor any security given. If it is paid up, consent of the board of directors is not necessary, and the owner of it may sell it at his pleasure.

Section 21 requires the corporation to keep a transfer book "in which the shares shall be assigned under such regulations, if there be any, as may have been prescribed by the by-laws." This, no doubt, means that the names of the shareholders, together with the number of shares owned by them, respectively, shall be recorded in the book kept for that purpose, but it does not mean that the entry in that book shall be necessary to pass the title. It does not say so, and nothing but a strained construction of it could make it mean that. Nowhere in our corporation laws does it appear that any of the records required to be kept are in any sense public records. Section 43 of chapter 53 requires a list of the stockholders, showing the number of shares and votes to which each is entitled, to be hung up in the most public room at the principal office or place of business of the corporation, for one month before every annual meeting of the stockholders. Section 47 of the same chapter declares that the funds, books, correspondence, and papers of the corporation shall be at all times subject to the inspection of the board of directors or committee thereof, appointed for the purpose, or of any committee appointed for the purpose by a general meeting of the stockholders. No provision appears to give to the individual stockholder, much less a creditor of his, a creditor of the corporation, or a wholly disinterested person, the right of inspection at all times or at any time. The board of directors is required by section 46 of chapter 53 to make a report to the stockholders at the annual meeting, showing the condition of the corporation, and then declares that "the board shall furnish to each stockholder requiring it, a true copy of such report, together with a list of the stockholders and their places of residence." By section 47 of chapter 53, every stockholder has a limited right of inspection. It is only for 30 days before the annual meeting of stockholders, and extends, not to the "property and funds, books, correspondence and papers of the corporation," but only to "the minutes of the resolutions and proceedings" of the board of directors.

Not a word appears in any of the provisions just discussed from which it can reasonably be inferred that they were intended by the Legislature to vest in the general public, as creditors or otherwise, any rights by which the transfer of shares is in any way impeded or restricted. But when sections 35, 36, and 37 of chapter 53 apply, it may be different. Whether Condon ever took any certificates for the shares in question does not appear. As he could hold the shares and transfer them without certificates, the court cannot assume that he held them otherwise.

However, as the construction of these sections may be deemed to have some bearing upon the question now under consideration, certain purposes which they seem to have been intended to serve will be mentioned. Judge Holt, speaking for this court in Donnelly v. Hearndon, 41 W. Va. 519, 23 S. E. 646, after quoting sections 19 and 37 of chapter 53, said: "The manifest purpose of the statute is to permit the corporation to go by its books in ascertaining who is the owner of stock, and not require it to go out on the street and hunt them up. * * * Evidently, one of the objects of our statute cited above was to free banks and other corporations from the danger of such loose and unreliable evidence of notice of ownership of stock, by authorizing them, in their multitudinous details of affairs, to go by their books in determining the ownership of stock, in paying dividends, so long as they are acting in good faith and with reasonable care."

Sections 36 and 37 do not apply unless a certificate has been issued. That certificate is evidence against the corporation of the existence of the share and its ownership. As long as it is out of the possession of the corporation, it is a continuing affirmation by the corporation of the title and interest of the person to whom it was issued. 10 Cyc. 590. A transfer made on the books of the corporation of the shares represented by the outstanding certificate might operate as a fraud upon the rights of an innocent purchaser of the stock. They are assignable, and are sometimes said to be quasi negotiable instruments, though they are not really negotiable in the true sense of the term. 10 Cyc. 590. Nor are they generally held to be securities in the legal sense of the term (10 Cyc. 590): but they are largely so used, and our statute (section 37) makes them evidence of complete title as between the parties to the sale and of a valid pledge when they are so used. To allow a transfer on the books of the company, inconsistent with the rights evidenced by the outstanding certificate, would produce confusion and open the door to fraud. To this extent the Legislature may have intended to protect the public against fraudulent transfers on the books when certificates are outstanding; but the corporation and all its stockholders, whether holding certificates for their shares or not, have a deep interest in the subject. "The corporation has a dangerous duty to perform when stock has been attached or sold under levy of execution, and a registry is requested by the purchaser at such sale or by a purchaser of the outstanding certificate of stock. Cook, Cor. § 489.

Whether intended for the protection of the public as well as the corporation, or not, it seems clear that section 36 inhibits only a transfer upon the books of the corporation without a surrender of the certificate, and does not further restrict the power of the owner of the shares over them. It compels the officers to keep the record of shares consistent with the outstanding certificates of shares, so that neither the corporation, holders of stock, nor purchasers of shares can be prejudiced or endangered by any evidence of title made by the corporation itself.

The holder of a certificate being thus protected from any injurious action at the office of the company, his transferee of that certificate, whether purchaser or pledgee, is also protected both from the acts of the corporation by said section 36, and also from the acts of the transferor and all persons claiming under him, whether as purchasers or creditors, by the provisions of section 37, declaring that if any person sell, pledge, or otherwise dispose of any shares belonging to him to another, and deliver to him the certificate for such shares, with a power of attorney authorizing the transfer of the same on the books of the corporation, the title of the former shall vest in the latter so far as may be necessary to effect the sale, pledge, or other disposal of said shares, not only as between the parties themselves, but also as against the creditors of, and subsequent purchasers from, the former. Is there a word in the three sections by which any intent to confer any new rights upon the creditor of a stockholder is manifested? Because section 37 says the delivery of the certificate, together with a power of attorney, shall effect a complete sale or pledge as between the parties, and as to subsequent purchasers from, and creditors of, the transferor, does it follow that, without such delivery, the transferee, under a purchase for value and without fraud, would not have a title superior to the claim of a creditor of the transferor under a subsequent attachment or execution, or of a subsequent purchaser who has not himself acquired the certificate? Suppose the certificate is lost or destroyed, or not within reach when the owner of the shares represented by it wishes to pledge or sell them, and the purchaser or pledgee is willing to part with his money on the faith of a simple instrument of writing, purporting to assign the shares; can this not be done, subject to the rights of any third party who may obtain the certificate? Not a word in the statute asserts the contrary. Is it to be implied? Restrictions upon the right to make contracts are not often so established. The statute only declares what shall be the effect of making a transfer in a particular manner, leaving the parties to be governed by the general principles of law and equity, if they make it in any other way. If the transfer be made in the manner indicated, the transferee need show nothing but the certificate and power of attorney to establish a perfect title as against everybody but the corporation. Without the certificate and power of attorney he would be required to show when, under what circumstances, and for what sum of money or other valuable consideration, he became the owner. It is obvious that unless section 36, or some other provision of the statute, is to be regarded as a registration law for the protection of the public, who have no access to the books of the company, these sections are intended only to protect the corporation and those who claim under the certificates of stock. That neither section 36 nor any other section of chapter 53 is a public registration statute is made plain by what has been said in former parts of this opinion. That being true, the mode of sale mentioned in section 37 relates only to the matter of registering the transfer on the books of the corporation, for its protection and that of holders of the certificate. These observations on sections 35; 36, and 37 of chapter 53 are only made for the purpose of showing that nothing in them conflicts with the conclusion reached respecting the status of an unregistered transfer, under our statutes, when no certificate is involved, and are not to be taken as constituting a binding judicial construction of the provisions of said sections. Shares of corporation stock can only exist by virtue of a statute. Our statute, as shown, makes them property, and vests the subscribers with title before any certificate is issued, and does not require one to be issued. Owning the share without a certificate, he may sell it without one, or with one, at his election. The sale in this case was of stock for which no certificate had been issued. The jus disponendi is an incident of ownership. 10 Cyc. 577. And it may be exercised in any way not prohibited by the law. As our statute does not prescribe any mode of sale when no certificate has been issued, the owner may dispose of his share in such manner as would suffice to pass his title to any other chose in action or intangible property. The delivery of a written instrument assigning the property is clearly a symbolic delivery, if any delivery is necessary in such case.

An account for merchandise, for labor, for materials, for rent, or for any other chose in action, not evidenced by writing or acknowledgment of the debtor, may be assigned by a writing such as was signed and delivered in this case, purporting to assign the shares in question. Why is it not sufficient in this case? There can be no substantial, nor even a plausible, technical reason, as has been shown by authorities as well as by the provisions of the statute, making possible the existence of this kind of property.

In Fisher v. Essex Bank, 5 Gray, 373, holding that the statutory mode of transfer was exclusive, the statute having said shares were transferable only on the books of the bank and at the banking house, the court said: "Before any method was established by positive law, how, by what mode, or by what precise and definite act, such property should be considered as ceasing to be the property of the seller and becoming the property of the purchaser, courts of justice might well resort to the common-law modes of transferring similar incorporeal interests, and hold that a delivery of the only muni- ment of title held by the owner, with the ex- ecution and delivery of an assignment of his interest, by indorsement on the certificate or otherwise, should by analogy be held to be a valid transfer, and, when notified to the bank, should be considered as having taken effect at the date of such delivery."

As before demonstrated, the notice is only required as against subsequent purchasers.

Having no doubt about the sufficiency of the transfer to vest title in the transferee, nor as to the superiority of that title, equi- table though it may be, over the attachment lien, if acquired for value and without fraud, nothing remains to be determined but the question whether the purchase was for value and in good faith.

At a sale under a decree made by the Cir- cuit Court of the United States for the Dis- trict of West Virginia, in May, 1890, Levi Z. Condon became the purchaser of 66,000 acres, or more, of wild lands, situated in Randolph and other counties, which sale was confirmed July 1, 1890. On the 20th day of December, 1894, it appearing to the court that Condon had theretofore paid into the registry of the court the balance of purchase money, and had by deeds dated March 25, 1892, and April 1, 1892, conveyed to the Condon Lane Boom & Lumber Company, a corporation, the said lands, it was ordered that the same be conveyed to said company, and it was accordingly done. At about the time of Con- don's conveyance to the Condon Lane Boom & Lumber Company, or shortly before that time, he owned a mill on Dry Fork river, at Bretz, some miles below the timber lands, and was trying to devise some way of get- ting the timber down to that point, and de- sired to sell the hemlock bark on the lands, and with the proceeds construct, or aid in constructing, a railroad up said river to these lands. H. Stowell says Condon em- ployed him in June, 1902, to find a purchaser for the bark, agreeing to pay him $5,000 for his services upon the consummation of the sale, and that afterwards, in February, 1894, a sale of the bark to the United States Leath- er Company, at the price of $65,000, was effected as a result of his services in explor- ing the land, estimating the value of the bark, and furnishing information to the pur- chaser. The sale was made in February, 1894, and Stowell assigned his claim for the $5,000 to P. Lipscomb, who in December, 1898, proceeded against Condon in equity as a nonresident, serving the order of attach- ment on the Condon Lane Boom & Lumber Company as garnishee, and that company answered, admitting that according to its books Condon was the apparent owner of 1,300 shares of common stock and 1,250 shares of its preferred stock. Later, Albert N. Horner filed his petition, claiming to have purchased and paid for all of said stock long before the service of the order of attachment, and to have owned it at the time of said service, and still to be the owner of it. Jeff Lipscomb, administrator of P. Lips- comb, in whose name the suit was revived, said P. Lipscomb having died after insti- tuting the suit, filed an answer denying that there had been any valid purchase of the stock by Horner, and charging that no val- uable consideration passed from him for the stock; that the same was placed in the hands of Horner by Condon "for the sole and ex- press purpose of hindering, delaying, and de- frauding the said plaintiff" out of the collec- tion of said debt, as well as other creditors. He was informed and believed that no as- signment or transfer of the stock had been made until after the sending out of the at- tachment, and that then Condon and Horner conceived and executed a plan to defeat the collection of the debt, by transferring the stock after the service of the writ, and dat- ing the transfer back, "in order to give the said pretended transfer a semblance of hav- ing been done for a valuable consideration," all of which said transaction was intended to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of the said Condon, and especially "this plaintiff."

As no replication to this answer was filed, and no depositions were taken on the sub- ject-matter thereof after it was filed, it is insisted, upon the authority of Snyder v. Martin, 17 W. Va. 276, 41 Am. Rep. 670, Bierne v. Ray, 37 W. Va. 571, 16 S. E. 804, and Findlay v. Smith, 6 Munf. 142, 8 Am. Dec. 733, that the allegations of fraud on the part of Horner, contained in the answer to his petition, must be taken as true. Counsel for appellant Horner deny the correctness of this position, saying that no answer was required. For this they rely upon the lan- guage of section 23 of chapter 106 of the Code, under which the petition is filed. This section, after authorizing the filing of the petition, says: "The court, without any other pleading, shall impanel a jury to inquire into such claim."

Though originally there might have been difference of opinion as to the application of this statute to suits in equity with at- tachment, the question seems to have been settled in favor of it. In Chapman v. Rail- road Co., 26 W. Va. 324, the court seems to have approved the ruling in Anderson v. Johnson, 32 Grat. 558. That was a suit in equity founded upon an attachment, and the court held as follows: "Where persons claiming the property attached, or some in- terest in it, are admitted as parties in the cause, their claim is to be tried by a jury impaneled for the purpose, as provided by the statute (Code 1873, c. 148, § 25); and it is error for the court to pass upon the claims without the intervention of a jury." Chap- man v. Railroad Co. was also a suit in equity with an attachment, and Judge Johnson, in discussing it in view of said section of the statute, said: "If the petition shows a prima facie right in the petitioner to the property in the petition, a title better than that of the defendant, then the court should impanel a jury to inquire into the claim."

Although the inquiry now is not as to the right to a trial by jury, but as to what pleadings are necessary in a case of this kind, the two decisions just referred to and others apply the statute in question to all attachment suits, whether in equity or at law. There can be no doubt of its applicability in actions at law, and these cases foreclose any question as to the intent of the Legislature to apply it to suits in equity.

That it is competent for the Legislature to require jury trials in equity proceedings cannot be doubted. In many instances it has authorized and required courts of equity to direct issues out of chancery to the law side of the court for the determination of questions of fact proper for ascertainment by a jury. The statute governing attachment proceedings requires a trial by jury of the issue made on a plea in abatement, denying the existence of the ground upon which the attachment is sued out. Whether the proceedings are entered in the chancery order book or the law order book of the same court is more a matter of form than substance, though it is sometimes error not to enter it in the latter. State v. Irwin, 30 W. Va. 404, 4 S. E. 413. In section 23, providing for intervention by third parties, the Legislature may have intended a direction of an issue and trial by jury in all cases, whether the title set up was legal or equitable in its nature. But if it were an open question it might well be doubted whether the Legislature did so intend, and whether it was intended, when the proceeding is in equity, to alter the rules of pleading, and limit the pleadings to the petition alone.

The statutory provision in question appears for the first time in the Code of 1849. The object of the amendment is stated by the revisers in their report (page 761) as follows: "This section, as altered from the present law, will close the question whether a suit in equity is not necessary when a party claims under a subsequent attachment." Up to that time the statute had made no provision for any third party who desired to dispute the validity of the plaintiff's attachment, or who desired to assert a lien on the attached property under any other attachment or otherwise. The provision was as follows: "Whenever the goods and chattels, taken by virtue of any attachment, shall be claimed by any person, other than such debtor, the court shall immediately, (unless good cause be shown by either party for a continuance,) direct a jury to be impanelled to enquire into the right of property." Code 1819, c. 123, § 16. That chapter relates to both foreign attachments in equity and attachments at law; but the distinction between the two kinds of proceedings seems to be very clearly marked, and said section 16 seems to be applicable to the latter only.

The doubt and uncertainty alluded to by the revisers is exemplified in Erskine v. Staley, 12 Leigh, 406, and Moore v. Holt, 10 Grat. 284. Both of these cases arose before the amendment of the attachment statute adverted to, and their nature is indicated by point 1 of the syllabus in Moore v. Holt, which reads as follows: "Process in a foreign attachment is served upon a garnishee having property of the absent debtor in his hands, and afterwards other creditors sue out attachments at law against the same party as an absconding debtor, which are served upon the same garnishee, and, before the foreign attachment is ready for a hearing, they obtain judgments and an order for the sale of the property in the hands of the garnishee. The plaintiff in the foreign attachment may amend his bill and enjoin the same." In that case the court very clearly points out the difference between foreign attachment in equity as it existed in Virginia at that time, and the statutory attachment in equity and at law which now obtains in Virginia and this state. In foreign attachment, the process, with an indorsement on it in the nature of an attachment, created a lien, although no affidavit at all had been filed; but to authorize the officer to take the effects out of the hands of the garnishee, or require him to give security to have the same forthcoming, an affidavit was necessary. For the amount and nature of the claim, reference was had to the bill. The bill and process with the indorsement give a lien. Hence the title was drawn into the main suit. The bill asked for subjection of the property to satisfaction of the debt, and brought it within the jurisdiction of the court. In an action at law the property came into the case by reason of the levy of the attachment only. All this suggests the quære whether the legislative object was not merely to enable a lienholder, by execution or otherwise, and the person claiming an equitable title to the attached property in a proceeding at law, to assert his claim in a court of law—a thing which he could not do, or to do which his right before the amendment was doubtful—and not to work any change whatever in the rules governing the pleadings, when the suit in which the attachment is sued out is in equity. It is to be observed that Judge Moncure's discussion of the subject in Anderson v. Johnson is limited to a single paragraph of about a half dozen lines, and makes no reference whatever to the history of the subject or reason of the amendment. Nor does Judge Johnson enter upon any examination of it. Moreover, I see no good reason why it may not here be held that the parties, by going into equity, have waived the right to a trial at law, since fraud, the real core of the controversy, is always a matter of equity cognizance. Though not free from doubt as to the proper construction of the section, I yield to the views of the other members of the court, who are satisfied with the interpretation which the Virginia court has given the statute, and which this court has approved, as already stated.

Under a misapprehension of the law, superinduced by the action of the parties, the court treated the petition of Horner as a cross-bill, and heard the matters in difference between him and the attaching creditor upon it and the answer thereto, and upon the depositions taken and filed by the parties. In bringing the case on to be heard, the decree contains the usual recitals, except that it refers to the agreement between the parties, upon which also it was heard. This is an agreement entered into between Horner and the plaintiff, authorizing the filing of Horner's petition with the clerk of the court in vacation, and the answer of the plaintiff to the petition within 40 days from the date of the agreement, and providing that thereafter the parties might go on "and take their proof upon said petition just as if the same had been filed in court, and mature the same for hearing; but either party shall have a right to object to any pleading or proof just as if the same were filed in court." In an effort to be more explicit the parties repeated the agreement in the following terms: "All legal objections which either party may have to any pleading or evidence are reserved for the consideration of the court, and the hearing of said petition shall be had just as though the same and the bond of the plaintiff and the answer of the plaintiff had been tendered in open court for the action of the court; and it is further agreed that the parties may take such legal and proper proof upon legal notice as they have a right to take."

Assuming either that the statute did not contemplate a trial at law of the matters in difference between the petitioner and the plaintiff, or that, if it did, they might elect to try according to the rules of equity procedure, depositions were taken and filed, and the court disposed of the case as one in equity. Considered as a trial at law by the court in lieu of a jury, how does the case stand? No witnesses were produced and examined to prove the contention of either party. No ground is shown for the use of depositions instead of oral testimony of witnesses. Had objection been made, the depositions could not properly have been used, and there was no evidence before the court. However, counsel for appellant now insists that the action of the court shall be treated as a trial at law, and the depositions to prove his petition as having been properly admitted. The court, erroneously treating the proceeding as governed by the rules of equity practice, regarded the allegations of fraud in the answer as true, and entered a decree for the plaintiff. This operated a complete surprise upon the petitioner. To permit him now to turn the proceeding into one at law, and give him the benefit of his depositions, would work an equally great surprise upon the plaintiff. Hence it is plain that, under a misconception of the nature of the proceeding, there has been a mistrial, operating injustice to both parties. The plaintiff has had no opportunity to interpose objections to the introduction of petitioner's evidence irregularly taken and introduced. The petitioner has been unwittingly drawn into a trap which denies him the benefit of his evidence on merely technical grounds. The principle announced in Echols v. Tracewell, 52 W. Va. 614, 44 S. E. 164, and in Armstrong v. Grafton, 23 W. Va. 50, is well adapted to situations of this kind, and its application will enable the parties to have a fair trial under proper rulings by the court. On the theory of a misconception of the case by both counsel and the court, in consequence of which there had been no fair trial, the appellate court reversed the decrees in those two cases, and remanded them. Viewed from this point of observation, the vice of the proceeding is the adoption of a wrong mode of trial, and the application to the trial of improper rules of procedure.

That the case was heard on the agreement does not relieve from the effect of this irregularity. The parties reserved the right to make all proper objections to the pleadings and evidence, and, under the rules governing the mode of trial adopted, no objections would have been entertained. Hence it was useless to make any. We cannot assume that the appellee would have relied upon the want of a replication, or failed to object to the introduction of depositions, without grounds therefor having been shown, had he been informed that the trial was at law instead of in equity. He agreed that proof might be taken under the apprehension that the proceeding was governed by the rules of equity pleading and practice. This is manifest from the terms of the agreement. Therefore he cannot be said to have consented to the use of the depositions on a trial at law, and in fact, as well as in law, the record shows there never was any such trial.

The position of counsel for appellant is open to another serious objection. The record does not show any express waiver of a jury by the appellee. The decision is in his favor. Appellant would reverse the decree, and then have the court render, against the appellee, a new decree, such as, in the opinion of counsel for appellant, the court below should have entered. While an adjudication in favor of the appellee, without the waiver of a jury, might stand, because he cannot be prejudiced thereby, one against him might be fatally erroneous for want of such waiver. In decreeing against him this court is bound to notice and protect his rights. That a jury may be waived is beyond doubt, but the Legislature has seen fit to prescribe the manner in which such waiver shall be shown, namely, by consent of the parties or their counsel entered of record. Section 29 of chapter 116 of the Code of 1899. This statute was put in the Code of 1849 upon the recommendation of the revisers, at a time when the constitutional guaranty of jury trial was in a form different from that in which it now appears; but the alteration in its language makes it no less sacred, and our lawmakers have not exercised their discretion to dispense with the statutory requirement as to the manner in which such waiver shall be evidenced. Through all the mutations of our organic and other laws, they have suffered the statute to remain wholly unaltered, and its provisions have been uniformly observed down to the present time, so far as the reported decisions of this court disclose. For more than half a century the statute has stood, working no inconvenience, and yet effectually guarding this most important and sacred right of the citizen against inadvertent and inconsiderate waiver. In view of all this, it would be clearly contrary to legislative intent, and a violent innovation upon our settled practice, to permit any form of waiver different from that prescribed by the statute. None of our decisions seem to countenance any authority in the court to try civil and misdemeanor cases except when the record shows a waiver by consent. King v. Burdette, 12 W. Va. 688; Ramsburg v. Erb, 16 W. Va. 777; Bank v. Hamilton, 43 W. Va. 75, 27 S. E. 296. In some jurisdictions there is a presumption of waiver when the record is silent on the subject (17 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 1103, 1109); but, where the mode of waiver is prescribed by statute, that mode is generally held to be exclusive (17 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law 1099).

In a trial upon the petition it will be competent for a jury, or the court trying in lieu of a jury, to inquire into the bona fides of Horner's purchase. Fraud, if proven, will vitiate the sale, and it is within the legislative power to dispense with a plea or other specification setting it up by way of defense on the question of title. "It is as competent for a jury to investigate fraud as a chancellor. The evidence to sustain actual fraud must be the same, in substance and effect, in one forum that it is in another." Baltimore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Lafferty, 2 W. Va. 104; Baltimore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Lafferty, 14 Grat. 478; Jones v. Wood, 16 Pa. 25; Wilson v. R. R. Co., 11 Gill & J. 58.

For the reasons aforesaid, the decree must be reversed, and the cause remanded for trial upon the petition of the appellant Horner, in accordance with the principles herein stated, and for further proceedings according to the rules and principles of equity.

HOLSBERRY et al. v. HARRIS et al.*(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 29, 1904.)GIFT OF LAND—EVIDENCE—POSSESSION BY SON—IMPROVEMENTS—LACHES.

1. The possession by a son of land belonging to his father, even when accompanied by valuable improvements, will not be treated as sufficient evidence of a gift because the relation between the parties prevents the inference which would otherwise arise from the fact, and removes all necessity of accounting for the possession by the supposition of an existing contract.

2. Such possession of a son under an alleged gift must be definite and exclusive, and not concurrent with the father.

3. As between father and son, the mere physical fact of possession is not of itself conclusive, nor even material.

4. The evidence in case of a parol gift from father to child should be direct, positive, express, and unambiguous, and its terms clearly defined. Loose declarations of the father, without explanation, are not sufficient evidence of a gift.

5. Improvements to amount of $500 or $600 made on premises occupied by a son by the sufferance of his father for a period of 30 years—the principal part of such improvements made after full notice to the occupant by the father that he would not give him the land upon which the improvements were so made—will not entitle the son to compensation for such improvements.

6. A court of equity will not assist one who has slept upon his rights, and shows no excuse for his laches in asserting them.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by Henry Holsberry and others against Priscilla C. Harris and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Priscilla Harris appeals. Reversed.

Melville Peck and W. T. George, for appellant. J. Hop Woods, for appellees.

McWHORTER, J. Martin Holsberry was a farmer living at Kalamazoo, in Barbour county, and owned a farm situated at the junction of the Meadowsville and Philippl roads, containing about 230 acres, made up of two tracts—one of 135 acres, conveyed to him by his father, John Holsberry, and another tract, of about 108 acres, conveyed to him by John Poling; the former deed from John Holsberry being dated in 1859, and the one from Poling in 1854. The 230 acres composing the said two tracts were known as "Martin Holsberry's Home Farm." Some time in 1877 or 1878 Martin Holsberry gave to his son Henry Holsberry, and conveyed to him, 32 acres from the tract of 135 acres so conveyed to Martin by his father. This piece, which was conveyed as 32 acres, turned out, on being surveyed, to be 50 acres. In 1870 Henry Holsberry was married, and in 1871 went onto another portion of said 230 acres, occupying a small log house, of one room, which he continued to occupy until 1892, with the exception of about two years, when he lived in another house on a tract conveyed to him about 1875 or 1876 by I. V. Johnson. In 1892 he repaired and added to the house, enlarging it, which improvement he completed in 1893. He also built two small granaries, a little stable, a small storehouse, and dug a well on the property. In 1895 Henry Holsberry sold his two tracts of land, and left the property where he had lived, and removed to Elk City, where he purchased a farm, upon which he continues to live. On the 16th day of October, 1902, Martin Holsberry conveyed to his daughter Priscilla Catherine Harris, wife of Ira Harris, the said home farm, of 230 acres, more or less, for and during her lifetime, and remainder to her children by her husband, Ira Harris. On the 30th of October, 1902, Martin Holsberry departed this life. At the January rules, 1903, Henry Holsberry filed his bill in equity against Priscilla Harris, her four infant children, and Margaret B. Stalnaker, alleging the gift to him by his father, Martin Holsberry, of 30 acres of land lying immediately within the angle of the said two roads, of which his said father had placed him in possession, and promised and assured plaintiff that the same should be and become his, and advised and directed plaintiff to erect upon the same the buildings and fixtures mentioned in the bill, with the assurance and promise to plaintiff that plaintiff's use and occupancy thereof thereunder should operate and vest title in plaintiff as fully and completely as if same was vested in him by conveyance; that, relying upon said promise and assurance, plaintiff took possession thereof, with the full knowledge, consent, and direction of his father, and first built thereon in the year 1882 a storeroom costing $200, wherein plaintiff carried on the mercantile business from the year 1882 until the year 1894, and wherein said Ira Harris, the husband of the defendant Priscilla Harris, now carries on the same business as the tenant by sufferance of plaintiff; that afterwards plaintiff built a dwelling house 36 feet long by 18 feet wide, with a two-story ell and kitchen, costing about $1,500, which was completed in the year 1893; that about the same time, or soon after, he erected on said land two granaries costing $33, a stable costing $100, and built a stone wall and made an earthen fill costing $25, had finished a well costing $25, and set out fruit trees and made other improvements thereon, and occupied the same as a home for himself and family until the year 1895, when he left the said land and moved to his present home in Elk district, and, at the instance and special request of his father, left the property to be rented by him for plaintiff, and to account to plaintiff for the rents and profits thereof, reserving the right, at the will of plaintiff, to his father, to use one room of said dwelling house as a granary or storeroom for himself; that the decedent had never paid plaintiff anything on said expenditures, or ever made him any advancements, except to the extent of about $600 in the way of money and personal property, and the conveyance to him of the said tract of land, which plaintiff afterwards sold for $500, its full value; that when his father on the 16th of October, 1902, made the conveyance to Priscilla Harris, he was then living with her, and was then 79 years of age, and describing the farm so conveyed "as the home farm of decedent, whereon he resided, containing 230 acres, more or less"; that said farm then contained 230 acres, exclusive of the 30 acres given to plaintiff, and which was formerly a parcel thereof, and that he did not intend by said conveyance to, and did not in fact, embrace the said 30 acres so given to plaintiff; and prayed that so much of the deed of October 16, 1902, as might be supposed to embrace said 30 acres, bounded and described by a plat filed with the bill, be set aside as a cloud upon the right and title of the plaintiff thereto, and a commissioner be appointed to convey same to plaintiff, or, in default thereof for any reason, plaintiff might have a decree, to be charged as a lien thereon, for the full amount and value of his buildings and improvements, with interest to date, and his costs. The infant defendants, by their guardian ad litem, filed their answer, and the defendant Priscilla Harris filed her answer, denying the material allegations of the bill. Plaintiff filed his amended bill, joining with him as plaintiffs David Ruckman and Cora Stalnaker Ruckman, against the same party defendants as mentioned in the original bill, making the original bill a part thereof, alleging that David Ruckman and Cora Ruckman are husband and wife, respectively; that Cora was the tenant by sufferance, by the month, at a dollar per month, in possession of said parcel of said 30 acres of land, including the buildings of said plaintiff, Henry Holsberry, by parol lease, and claiming under him, and subject to disseisin at his will, said Cora making no claim against him to the contrary; that, after the institution of this suit, Priscilla Harris had brought an action against said Cora before a justice, in unlawful detainer, for the possession of said property; and praying for an injunction against her prosecution of said action, which injunction was granted. To which amended bill the defendant Priscilla Harris filed her demurrer and answer, denying that the Ruckmans, or either of them, were tenants of the plaintiff, and that, if they (the Ruckmans) admitted such tenancy, it was fraudulent, and was done for the purpose of trying to defraud respondent and the other defendants out of said land; denying that said Cora Ruckman had any defense to respondent's action of unlawful detainer; denying that Henry Holsberry ever had any title to any of the property mentioned in the bill or amended bill, either legal or equitable, or that Cora Ruckman or her husband, David Ruckman, were ever in possession of more than a portion of said dwelling house and one stall in the stable, which they once had, but did not have at the institution of the action of unlawful detainer; that Martin Holsberry never promised to give and never did give the property mentioned in the bills of plaintiff to the said plaintiff; and alleging that the rents of said premises were never collected by plaintiff, nor were they ever collected for him by any one; that plaintiff used said premises while he lived there; and averred that the rents of the same were worth much more than the costs of the improvements that he made; that plaintiff never paid any taxes on said land, but that the taxes were always paid by Martin Holsberry upon this land, as a part of his home farm; and that, after plaintiff moved from said premises, Martin Holsberry rented and collected the rents therefor up to the time he conveyed the same to respondent and the other defendants for himself, and not for Henry Holsberry. Depositions of many witnesses both for plaintiff and defendant were taken and filed in the cause, and on the 5th day of June, 1903, the same was brought on for hearing, when the court decreed that the defendants Priscilla O. Harris and Margaret B. Stalnaker, sole heirs with the plaintiff of the decedent, Martin Holsberry, do convey and release to the plaintiff their several interests, as said heirs of Martin Holsberry, in and to that certain parcel of land in said bill and amended bill mentioned, supposed to contain about 80 acres, particularly mentioned and described by the plat filed with said bill, and, upon their failure to make such deed, appointing a special commissioner to make the same in their behalf, and perpetually enjoined and restrained Priscilla Harris from prosecuting her said action of unlawful detainer against said Cora Ruckman for said 80 acres, and decreed costs to plaintiff against Priscilla C. Harris, from which decree Priscilla Harris appealed to this court.

This is a suit to enforce the specific performance of a parol gift, and depends entirely on oral testimony. There is not a writing of any kind, and, as to the nature of the possession given plaintiff by his father, Martin Holsberry, there is no testimony except that of the plaintiff, which was incompetent, under section 23 of chapter 130, Code 1899. Verbal admissions made by his father, Martin Holsberry, are sought to be proved to establish the fact that Martin had given him the property, and that he intended him to have it. Andrew V. Stalnaker testifies that, when he moved plaintiff Ruckman into the house, Martin referred to it as Henry's house, and that by general report in the community it was called Henry Holsberry's property. Virginia Holsberry, plaintiff's wife, testified that Martin Holsberry told her husband he should have the land; "said for him to build a storehouse, and that he would make him a right for the land around there." Idera Talbott, daughter of plaintiff Holsberry, testified that she heard Martin say "he intended to make a right to my father for all these buildings, and the ground around them; that he never intended to see him lose anything he put on there"—and states that when Henry Holsberry was moving from Kalamazoo to Elk City, Martin Holsberry "asked papa what he should do with the buildings—if he should rent them. Papa said, 'Rent them,' and he said, 'All right; I will rent them and give you the rent.'" Margaret B. Stalnaker says her father, Martin Holsberry, always referred to the property as Henry's property. M. F. Stalnaker states that, in a conversation with Martin Holsberry, "he told me in the year of 1895, the last of February or the first of March, while standing between his house and the post office, that he intended to give Henry Holsberry, taking in the long meadow, enough to include his buildings, and running to John Holsberry's line, and then he intended for Henry to take his property and put it on his own land, and Henry could run his, and he would run his own," which he says would embrace the land in dispute in this suit. A. W. Stalnaker says Martin Holsberry told him that "he intended to give Henry on that side of the road, including his buildings," and heard him "call it 'Henry's house' and 'Henry's store.'" Another witness, Garrett Nestor, said he heard Martin say he intended the property for Henry. Stelle Holsberry, another daughter of plaintiff, says her grandfather Martin Holsberry "said he had told papa to go ahead and build; that he intended the buildings and land around them for him. He was plowing in the meadow in front of our door. I was taking him a drink of water." The most improbable story, however, is told by David Ruckman, one of the plaintiffs in the amended bill, when he says in his testimony, "I have heard Mrs. Harris' children call it 'Uncle Henry's property.'" Quite likely, when it appears from the deposition of the plaintiff himself that Mrs. Harris' four children range in age from the eldest, eight years, down to two years! Several disinterested witnesses testify that they heard conversations between Martin Holsberry and plaintiff which were entirely the opposite of that claimed by plaintiff. Witness A. C. Keller says that he heard Martin Holsberry, in the storehouse at Kalamazoo, tell his son Henry Holsberry "not to build the house on the land where he did. If he did, he built it at his own risk. He told him to go and build the house upon his own land." He further testified: "Henry says to him that he wanted to tear an old chimney down that was there. He says 'No, Henry, I am not going to have the chimney torn down,' and that that was about the way the conversation started"—and explained that this was the chimney to the back of the house in which Henry lived, and that the chimney stands there yet. Solomon S. Skidmore testified that he was working for Henry Holsberry, who requested him to go and ask his "pap" if he had ever made him a deed for any land there. "He said 'No,' he never allowed to; he had given him all he expected to give him. He said he did not want any house put up there, and, if he wanted to build, to go and build on his own land. He said he did not want any fine house there, and he said that he was sharp enough, when he set his orchard out, to set it on his own land, that he had given him." When asked if Martin Holsberry recounted to him there or mentioned to him what he had already given to his son, he said he had given him 50 acres of land on the upper end, which now is called the "David Poling Land," and helped him to pay for what was called the "Sam Poling Place." About $1,100 it had cost them. He said he had put about $500 in the store for Henry, and said at that time that he did not want any fine house put up there to pay taxes on; that he went back and told Henry what his father had said to him, and stated that that was before he built the house. Witness P. M. Godwin relates a conversation he had with plaintiff. Says he asked plaintiff, "Doesn't this land belong to you, where you are?" He says, 'I have no deed for it, but I think pap will make me a deed some time,' and says he thinks this was before the house was repaired. Felix Skidmore gave a conversation he heard between Martin Holsberry and Henry Holsberry, and says: "I was at Uncle Mart's, working for him, and Henry come there in the house at night or late in the evening, and he had hauled a load of lumber that day—Henry had—and Uncle Mart asked him what he was going to do with it, and he said that he was going to build that house, or repair it, in which he lived; and Uncle Mart told him that he had better build on his own. Henry said, 'Why?' and he said, 'Build on your own;' and he said, 'I have given you all that I expect to give you. Go and build on the land which I gave you.'" He says, "Henry told him that he thought he ought to have it; when Martin told him that he could not have it; that he had given him all that he allowed to give him." H. J. Poling testified that he was at the store at Kalamazoo, and Henry came there, and called his father out in the yard, and asked him if he could not put some of his wheat in that house. Martin said, "Yes; you can put some grain in one room in the loft. We have grain in the rooms below, and we have them occupied." Ira Harris states that when Henry Holsberry left the house, in 1895, he asked "his father, Martin Holsberry, to leave a part of his stuff in a part of that house. He said that he had quite a lot of work to do over on his farm that he had bought, and, if he hadn't any objections, that he would like to leave some of his stuff in one room of the house until he could get time to come after it. Martin Holsberry told him that it would be all right to leave it there till he got his work straightened up so that he could come after it." He stated that Henry Holsberry delivered the key of that house to his father when he left, and that Martin Holsberry had the keys until his death; that one of the keys he did not have all the time; J. W. Baylor had it a while, and since that time David Ruckman had had it part of the time; that Priscilla Harris has had the keys since Martin Holsberry's death, except the one David Ruckman had; that Henry Holsberry never called for or demanded the keys after the death of his father. He further stated that Henry took from the house seven windows. He took all the paper and canvas down, with the exception of one room. That room was papered without any canvas, and he could not get that down. He also took the finishing off of the portico. He says that Henry Holsberry's house had burned down, and he came up after the remainder of the doors and windows, and, in order to keep them in the house, witness paid him for them $26.24.

I have given substantially the testimony, as far as the declarations of Martin Holsberry are concerned, touching his intentions as to giving Henry the property. The most important witnesses on behalf of plaintiff are his wife and daughters and his coplaintiff, Ruckman, who was interested in preventing the further prosecution of the unlawful detainer case which he had enjoined under the amended bill. There is no allegation in the bill that Martin Holsberry ever agreed or promised to make plaintiff a deed for the property, yet plaintiff attempts to prove by his wife and daughters that he said he would make Henry "a right to it." Plaintiff fails to prove sole and exclusive possession of the property, as witnesses prove that they worked at harvesting and other work on the lands claimed by plaintiff, in the employment of Martin Holsberry. Indeed the whole tenor of the evidence is to the effect that Martin Holsberry's possession was never interrupted by Henry, except, perhaps, as to the house alone, which was occupied by Henry and his family, and that seemed to be by the mere sufferance of his father; and the circumstances plainly show that when he left it he had no thought of claiming any further the right to retain possession. And when his house was burned at Elk City, he desired to have the windows and doors from the house he had left, to assist in rebuilding. His removal of the paper from the walls, which was put up on canvas, and otherwise dismantling the house, is strong evidence of his abandonment of it. If he was claiming it in good faith as his own, why did he delay to bring his suit for so many years, in the face of the fact that his father frequently informed him that he did not propose to let him have the property, but waited until his father's death before bringing it?

The appellee contends that, the evidence being conflicting, the case is brought within the rule of the case of Doonan v. Glynn, 28 W. Va. 715: "Where the decree sought to be reversed is based upon depositions which are so conflicting and of such a doubtful and unsatisfactory character that different minds and different judges might reasonably disagree as to the facts proven by them, the appellate court will decline to reverse the decree, though the testimony may be such that it might have pronounced a different decree if it had acted upon the case in the first instance." I do not understand that a case of this character can be brought within that rule. In Lorentz v. Lorentz, 14 W. Va. 761 (Syl., point 2), it is held: "Such contracts, before they can be enforced in a court of equity, must be established by competent and satisfactory proof, which must be clear, definite, and certain." In this case the declarations of the old man Lorentz that he intended this for Catherine and her children were more clearly proven than those of Martin Holsberry; and it was even proved by one witness that Lorentz had acknowledged a deed therefor before him, but it was not proved what became of it. In this case it was alleged that the elder Lorentz had agreed and promised to convey the land to his son's wife and children. Many declarations of Lorentz were proved, that he intended to give the land to his son's wife and children; that he intended it for them; that he had made a deed to them, etc.; but it was held insufficient to prove the contract. Plaintiff here does not allege in his bill that his father ever promised to convey the land to him, but that he "promised and assured plaintiff that the same should be and become his," and "advised and directed plaintiff to erect upon the same the buildings and fixtures hereinafter mentioned, with the assurance and promise to plaintiff that plaintiff's use and occupancy thereof thereunder should operate and vest title in plaintiff as fully and completely as if the same were vested in him by formal conveyance." There is no evidence except that of the plaintiff himself to support this allegation of the bill. When Martin Holsberry made a gift of the 32 acres, which proved to be 50 acres, he conveyed the same to him by proper deed. It is strange, indeed, if he ever intended to give him this land, that he would allow him to occupy it 30 years, and in the meantime make to him a conveyance of another tract adjoining it, and not include both parcels in the same deed. Plaintiff was living on this 30 acres long prior to the time of the conveyance to him by his father of the 50 acres. This is one circumstance tending strongly to show that Martin did not intend to convey to Henry the 30 acres. Another is the location of the 30 acres—being right in the heart of his farm; and, according to the evidence of several of the witnesses, such a division would be very injurious to the farm, and not such as would be likely to be made by any person owning the same. As stated by witness David Poling: "It would be the ruination of the farm. * * * It would cut the farm right in two, and throw the building right at one edge. * * * It would take all of the water off of that end of the farm. * * * I would consider that it would nearly ruin that end of the farm." And William J. Poling, in his testimony, speaking of such division, says: "I would not think it would be a division that any person owning the farm would be likely to make. I think it would be a damage to the rest of it on account of the water."

In Harrison v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 556, 15 S. E. 87 (Syl., point 3), it is held: "Where a son goes into possession of his father's land, and makes inexpensive improvements, it is not to be inferred therefrom, in the absence of other evidence, that the father gave the son the land. Neither are loose declarations of the father, without explanation, sufficient evidence of a gift. A contract between a parent and child, from the nature of the relation, requires to be proved by a kind of evidence much stronger than that which might suffice between strangers. The evidence, in case of a parol gift from father to child, should be direct, positive, express, and unambiguous, and its terms clearly defined." In treating of specific performance of oral contracts, Pom. on Con. (2d Ed.) § 121, says: "The possession must be definite and exclusive. It must unequivocally show what land is possessed, and that it is possessed by the purchaser exclusively, and not concurrently with the vendor. It must, in short, indicate the commencement of a new interest or estate." Miller v. Lorentz, 39 W. Va. 160, 19 S. E. 391; Gallagher v. Gallagher, 31 W. Va. 9, 5 S. E. 297. There was no such definite, exclusive possession in the case at bar. Many of the witnesses who worked for Martin Holsberry testify that he farmed the so-called disputed land the same as the rest of the farm while Henry lived in the house—notably, three of the Polings and Felix Skidmore. "As between father and son, the mere physical fact of possession is not of itself conclusive, nor even material. * * * For example, the possession by a son of land belonging to his father, even when accompanied by valuable improvements, will not be treated as a part performance, because the relation between the parties prevents the inference which would otherwise arise from the fact, and removes all necessity of accounting for the possession by the supposition of an existing contract." Pom. on Con. § 116, and authorities there cited. As to the improvements placed upon the land by the plaintiff, the evidence as well as the circumstances show that they were placed there for the convenience of plaintiff while he should remain. The lumber was all taken from the home farm of Martin Holsberry, and the principal improvement—the repairing or remodeling of the dwelling house—was put there after Martin Holsberry had distinctly told him to build upon his own land; that he did not want a fine house put up there to pay taxes on; and, further, that he had given him all he intended to give him. It is further clear that plaintiff set up claim for improvements grossly in excess of what they cost. In his bill he alleges the cost of the house alone to be about $1,500, and in his testimony in chief at $1,888 for all the improvements. Then in rebuttal he testifies: “I have made an estimate. The amount is $2,138.98.” And on cross-examination, in giving items in minute detail, he made the whole, when summed up, amount to less than $500, which he said made a difference from his estimate of $1,638.98. On redirect examination or rebuttal his attention was called to the cost of boarding hands, which he said was not included, and that he had estimated that that item alone amounted to $250. It would seem that this item was about in keeping with his estimate of the whole at over $2,100. The workmen who put up the house and assisted in making the improvements put the cost at about what Henry Holsberry’s itemized estimate on cross-examination made it. It cannot be inferred from the fact that Henry Holsberry was living upon the land, and making small improvements for his own convenience, that the father had given him the land. The evidence in case of a parol gift from father to child should be direct, positive, express, and unambiguous, and its terms clearly defined. Loose declarations of the father, without explanation, are not sufficient evidence of a gift. Harrison v. Harrison, supra. Improvements to the amount of $500 or $600 on real estate of the father occupied 30 years by the son by the sufferance of the father, and the principal part of such improvements made after full notice that the father would not give him the land upon which the improvements were made, will not entitle the son to compensation for such improvements.

It is contended that laches will bar plaintiff’s claim for specific performance. Henry Holsberry abandoned or left the premises in 1895. The refusal of his father to give him the land had been prior to his repairing or remodeling the house, which was the greater part of the improvements made by him. His father lived until the 30th of October, 1902, more than seven years after Henry left the place. His cause of action, if any he had, existed long prior to his father’s death. Plaintiff brought his suit within a very few weeks after the death of his father. Why was it not brought in his lifetime? The fair presumption is that he was not sure of his ability to overcome the defense that the father would interpose. So he would wait until his father’s lips were sealed in death, and while this, under the statute, seals his own lips also, as touching any personal transaction or communication between himself and his father, yet, being a competent witness in some things involved in the cause, he hoped to be able to get down upon paper in his deposition in the cause, although under objections and exceptions, his version of the matter. In Whittaker v. Improvement Co., 34 W. Va. 217, 12 S. E. 507 (Syl., point 4), it is held: “The defense of laches may be made by demurrer when the facts manifesting it appear in the bill.” In Phillips v. Coal Co., 53 W. Va. 548, 44 S. E. 774 (Syl., point 1), 97 Am. St. Rep. 1040: “A bill is bad on demurrer when it appears therefrom that there have been unreasonable delay and laches on the part of the complainant in asserting the rights which are sought to be enforced.” Plaintiff in his bill alleges that he was placed in actual possession and control of the 30 acres in 1882 under the promise of the father that he would give him the land, and yet it was 20 years afterwards before he undertook to enforce his rights, and 8 years of that time the same was in the exclusive control of his father. Point 2 of syllabus, Phillips v. Coal Co., supra, holds: “A court of equity will not assist one who has slept upon his rights, and shows no excuse for his laches in asserting them.” Spedel v. Henrici, 120 U. S. 377, 7 Sup. Ct. 610, 30 L. Ed. 718; Trader v. Jarvis, 23 W. Va. 101; Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 470 (Syl., point 7); Kelly v. McQuinn, 42 W. Va. 774, 26 S. E. 517 (Syl., points 2, 3); Bill v. Schilling, 39 W. Va. 108, 19 S. E. 514.

For the reasons herein given, the decree complained of is reversed, annulled, and set aside, and the plaintiff’s bill dismissed.

(56 W. Va. 372)

WILSON v. BRADEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1904.)

SEAL—SUFFICIENCY—COPY—ACKNOWLEDGMENT —ANCIENT DEED—ADVERSE POSSESSION—BURDEN OF PROOF—WILD LANDS.

1. Where a copy of a deed is offered in evidence having a certificate of acknowledgment certified by the officer as under his official seal, and the clerk, in copying, appends to such officer’s official signature the word “Seal,” such word will be presumptively held to represent such officer’s official seal, and such copy is properly admitted in evidence over such objection.

2. The fact that a justice taking an acknowledgment signs the certificate as justice and alderman will not vitiate such certificate, but his official designation as alderman will be regarded as surplusage.

3. Recitals of heirship and widowhood in deeds upwards of 30 years old, under which possession has been continuously held, are presumptive evidence of the truth of the same, and admissible against strangers to the title claiming adversely.

4. An adverse claimant of title under the statute of limitations must show actual, notorious, visible, open, continuous, and exclusive possession for the statutory period, and his possession, to be continuous, must be such as will permit the superior claimant to sue him as a trespasser at any time during the period. Unless he makes out a prima facie case of such unbroken, continuous possession on demurrer to evidence, the judgment should be against him.

5. There can be no adverse possession of wild lands as against a superior title, unless such possession is actual, exclusive, visible, and notorious. A mere claim to possession, accompanied by the occasional cutting of timber, the prevention of trespasses, the payment of taxes, and the assertion of title, is not sufficient, but it must be such occupation, use, or holding of the property, or change in its character, as will make such claimant, during such statutory period, continuously subject to be treated as a trespasser by the holder of the superior title constructively or actually in possession of such land. Such claim of possession does not amount to an ouster of the superior claimant.

Error from Circuit Court, Ritchie County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Action by Henry S. Wilson against George W. Braden and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

W. N. Miller, for plaintiffs in error. V. B. Archer, Wm. Beard, S. Robinson, and H. B. Woods, for defendant in error.

DENT, J. Henry S. Wilson, plaintiff, obtained a writ of error from a judgment of the circuit court of Ritchie county in a suit in ejectment in favor of George Braden and Hester Deem, awarding them title to two certain tracts of land claimed by the plaintiff. The case was here before (48 W. Va. 196, 36 S. E. 367), and a judgment for the same defendants was reversed, and a new trial awarded. A new trial being had, the plaintiff having proved his title and possession thereunder, and the defendants having set up possession under color of title for more than 10 years, the plaintiff demurred to the evidence, in which the defendants joined. On a conditional verdict the court found for the defendants, and gave judgment accordingly. It is now well established that on a demurrer to the evidence the court will consider the whole evidence as though on a verdict in favor of the demurrees, and will not reverse the judgment unless the evidence is insufficient to sustain the same. Bowman v. Dewing & Sons, 50 W. Va. 446, 40 S. E. 576; Lewis v. C. & O. R. R. Co., 47 W. Va. 656, 35 S. E. 908, 81 Am. St. Rep. 816.

The first question that arises on demurrer is as to whether the plaintiff has made his title clear, either by a complete chain from the commonwealth of Virginia or by possession under color of title for the statutory period. If he has not done one or both of these, his demurrer was properly overruled. The plaintiff traces his title back to the commonwealth of Virginia through a patent issued by the Governor to William Tilton, assignee of Michael Ryan, dated August 4, 1785.

The first objection to plaintiff's title is that the copy of the deed from Charles E. Applegate and wife to Henry S. Wilson has the word "Seal" after notary's signature to the acknowledgment, instead of some words to indicate it to have been his official seal. The notary certifies the certificate to be under his "official seal." The clerk, in copying, presumably considered the word "seal" sufficient to show that the official seal was affixed. In the case of Miller v. Holt, 47 W. Va. 10, 34 S. E. 956, this very objection was considered and overruled, and rightly so, for the word "seal" must have been annexed to the notary's signature to represent his official seal, and not his private seal. The same objection is made to several of the title deeds, but it is untenable, and was properly overruled.

The objection is made to the certificate of acknowledgment to the deed of Ann Kemble, widow of Robert Kemble, because the same is signed by two officers in their double capacity of alderman and justice. Code 1819, c. 99, § 7, authorized the acknowledgment to be made before and certified by two justices of the peace. The word "alderman" can properly be regarded as surplusage, the words "justice of the peace" being in accordance with the law.

The next objection is to the two deeds in the chain conveying the title of Robert J. Kemble, deceased; one deed being from Ann Kemble, widow of Robert J. Kemble, dated 1843, and the other from Mary D. Sumner, formerly Mary D. Kemble, daughter and sole heiress of her father, Robert D. Kemble, bearing date February 17, 1853, because there was no evidence other than the deeds to show that the one was the widow and the other the sole heiress to Robert J. Kemble, deceased. If these deeds were of modern origin, it would be necessary, as against strangers, to produce such evidence. 24 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 60; Wiley et al. v. Givens et al., 6 Grat. 277, 47 Va. Rep. 772. But such is not the law as to ancient deeds upwards of 30 years old, where possession has been continuously held thereunder. 24 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 61; 2 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 331; Harman v. Stearns, 95 Va. 63, 27 S. E. 601; Fulkerson v. Holmes, 117 U. S. 389, 6 Sup. Ct. 780, 29 L. Ed. 915; Deery v. Cray, 5 Wall. 795, 18 L. Ed. 653; Gaines v. Stiles, 14 Pet. 322, 10 L. Ed. 476; Davis v. Pearson, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 593, 26 S. W. 241; Brown v. Simpson's Heirs, 67 Tex. 225, 2 S. W. 644. This is on the theory that, if the recitals were untrue, they would have long since been disproved, and time and possession has raised the presumption of their truth, admissible even against strangers. Ann Kemble's deed, under the circumstances, could only be admitted as conveyance of her dower interest in the land; but it was good for the purpose, although it recited therein another deed, not produced, which might have conveyed to her some other interest. Deery v. Cray, 5 Wall. 795, 18 L. Ed. 653. Mary D. Summers' deed conveyed her interest in the land as the sole heir of her father, Robert J. Kemble, deceased, and thereby the Kemble link in the title is made complete.

These being the only objections to plaintiff's chain of title, and they being without foundation, we must hold it good. It is strengthened by long time, actual possession of the land thereunder beginning as far back as the year 1860. If the plaintiff had only color of title by break in his chain as to the Kemble deed, still the actual possession of the property by those under whom he claims would have ripened into good title long before the Bradens set up a claim to the land awarded to them by the judgment, and also as to the Deem tract, unless Hester Deem, or those under whom she claims, had such adverse possession as ousted from possession those under whom plaintiff claims. This brings us to the main issue in this case.

Both defendants found their title to the separate tracts claimed by them under color of title and adverse possession for the period of 10 years. The question then presented by the demurrer to evidence is as to whether the defendants, or either of them, have had such adverse, open, notorious, continuous, and exclusive possession of either of said tracts of land under color of title for the period of 10 years prior to the institution of this suit as will divest plaintiff's title and invest it in the claimant. Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 324; Adkins v. Spurlock, 46 W. Va. 139, 33 S. E. 121; Bicknell v. Comstock, 113 U. S. 149, 5 Sup. Ct. 399, 28 L. Ed. 962; Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 578, 25 L. Ed. 618.

First, as to the Geo. W. Braden interlock of about 50 acres. Plaintiff's predecessors had actual possession of this interlock with a portion thereof under cultivation down until the year 1879, when Ezekiel Braden, after having surveyed this land, obtained the key of the house thereon from the tenant in charge, E. Bradley, and, as he claimed in the former trial, thereby obtained possession thereof. He afterwards tore down this house and removed it off. He did not disturb the Trembly and Daley fields, included in the interlock, which had been cleared, fenced, and cultivated by tenants under plaintiff's title. He allowed one Noland, in 1881 or 1882, to erect a cabin, and cultivate a small piece of ground in a remote corner of the interlock. After Noland moved off, he allowed one Patsy Jenkins to occupy the cabin during the year 1882. Jacob Riggs testifies that he bought 50 acres of land, including the interlock of defendant Braden, during the year 1883, built a house thereon outside of the interlock, tore down the Noland cabin, which had a clearing of about three-fourths of an acre, and cleared about 3 acres of land on the interlock, and cultivated it. He remained in the house about 18 months. After that time down to the present time there has been no house upon or actual occupancy of the interlock by the defendant Braden. Defendant Braden purchased the house from Riggs, and took the land back.

No title papers ever passed between them. In 1885 defendant Braden received a deed from his father, and moved into the Riggs house. The holder of plaintiff's title was at this time a nonresident of the state, and occupying the land by tenants. The two fields on the land known as the "Daley" and "Trembly" fields remained practically unchanged. The Daley field was in part on the interlock, and the residue extended over on plaintiff's other land. Defendant Braden claims to have farmed these fields some years. The rest of the land lay open, with probably the exception of a small uncertain amount down at the Patsy Jenkins corner. When plaintiff purchased and surveyed the land in 1888, he found nobody in actual possession of the interlock. He saw the old Riggs log house, which was unoccupied, and was not on the interlock. He saw also the Trembly field, and, although he was back and forth several years thereafter, he saw no one on the interlock, and knew of no one claiming it, until he was informed that defendant Braden was cutting some timber on it. He immediately served a notice on him to stop trespassing, and instituted this suit. The evidence shows that defendant Braden was claiming this land prior to plaintiff's purchase. He cultivated some portions of it at different times, and had cut some timber off of it. He never actually occupied it. He never fenced it, and never changed the fences around the Trembly or Daley fields, except he attempted to make some change in the fence around the Daley field a short time prior to the institution of this suit. At the time plaintiff purchased his alleged possession had not ripened into title. The manner in which this alleged possession was maintained seemed to be such as not to furnish the owners of plaintiff's title notice thereof. The building of the Riggs house off of the land and leaving the land unclosed and in the same condition generally as it was when originally occupied by tenants under plaintiff's title are circumstances strongly against defendant Braden's contention. In the case of Core v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 246, it is held: "If the land is of a character to admit of permanent useful improvement, the possession must be kept up during the whole statutory period by actual residence or by continued cultivation or inclosure. Surveys, cutting wood, occasional occupancy, with payment of taxes, will not do. Where there are several adverse possessions, they cannot be tacked together so as to effect a bar or ouster of the title of the owner, unless the several occupants claim in privity, and there was no break in the succession of the one to the other. The possessory estates must be connected and continuous." "Unless the adverse claimant is so in possession of the land that he may at any time be sued as a trespasser, the statute will not run in his favor; and, although he may have taken actual possession, if he does not continue there so that he may be sued at any time as a trespasser during the prescriptive bar, he cannot rely on the statute of limitations." "The moment the premises become vacant, that moment the owner, by reason of his legal title, will be regarded in the constructive possession, and the adverse possession of the wrongdoer is at an end." The plaintiff, when he purchased, found the premises entirely vacant, and for more than five years thereafter he never found any one in possession of the premises whom he could treat as a trespasser. Even prior to that time the possession is not shown to be continuous. The defendant did not have it inclosed, did not live on it, did not cultivate it except occasionally cropped a portion of it and cut some timber off of it. His occupancy thereof in any manner was intermittent. No time after the plaintiff purchased had he notice by the defendant's actual occupancy thereof in such manner that he could have brought suit against him as a trespasser, until just before this suit was brought. The defendant has wholly failed to show such continuous possession of the land that the law requires. His evidence on the subject of possession is that in 1879 his father surveyed the land, got the key to the house thereon from a tenant in possession under plaintiff's title, tore down the house, and moved it away. Afterwards, at a time made uncertain by the evidence, being from 1879 to 1882, one Noland built a little cabin on a remote corner of the land, and lived there for about a year. After he left, Patsy Jenkins moved in the cabin. How long after is not shown. She was put off by defendant Braden after he bought the land. He says she was there about one year. After she left, no one had actual possession of the land until Jacob W. Riggs built a house on the Braden land outside of the interlock in 1883. He says he went there in September, 1883, and left in March, 1885. He cleared about three acres on the interlock, and raised a crop, including a crop of corn on the Trembly field. After he moved out of his house (how long after it is not shown) defendant Braden moved in it. He fails to show that he took actual possession of the land when Riggs moved out, nor does he show when he moved out of the house. He says he farmed the land in 1885. There is no positive evidence of any actual occupation of the land during the years 1886, 1887, and 1888. The plaintiff purchased in 1888, and on surveying the land found no one in occupation of the interlock adversely to his tenants, and the Riggs house was vacant, and in a dilapidated condition. This evidence of plaintiff is not contradicted. The years 1886, 1887, and 1888 form such a break in the continuity of defendant's possession that, if it had not been continually broken before, would permit the intervention of plaintiff's possession, and prevent the running of the statute; for it is not shown that there was any one in such actual adverse possession of the interlock during this period that plaintiff could have at any time sued such person as a trespasser. Defendant testifies that he thinks that in 1889 he rented the land to Lee Roberts, who lived there about one year. After that (when it is not shown) he thinks Marion Deem was there about one year. George Deem, he also thinks, lived in the Riggs house (he does not know when); and that Ben Harris lived on the land at an uncertain time. After Deem he put Joshua Haught in possession of the land. Joshua Haught says he moved in the Braden house on the 26th of March, 1895, and stayed there until the 10th of March, 1897. He says he rented the improved ground, and put the Daley field and Core field in corn and oats. His occupancy was just before and after the suit was brought. The actual, open, notorious, visible, and continuous possession of the land during the years 1892, 1893, and 1894 by Braden or his tenants is not sustained by the proof. The interlock undoubtedly during those years was in the constructive possession of the plaintiff, either for all or some period of the time. "Upon every discontinuance of the possession of the wrongdoer the possession of the rightful owner is, by operation of law, restored, and nothing short of an actual adverse and continuous possession for the statutory period can destroy his right or vest title in the wrongdoer." "It is therefore absolutely necessary that the adverse occupancy shall be continuous, open, visible, and exclusive in order to effect a bar of the title of the true owner." Core v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 246, 247. The defendant Braden has wholly failed to show by his evidence that he had actual, continuous, open, visible, and exclusive possession of any portion of the interlock for any period of 10 consecutive years, such as would have enabled the plaintiff, or those under whom he claims, to have sued him at any time as a continual trespasser. There are many both great and small breaks left by his evidence in the continuity of his possession, while there is no break in the continuity of plaintiff's constructive or actual possession, except when interrupted by Braden's actual occupation of some portion of the interlock. It continually hung over the land, and whenever there was a break in Braden's occupation it covered the land completely, cutting into and destroying the continuity of Braden's possession. Parkersburg Industrial Co. v. Schultz et al., 43 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. 255. Such being plainly the law, the court erred in not sustaining the demurrer to the evidence.

Nor is Mrs. Deem's evidence on demurrer any more satisfactory than her codefendant's. Her counsel claim that the suit by the plaintiff admits her adverse possession at the time of the suit. This does not necessarily follow as a conclusion of law, for such suit may be maintained against one not in possession, but who may be exercising acts of ownership on the land in dispute, or claiming title thereto. Code 1899, c. 90, § 5. Under plaintiff's title constructive possession was held under the patent from 1785 until the possession became actual by occupancy about the year 1860. To destroy possession, actual or constructive, under plaintiff's title, and the transference of such title to her, it devolved upon the defendant Deem to prove actual occupancy of the interlock, or else the use and enjoyment thereof by acts of ownership equivalent to such actual occupation. Taylor's Devises v. Burnside, 1 Grat. 165; Overton's Heirs v. Davison, 1 Grat. 211, 42 Am. Dec. 544; Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 345. It is admitted that the land in the Deem interlock is still wild and uncultivated, and has never been in the actual occupancy of any one. Defendant, to sustain her contention, proved the payment of taxes, the cutting of timber, not habitual, but at different times, the prevention of others from cutting timber, with slight notice of claim of title to agents of the superior title, now dead. In Taylor's Devises v. Burnside, 1 Grat. 207, it is said that: "Payment of taxes, prohibition of trespasses, surveys of the land, sales and conveyances of it, though they may serve to show a claim of title, are not evidence of actual possession." Even the cutting and selling of timber by the tenant himself, or by his authority, is but a transient trespass, unless habitual. Kolner v. Rankin's Heirs, 11 Grat. 420; Pasley v. English, 5 Grat. 141. And a sale of part of the land gives the vendor no possession of the residue. Nor is the fact that the superior claimant had notice of such acts sufficient to give actual possession, where such possession does not in fact exist. Negligence on the part of the superior claimant cannot make that actual possession which would not be without such negligence. Actual possession depends on the acts of the junior claimant, and not on things left undone by the senior claimant. Such acts must be such as changes the condition of the land from a wild to an inclosed or cultivated state, and so continuous in their nature as would enable the superior claimant to proceed against the inferior claimant as an actual trespasser at any time during the statutory period. Core v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 246; Parkersburg Industrial Co. v. Schultz et al., 43 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. 255. Mrs. Deem has come far short of showing actual, open, notorious, visible, continuous, and exclusive possession, such as is sufficient to overcome either the actual or constructive possession of plaintiff and those under whom he claims; and, while it would be a matter of pleasure to decide in favor of a poor woman fighting for her home as against a rich railroad magnate, the law directs a contrary decision.

The judgment is reversed, the plaintiff's demurrer to the evidence is sustained, and judgment will be entered for the plaintiff on the conditional verdict of the jury.

On Rehearing.

Before the law will take from one landowner his superior title, and confer it upon a junior claimant by virtue of adverse possession under the statute of limitations, it requires that such junior claimant establish by positive evidence such adverse possession to have been actual, open, notorious, exclusive, and continuous for the statutory period of 10 years. No mere acts of trespass or temporary occupancy for the purposes of felling timber and cultivating patches of ground, with intervening lapses of no occupancy, unaccounted for, will satisfy such requirement of the law. If the defendant George W. Braden had enjoyed such uninterrupted possession, his evidence alone should have been sufficient to have established a prima facie case; whereas it is wholly insufficient for this purpose. For the period of 10 years that he claims to have owned and had possession of the interlock there was no building or other house upon it. The Riggs house, which was shown to have been occupied at various times by himself and tenants, is entirely outside of the interlock, and there is not shown to have been any continuity of possession even as to this. Because it is shown to have been occupied at various times, the court is asked to infer that it was occupied all the time, although the evidence wholly fails to show any connection between the occupancy of the various alleged tenants. This is pure guesswork, and not just legal inference. So that George W. Braden's testimony proves the weakness of his case, and clearly establishes the fact that his possession, whatever it may have been, falls far short of the just requirements of the law. He testifies that while he lived in the Riggs house, which was off the interlock, he only tried to cultivate the Trembley field within the interlock one year. "The land was too poor, and didn't bring anything." This shows plainly why nobody lived upon and cultivated the interlock continuously, and this was because the land was too poor, and would not bring anything. No doubt the house was built purposely off of the interlock to prevent its being included therein, and yet the main part of the defendant Braden's evidence and the reliance of his counsel relate to the possession of this house, and not to actual occupancy of any portion of the interlock. The plaintiff, who is not contradicted, testifies that he purchased the land in 1888, and had it surveyed the following spring (that would be in 1889), and in a year or two afterward had it surveyed by John Cain; that there was no house on the land, but that there was an old house off of it a considerable distance. "There is an old log house there at this time, but there is nobody occupying it. It is in a dilapidated condition." This undoubtedly refers to the time when he was at and saw the house, although it may have included the time of the trial of the suit. He further says he saw nobody occupying or farming the land at any of the various times he was on or over it, and knew nothing about defendant's claim of trespassing until shortly before the institution of this suit. It seems to me that the evidence clearly shows that George W. Braden had some notion at one time of claiming the land, but, having robbed it of its timber, and found it too poor to raise anything, he abandoned it as not worth the trouble; but after it was about to be developed for oil by the plaintiff he began again trespassing upon it for the purpose of renewing his claim thereto. The same may be said as to the Hester Deem tract. The proof of neither of the claimants is of that strong, unbroken character that will justify the law in divesting plaintiff of his title to the land in controversy and vesting it in the defendants. If defendants' evidence had been sufficient, the labors of counsel would have been greatly simplified. Good argument cannot strengthen defective evidence.

The former opinion is adhered to fully and confirmed.

BARTLES & DILLON v. DODD et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1904.)

CHATEL MORTGAGE—DEED OF TRUST—FRAUDULENT PER SE—PERISHABLE PROPERTY—EXECUTION SALE—APPLICATION OF PROCEEDS.

1. A deed of trust, duly recorded, given on the equipment and furniture of a hotel to secure a valid debt, is not per se fraudulent because there is included therein a small amount of perishable property in the shape of eatables and drinkables, and made to cover the restocking of the same, nor because it is made to cover any renewals of the notes thereby secured, nor because the property is to remain in the possession of the grantor until sold.

2. At common law an insolvent debtor has the right to execute a deed of trust on the equipment and furniture of a hotel to secure the purchase money thereof, or to secure the money loaned to him for the purpose of purchasing or paying for such property, or to secure the sureties on the notes given for such loan or the renewals thereof; and such deed, if duly recorded, cannot be held to be fraudulent in fact, because of the preference given, although it may prevent other creditors from having the proceeds of a sale thereunder applied to their debts, and although it might have been held to be void as a preference, under section 2, c. 74, Code 1899, if suit had been instituted in time for this purpose.

3. Subsequent execution creditors, whose debts are pre-existing or subsequent, may force such property to sale, but the proceeds will be first applied to the satisfaction of the trust lien thereon.

4. A deed of trust will not be held to be fraudulent per se unless the provisions thereof plainly show that it was not made in good faith, but only as colorable security for the alleged debts therein named.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Berkeley County; E. Boyd Faulkner, Judge.

Bill by Bartles & Dillon against John W. Dodd and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and Joseph H. Shaffer and David M. Shaffer appeal. Modified.

Flick, Westenhaver & Noll and W. B. Lindsey, for appellants. Faulkner, Walker & Woods and A. C. Nadenbousch, for appellees.

DENT, J. Bartles & Dillon, execution creditors, instituted a suit in chancery in the circuit court of Berkeley county against John W. Dodd, their debtor and others, among other things for the purpose of testing the validity of a certain deed of trust executed by said Dodd on certain personal property for the purpose of securing D. M. and J. H. Shaffer, as his indorsers on certain notes due the National Bank of Martinsburg. The circuit court held the deed fraudulent per se as to the plaintiffs' debt, and directed a sale of the property to satisfy the same, and after sale entered a farther decree applying the proceeds to plaintiffs' debt. The Shaffers appeal from these decrees, and insist that the court erred in not holding the deed of trust valid. It is as follows:

"This deed, made and entered into this 19th day of July, 1899, by and between John W. Dodd and Georgia Lee Dodd, his wife, parties of the first part, and X. Poole, trustee, party of the second part:

"Witnesseth: That the said parties of the first part do grant unto the said X. Poole, trustee, the following described personal property, all contained in and on the premises of what is now known as the Continental Hotel, in the town of Martinsburg, Berkeley County, West Virginia, N. E. corner of Public Square, to wit: All the furniture in reading room of said hotel, consisting in part of carpet, Denning covering and paper under same, 12 high back chairs, 8 rockers, 2 leather chairs and window shades to windows and doors, writing table, etc., also the furniture in the lobby in said hotel, consisting in part of linoleum on floor, a number of chairs, settee, and office furniture and fixtures; also 16 bedroom suits, including iron beds for same; also 5 other iron beds; also linen and dressing for the above-mentioned beds; also 41 window shades, five dozen dining chairs, seven dining tables, all table linen and towels, three side tables, 31 curtain poles, 450 yards of carpet, 24 China chamber sets, all hotel dining room queensware, glassware, silver, flat ware, and hollow ware; all kitchen furniture and utensils, large ice box and contents, bar, bar buffet, ice box, bar fixtures, cash register, all wines and liquors, and stock for same, one hotel omnibus, one cab, one transfer wagon, three sets of harness and lot of halters, feed and provisions in general, also one bay mare named Diamond, one bay horse named John, one gray horse named Frank; also all other personal property belonging to or connected with said hotel, except such personal property that was brought to said hotel from the residence of the said parties of the first part at 321 Burke street; also any property that may be hereafter acquired to take the place of the property herein mentioned. To have and hold unto the said Poole, trustee, forever.

"In trust, nevertheless, for the use, interest and purposes following, and none other, to wit: to secure, indemnify and save harmless D. M. Shaffer and J. H. Shaffer as endorsers on six certain negotiable promissory notes, made by the said John W. Dodd, and endorsed by the said D. M. Shaffer and J. H. Shaffer, all of which said notes are negotiable and payable at the National Bank of Martinsburg, West Virginia, and were discounted at said bank, one of said notes bearing date May 23rd, 1899, for the sum of $500.00, payable sixty days after date, and one bearing date June 19th, 1899, for the sum of $500.00, payable ninety days after date, and one bearing date the 17th day of June, 1899, for the sum of $500.00, payable ninety days after date, and one bearing date June 22nd, 1899, for the sum of $500.00, payable three months after date, and one of said notes bearing date July 15th, 1899, for the sum of $800.00, payable ninety days after date, also one bearing date the — day of —, 1899, for the sum of $200.00, payable — days after date; the said notes aggregating $3,000.00; also to secure, indemnify and save harmless the said D. M. Shaffer and J. H. Shaffer on any other note or notes given in place or renewal of the above notes, or any part of the same until the same is paid; also to secure D. M. Shaffer the payment of a certain negotiable promissory note bearing date the — day of —, 1899, made by the said John W. Dodd, for the sum of $124.43, with interest from date payable to the order of D. M. Shaffer, — months after date. It is expressly understood between the parties to this deed that should default be made in the payment of the above mentioned and described notes, or any part of same, or the interest, or any part of same, or of the interest on any renewal or note given in place of same, or of any of the covenants herein mentioned, so as to cause any liability or expense to the said endorsers as aforesaid, then upon written notice of such default, be given to the said Poole, trustee, of such default by the said D. M. Shaffer or J. H. Shaffer, or any one of them, then the said X. Poole, trustee, shall proceed to make sale of the property herein conveyed at public auction to the highest bidder, either on the premises of the said hotel, or any place deemed best by the said trustee, after first having advertised the time, terms and place of sale for four successive weeks in some newspaper published in the said county of Berkeley upon such terms as may be deemed best by such trustee, and from the proceeds of such sale the said trustee shall first pay all costs and charges attending the execution of this trust, including a commission of five per cent. on the first $300.00, and two per cent. on the balance of the amount for which said property is sold to said trustee for his services; and he shall pay, second, the indebtedness or notes hereinbefore described, or the amount for which endorsers have become liable, including costs and expenses to which they are subjected by reason of such default having been made, and the residue, if any, shall be paid by the said trustee to the said parties of the first part, their heirs and assigns. It is expressly understood and agreed between the parties of this deed that the said John W. Dodd shall have or cause to have the property herein conveyed insured in some good, solvent insurance company in a sum not less than $2,500.00 with policy so endorsed that loss, if any, shall be payable to the said D. M. and J. H. Shaffer, as their interests may appear. It is also understood and agreed between the parties to this deed that the parties of the first part shall retain possession of the property herein conveyed unless default shall be made in the covenants herein contained. The said trustee shall have power to act by agent or attorney in the execution of this trust.

The plaintiffs virtually admit that, if the deed is not fraudulent per se, it is not fraudulent in fact. The rule for determining whether a deed is fraudulent per se is stated in the third point of the syllabus in the case of Landeman v. Wilson, 29 W. Va. 703, 2 S. E. 203, as follows: "Unless, upon an inspection of a deed claimed to be fraudulent upon its face, the court sees that the intent of the grantor in executing the deed was to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, the court cannot hold the deed fraudulent on its face." To make such fraudulent intent appear, it has been settled by a long line of decisions that the grantor must make such reservation in the deed to himself, or some one else for his benefit, as will enable him to defeat the professed objects of the deed without violating the stipulations thereof. Horner-Gaylord Co. v. Rawcett, 50 W. Va. 487, 40 S. E. 564, 57 L. R. A. 869; Conaway's Adm'r's v. Stealey, 44 W. Va. 163, 28 S. E. 793; Baer Sons Grocery Co. v. Williams, 43 W. Va. 323, 27 S. E. 345; Shattuck v. Knight, 25 W. Va. 590; Clafin v. Foley, 22 W. Va. 434; Kuhn v. Mack, 4 W. Va. 186; Quarels v. Kerr, 14 Grat. 48; Shepard v. Turpin, 3 Grat. 373; Lang v. Lee, 3 Rand. 410.

At common law a debtor had the right to prefer one creditor to all others, although the effect of the conveyance might be to hinder and delay others. Wolf v. McGugin, 37 W. Va. 552, 16 S. E. 797; Kyle v. Harveys, 25 W. Va. 716, 52 Am. Rep. 235; Harden v.

Wagner, 22 W. Va. 356. This rule is abrogated to some extent by section 2, c. 74, Code 1899. This section contains the following exception: "Provided, further, that nothing in this section shall be taken to prevent the making of a preference as security for the payment of purchase money, or the bona fide loan of money or other bona fide debt contracted at the time such transfer or charge was made, or as security for one who at the time of such transfer or charge becomes an endorser or surety for the payment of the money then borrowed." The appellants do not rely on the provisions of this section, for the deed was not attacked within four months after its recordation, and the debtor had the right to prefer them by executing a trust deed on the hotel furniture therein named, at common law. It is insisted, because there was some perishable property included in the deed, that this shows it to be fraudulent per se. The plain object of the deed, while not permitting the debtor to defeat it, was to permit him to proceed with the hotel business, and presumably to make the money to pay off his indebtedness. This is admitted in the allegations of the bill. In carrying on this business, it would be necessary for him to use up the eatables and drinkables on hand, and continually to purchase others to supply the place of those used. Otherwise all the other property would be valueless to him. To cover the things so used, it is provided in the deed that it shall extend over "any property hereafter acquired to take the place of the property herein mentioned." The plain object of these provisions was not to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, but was to keep the security good. The amount thereof being small in comparison with the residue of the property, and the object of including it in the deed being apparent does not render the deed fraudulent on its face. Skipwith's Ex'r v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 271, 31 Am. Dec. 642; Lewis v. Caperton's Ex'r, 8 Grat. 148; Cochran v. Paris, 11 Grat. 348. The extension of its provisions to cover after-acquired property would be void at law, but is valid in equity. Horner-Garlord Co. v. Fawcett, 50 W. Va. 487, 40 S. E. 564, 57 L. R. A. 869.

It is also insisted that the deed is fraudulent on its face because its provisions are so extended as to cover any renewals of the notes secured, thus permitting the indefinite extension of the deed until the property is worn out or destroyed. The deed, without so expressing, would cover all renewals of the notes until the debt is paid or the deed released. Hence the expression thereof on the face of the deed did not change its effect. Neither can the notes be renewed, nor the time of the deed of trust be extended, without the consent of the appellants. The debtor cannot make such extension alone. Hence he is not able to defeat the purposes of the deed if he adheres to its stipulations without the aid and assistance of those secured thereby. If their claim is just, they will not permit the debtor to defeat the purposes of the trust.

There are some elementary principles of law which counsel have overlooked in their anxiety to misconstrue this deed: First, that the deed should be most strongly construed against the grantor, in favor of the grantees; second, that it must be construed, as a whole, to effect the ends and purposes thereof, rather than to defeat them; third, the validity of the deed will be upheld if possible to do so without doing violence to the intention of the parties thereto; fourth, a strained and unreasonable construction will not be given to the language of the deed for the purpose of holding such deed made with intent to delay, hinder, and defraud creditors, when there is no such intent apparent from a reasonable construction of such language. The clause upon which counsel rely to establish the invalidity of the deed is as follows: "It is expressly understood between the parties to this deed that should default be made in the payment of the above-mentioned and described notes, or any part of same, or of the interest or any part of same, or of the interest on any renewal or note given in place of same, or of any of the covenants herein mentioned, so as to cause any liability or expense to the said endorsers as aforesaid, then upon written notice of such default, be given to the said Poole, trustee, of such default by the said D. M. Shaffer or J. H. Shaffer, or any one of them, then the said X. Poole, trustee, shall proceed to make sale of the property herein conveyed." The construction that counsel attempt to place upon this clause is that the indorsers are bound to renew the notes indefinitely on the request of the grantor in the deed of trust, and, on their failure to do so, they have no right to enforce the deed of trust because of default in payment of the notes, so long as he shows himself willing to renew the same with them as indorsers. This construction is attempted to be sustained by definition and play on the word "or," without regard to the plainly expressed purposes of the deed of trust. As heretofore said, there is nothing in the deed that compels the indorsers to renew the notes. Having the right to refuse to renew the notes, they have the alternative right to require the grantor to pay the notes, or renew them without their indorsement, which is the equivalent of payment, or to require the trustee to make sale under the deed of trust; the plain meaning and import of the language being that when the grantor fails to make payment of the notes, or any part thereof, or the renewals thereof, or the interest thereon, when legally requested to do so by the indorsers, they may demand the enforcement of the deed of trust, for by such refusal the liability for the payment of the notes, or any part thereof, becomes fixed upon them. The indorsers had the same legal right to demand payment of the notes as they fell due as they had the right to refuse to renew them. Being under no obligation, moral, legal, or equitable, to renew the notes, they have the right, when they fall due, to demand the payment thereof or that they be relieved from liability, or that the deed of trust be enforced for their relief. The alternatives are against instead of in favor of the grantor in the deed of trust, and he must be prepared to do any or all of the alternatives when legally requested to do so by the indorsers, and the failure to do any of them on their demand renders the trust enforceable. He cannot say to them when the notes fall due, "I am not prepared to pay, but I am ready to renew the notes, and, if you do not consent to continue as my indorsers, I will enjoin the enforcement of the deed of trust, if attempted for your relief." No court of equity would for a moment entertain such an unrighteous plea unless the deed in unequivocal terms required the indorsers to join in a renewal of the notes when demanded by the grantor. There is no such provision in the deed, but counsel, in their anxiety to avoid a deed plainly not meant to delay, hinder, and defraud creditors, attempted to imply such provision from the use of the preposition, "or." While their persistency is admirable, and their argument ingenious, and at least convincing to themselves, yet a common-sense and disinterested view of the deed as a whole entirely refutes the position assumed by them—that the grantor reserved to himself such rights of renewal as enabled him to wholly defeat the purposes of the deed. As we construe the purposes of the deed as a whole, the indorsers were not only not bound to join in the renewals of the notes, but they have both the right to refuse to do so, and the right to require the payment thereof when they fall due, and, in default of payment, have the right to insist on the prompt enforcement of the deed of trust for their relief and benefit. This being manifestly the true and only reasonable and legal construction of the deed, the grantor had no power to legally defeat the purposes of the deed except by payment of or satisfaction of the notes thereby secured, and the authorities relied on by the counsel have no application to this case, but they only apply to cases where the grantor reserves the right to wholly defeat the deed, without satisfaction of the debt secured. The bona fides of the claim depends on extraneous evidence, and the deed of trust will not be held fraudulent per se because of any doubtful provision therein which can be satisfactorily explained by extraneous evidence. If the notes were not given for purchase money or a loan made at the time, but were pre-existing debts, the deed would be held, under the statute, as executed for the benefit of all creditors, if suit were instituted in time. Otherwise it cannot be disturbed unless it is fraudulent in fact.

It is also insisted that retention of the possession of the property until default made renders it fraudulent per se. Under section 5, c. 74, Code 1899, recordation takes the place of a change of possession both as to prior and subsequent creditors who have not obtained liens thereon. 14 Am. & En. En. Law, 371. Unless such retention of possession is inconsistent with the purposes for which the deed is executed, it will not invalidate it. Klee v. Reitzenberger, 23 W. Va. 749; 5 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 987. If it were a general assignment to secure creditors, the retention of possession would have a different effect. 14 Am. & En. En. Law, 369, 371; Houck v. Heinzman, 37 Neb. 463, 55 N. W. 1062. All these matters may tend to show that such deed is prima facie fraudulent, and cast upon the beneficiaries the duty of showing the good faith thereof; but they are not of such potency, either singly or combined, as to render such deed fraudulent per se. Whether it is fraudulent in fact depends upon the evidence.

Plaintiffs object to the reading of defendants' depositions for the reason that they were taken before answer filed. This objection does not appear to have been specifically called to the attention of the circuit court, or the objection could have been obviated by allowing defendants to retake them. Such objection must be considered by this court as waived, especially when the depositions show that the plaintiffs appeared and cross-examined the witnesses as fully as they could have done, had an answer been filed. Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. 611. The evidence shows that the notes secured were given for money used in the payment for the property included in the deed of trust; the object being to provide the debtor with the means of furnishing and carrying on the hotel owned by the appellants, so that he might, out of the business, derive the means to pay off such indebtedness. Unless we can establish the rule that an insolvent person cannot borrow money and go into business, and give the lender a lien on the implements and furniture used in such business without being guilty of delaying, hindering, and defrauding his creditors, we must hold this trust free from fraud. To hold this deed fraudulent, we must believe, as stated by Judge Greene in Shattuck v. Knight, 25 W. Va. 596, "that the design of the grantor, clearly shown by these provisions, was, when he executed the deed, to hinder other creditors, and at the same time not to devote any of his property then owned by him and conveyed in the deed of trust to the payment of the debts professedly secured by it, but to keep possession of it, and dispose of it as he pleased, and to dispose of the proceeds as he chose." The present deed and facts proven evince no such design. On the contrary, they show that the debtor was insolvent or in declining circumstances, and wanted to go into the hotel business to make a living and pay his debts. The appellants rent him their hotel, and agree to become the sureties to the bank to raise the money to furnish the hotel, provided he gives them a lien thereon to secure them. He does so. He takes the risk of his creditors levying on the property and forcing it to sale. He cannot do otherwise than hope that they will not undertake to do that which injures him and will not benefit them. His creditors conceive the notion that, because he is allowed by the real purchasers thereof to remain in possession of and use the property in his business, they have the right to seize and appropriate the same, because their debts are unpaid, and the trust arrangement between him and his sureties delays, hinders, and defrauds them. The property is taken, is sold, and sacrificed for less than one-half enough to pay the trust lien thereon. The business is stopped, the debtor is thrown out, and the attacking creditors hold up their hands to receive the remnants of the ruin they have made. But the law steps in and says to them, "You have the right to destroy, but the remnants of the ruined business must go to those who have furnished the means in good faith to establish such business." This is equity, this is justice, and is in perfect accord with the intention of the law. While the law recognizes that an insolvent man is at the mercy of his creditors, yet it endeavors to protect those who extend to him a helping hand, and try to save him and his business from hopeless bankruptcy. "The fact that fraudulent relations are possible is hardly a sufficient reason for denouncing transactions which are not fraudulent." Mr. Justice Brewer in Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 266, 11 Sup. Ct. 565, 35 L. Ed. 171.

The decrees are reversed in so far as they hold said deed of trust fraudulent as to creditors, and in so far as they direct the payment to the plaintiffs of the sum of $1,105.36, the proceeds of the sale of the hotel furniture, and will be so amended as to direct said sum of $1,105.36 to be paid to the appellants, to be credited on the sum of $2,750.35 due the National Bank of Martinsburg; and, as so amended, the decrees will be in all other respects affirmed.

PEARSON v. WEST VIRGINIA LIME & CEMENT CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 20, 1904.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

1. Though upon a question of fact, as to which there is conflicting evidence, the finding of the trial court is entitled to peculiar weight, and will not ordinarily be disturbed, the appellate court will reverse such finding when there is a decided preponderance of the evidence against it, and the finding itself is inconsistent with what the evidence, on the whole, clearly shows was intended to be the relation of the parties toward one another.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by Richard P. Pearson against the West Virginia Lime & Cement Company. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. B. Maxwell and A. Jay Valentine, for appellant. Talbott & Hoover and Fred O. Blue, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, P. The main question in this case, necessary to be considered in order to determine the propriety of the decree appealed from, is the nature of the respective interests of the plaintiff on one side and the defendants on the other in a certain mining property in Tucker county, known as the West Virginia Lime & Cement Company property. There is a corporation bearing the name of the property, and as belonging to which it is treated in the decree complained of, and in a certain sense by the parties; but it seems that no formal conveyances of the property have ever been made to it, and that the parties in whose names the legal titles of the property stand have executed no formal contract with the corporation binding them to convey. Their rights and interests are dependent upon parol evidence, and to effectuate the object of the bill on the one hand, and to maintain the defense on the other, by upholding the alleged rights of the defendants, specific performance of certain parol contracts, in respect to which, however, there is some correspondence, must be either enforced, or the parties left free to vindicate their rights in some other suit. On the basis of the understanding between the parties concerning this property and its development, the defendants have expended about $30,000. They furnished the money and intrusted its expenditure to the plaintiff. After the property had been purchased and the plant erected, the defendants became dissatisfied with the management of the plaintiff and ousted him from the control of the business. Up to the date of this occurrence, about December 1, 1902, there seems to have been no misunderstanding or differences as to the respective interests of the parties, except that when the agreement to form the corporation was presented to the plaintiff, and he was informed that only one share was to stand in his name for the time being, so that he might be a director, and that, with the exception of four shares, to be held by him and other parties, for the like purpose, all the shares were to stand in the name of the defendant Henry E. Weaver, the principal financial man in the concern, as trustee, or were not to be issued, the plaintiff refused the agreement. Thereupon his name was taken out, and that of another person was added as a nominal stockholder to subserve the purpose of organization. After that the plaintiff continued to manage the business, and the defendant to furnish the money until the change of management, December 1, 1902.

Pearson, the plaintiff, had been in the employ of the defendant Weaver and certain mining and railway corporations, under the management of Weaver as president, in the capacity of civil engineer, for some time before the starting of the business in this case. By reason of his capacity and information possessed by him concerning the business of Weaver and his corporations, his services for some time after he joined the idea of the development of the property here in controversy were very necessary to his employers, and there is evidence going to show that they dissuaded him from leaving their employment and starting his own venture by offers to furnish the money for the development of the property on fair and just terms. Pearson's interest in the property at that time consisted of a lease dated October 6, 1898, for 35 years, giving him the right to mine the coal and manufacture into lime the limestone in two tracts of land containing together 172½ acres, paying to the owner of the land a royalty of 10 cents a ton for the coal and one-half cent per bushel for lime. He had no capital with which to develop this property. In about August 19, 1901, up until February 1, 1902, he brought this lease to the attention of Weaver, from time to time, and expressed great anxiety to begin work upon it, and represented to Weaver that other parties were willing to furnish the money. In January, 1902, he went to Chicago, taking the lease with him, and there made the agreement upon the faith of which all this money was expended. What that agreement depends upon the testimony of himself, Weaver, and C. A. Bickett, an associate of Weaver in his mining and railroad enterprises, and the subsequent conduct and admissions of the parties.

Pearson says that nobody was present when the contract was made except himself, Weaver, and that the latter proposed to place the concern as a joint-stock corporation to which the former objected, on the ground of the possibility of his being deprived of the control of the business; and thereupon Weaver explained the laws relating to the management and control of corporations, and the danger to his private fortune of going into the business upon any basis other than that of a stockholder in a corporation, and closed with an offer to allow Pearson to hold 51 per cent. of the stock, which would enable him to manage and control the corporation. Weaver admits that he and Pearson were alone when the contract was made, but says that, upon its conclusion, Bickett was called in and informed of the terms of the agreement. Bickett substantiates this statement, and Pearson corroborates it in part by his admission that the lease and some other papers which he had brought with him were delivered into the hands of Bickett on that occasion. Bickett and Weaver both swear that they did agree to form a corporation; that the lease was to be the property of the corporation; that the stock was not to be divided, but held by Weaver in trust until the property was developed; that Weaver was to furnish all the money for that purpose; that he was to be repaid all that money before a division of the stock was made; that Pearson was to have, in the meantime, a salary of $125 a month; and that upon the repayment of Weaver's money the stock was to be divided into four equal parts, one to Pearson, one to Weaver, one to Bickett, and one to Gardner.

At the date of the meeting Pearson owned only the lease. Weaver and Bickett say it was agreed at that meeting that the fee in the property on which the lease was held should be purchased and ultimately conveyed to the corporation and the lease thereby extinguished. They say Pearson was distinctly informed that they would have nothing to do with the property unless this could be done. Pearson was authorized to purchase it, and did so, Weaver furnishing the money for that purpose. Other property adjoining this land was also purchased in the same way. These properties cost a little less than $6,000. On March 31, 1902, about a month after the talk in Chicago, an option on the land on which Pearson's lease was taken was secured in the name of E. J. Billings by the procurement of Pearson, and assigned to the West Virginia Lime & Cement Company, and delivered to Weaver. This act is corroborative of the statements of Weaver and Bickett, and inconsistent with the position now taken by Pearson. Pearson claims the property so purchased was to be the individual property of Weaver, held subject to the lease, and not the property of the corporation to be organized. The deed for the land was afterwards made to Weaver, and Pearson explains that by saying Weaver had requested it, because the West Virginia Lime & Cement Company had not yet been incorporated, for which statement he vouches by Weaver's letter. This is not at all inconsistent with Weaver's position, since it was necessary to put the title provisionally in the hands of some individual.

It is agreed that Pearson represented that the cost of putting the plant in operation would be about $6,000, on the basis of putting in but one kiln. Bickett, at one time, suggested a six-kiln plant, but that was not carried out. Two were put in, and the total cost of the plant, exclusive of the purchase money for land, amounts to over $23,000. A costly and possibly useless structure, pro-up as part of the plant, is a coal chute from the top of the mountain to the kilns. It cost about $10,000, and its satisfactory working is in dispute, as is also the value of the coal for use in the plant. But Bickett knew it was being put up. As before stated, the defendants furnished this money as demanded by the plaintiff, Pearson, and intrusted its expenditure to his ability, judgment, and discretion. Many complaints were made from time to time by defendants of his failure to render accounts and send in reports. Assuming that attention to the work of erecting the plant and other outside operations were so exacting as not to allow him time for proper bookkeeping, auditing of claims, and sending reports, the defendants directed one of their employes by the name of Thomas to go there and assist him. He declined the proffered assistance, and went on in a manner unsatisfactory to defendants. He complains against the defendants of their failure to meet his pay rolls promptly and furnish machinery and materials at the stipulated times, by means of all of which he was embarrassed in his operations. When the plant had been completed and was beginning to turn out lime, a difference as to the price at which it should be sold arose. Pearson had represented that it could be produced at a small cost, and sold in the vicinity of the place of manufacture at less than it could be bought for elsewhere and still at a good price, so that the profits anticipated were from 25 to 100 per cent. The defendants claim that lime was selling in the community at 24 cents. Pearson offered or sold some of the first product at 15 cents. Bickett maintained that the price should be not less than 22 cents, urging upon Pearson the necessity of it in view of the large amount invested and the impossibility of raising prices after being once fixed, as well as the practicability of it, that being 2 cents cheaper than the price at which others were supplying it. A man by the name of Ferguson, an employe of the defendants in some of their enterprises, was sent to the plant and into the community to negotiate the sales, and it seems that some sales were made or offered by him at 18 or 19 cents.

Bickett made one or two trips to the plant, and was assured by Pearson that his progress was good, and does not seem to have made, or to have been there long enough to make, any investigation. They relied upon Pearson. After the differences arose, and when it seemed to the defendants that the plant ought to be running and doing well, but was not, they sent John McFadyen, a man in whose business capacity and skill as an engineer they had confidence, to make an examination of the plant, and report his conclusion as to its value. His report was not in all respects satisfactory, because it showed that the cost of manufacturing lime would be from seven to ten cents, considerably more than was estimated by Pearson. The defendants came to the conclusion also that Pearson's management was incompetent and extravagant, and they resolved to displace him as manager, and did so about December 1, 1902.

It would be a work of great labor and of doubtful utility to review all of the correspondence and the testimony relating to these matters. Enough has been stated to show that the plaintiff and the defendants entered into an arrangement looking to the development of a property of doubtful and uncertain value. Whether Pearson's lease was worth anything could only be tested by the expenditure of a large amount of money. Whether the investment of this money would prove to be worth anything to him or its owners no man could tell without the test, a costly experiment. Though Pearson does say other persons had offered the means to test the property, he does not indicate who they were or upon what terms they contemplated investing their money with him. His lease being valueless without the expenditure of a large amount of money, which he did not have, and the result of that expenditure by the defendants being a matter of great uncertainty, as is almost any other mining venture, the agreement as contended for by the defendants is not unreasonable. It gave Pearson a salary of $125 a month, saved to him one-fourth of his lease, and gave to him one-fourth of all the property purchased, and made the arrangement appear to be feasible and business-like in its outlines. Assuming that he was competent as a manager, there was ample capital then behind the enterprise, and there was no reason why, in case the property should prove valuable, the business might not go on successfully. Though the money invested by Weaver and his associates was all to be returned out of the earnings of the plant, before any division of the stock should be made or dividends declared, Pearson was to have his salary, the royalties in his lease were to be cut off and saved to the company, and nearly $4,000 worth of other property was purchased for the company. It would be difficult to understand how sagacious business men, such as Weaver and his associates are shown to be, could be induced to put money into such an enterprise to an extent limited only by the requirements of the business, without an understanding that it should be returned to them. On the basis contended for by the plaintiff, the most ordinary, even inferior, business foresight, would demand that the amount to be contributed be limited in advance, and balanced, on some sort of valuation, against the property contributed by the other party. It is incredible that these defendants should blind themselves to furnish the money necessary to buy all this property and put up the plant, without fixing any limit upon the amount, with understanding that the plaintiff, contributed only the value of his lease, should own 51 per cent. of it when completed. He says defendants were not bound by the contract to purchase the fee in the land and her lands, and that they did so of their own volition. This was a most remarkable exhibition of generosity, for the evidence abundantly shows that the property so purchased was to become the property of the company. If not, why did Pearson cause it to be assigned to the company and not to Weaver individually? Some of Pearson's letters are inconsistent on this point. On March 21, 1902, he wrote Bickett, saying, "For the last time, carry out your promise and buy out the property as outlined in our last interview, if you think my services worth the pay me $6,000 for the lease of the licks business, and then exclude me from its responsibilities, and pay me an allowance for the overseeing of your future operations here, and do it before the 1st of July."

"I am tired of promises." What purchase could he have referred to, less than a purchase after the Chicago interview, other than the purchase of the fee in the land on which he had the lease? How can he reconcile this with the pretension that that purchase was made by Weaver and his associates of their own volition, and not in pursuance of the agreement made in Chicago? His attempted explanation of this inconsistency he does not say he did not refer to the purchase, nor attempt to repel the inference arising from it as to what the contract was, but goes off into a long, unintelligent rambling discussion of other matters, complaining of delays, and making accusations of noncompliance with his promises as to the time within which certain things were to be done. As a circumstance raising an inference against the position of the defendant, he relied upon the fact that, at the time of the purchase of the land on which the lease was, an abstract was shown to Bickett in which it appeared that the land was subject to that lease, and that the deed was subject to that lease—facts which all parties knew. In the hands of the owners and grantors in the deed, of course the land was subject to the lease, and in conveying it they could not afford to put in a warranty without excepting the lease. If Bickett and Weaver were relying upon their conduct made in Chicago, these facts could make no difference, and were not calculated to cite any comment, or induce any different course of conduct on their part, for they understood that both the lease and the land were to become the property of the company. It is not pretended that at that time they had received any notice from Pearson of his contention as to the Chicago agreement being different from theirs. He does not deny that any notice of that kind had been given them. The first act on his part, charged as being inconsistent with their claim, was his refusal to sign the agreement to incorporate in June, 1902. He does not say he even then gave notice of a claim of 51 per cent. of the stock. When asked what he had said to Mr. Robinson, who presented the agreement for his signature, he replied as follows: "I declined to sign them, and when pressed for the reason gave it to Mr. Robinson. Told him about my lease, and that when I got my stock I would assign the lease, just as was intended in Chicago." In his examination in chief he says he refused to sign because they had not allotted him 51 per cent. of the stock, but does not say he told Robinson he claimed that much. There is, therefore, in the record nothing to show that the defendants had notice of the full nature and extent of the claim he now makes until after he had been ousted from the management of the business. With the single exception of his refusal to sign the articles of incorporation, no act of his, up to the date of his ouster, was inconsistent with the contract as claimed by defendants. On the contrary, with the exceptions of his refusal to accept the assistance of Thomas, he seems to have been submissive to the will and instructions of the men who were furnishing the money. In a letter to Bickett dated July 21, 1902, he said: "The main point I want you to be impressed with in regard to your letter is that neither now nor any time in the future need you have any apprehension as to my acting hastily or injudiciously in regard to sales or financial matters here. You have far more experience and sagacity than I have in such matters, and no one appreciates that fact more than I do, and I am only too pleased that our little corporation has a right to all benefits arising therefrom."

After having examined all the evidence, much of which cannot be set out here for want of space, we are clearly of the opinion that the agreement made in Chicago is not what it is claimed by Pearson to be, but is substantially what it is claimed by the defendants to be.

After he had been deprived of the management of the plant and property Pearson brought this suit in equity, setting out in his bill his pretensions and claims substantially as hereinbefore stated, and praying alternately that the charter of the West Virginia Lime & Cement Company and its pretended organization be declared nullities, or, if that could not be done, that his interest in the corporation be ascertained and fixed at 51 per cent. of the capital stock; that Weaver, Ferguson, Bickett, Stern, and Robinson, the incorporators of said company, be declared trustees, to hold said 51 per cent. of stock for his use and benefit; that they be required to deliver the same to him; that a special receiver be appointed to take charge of the property pending the suit, with full power and authority to preserve from waste and injury and operate said plant; that the defendants, their agents and servants, be required to turn the same over to the receiver; and that they be enjoined from in any manner interfering with the property. The bill also prays for general relief. Upon the bill a receiver was appointed and an injunction awarded. The defendants appeared, and filed their demurrer and answer at March rules, 1903. The answer denies the material allegations of the bill, charges incompetency and extravagance on the part of the plaintiff as manager of said works, and sets forth the claims and contentions of the defendants, as to their rights and interests in respect to the property, substantially as hereinbefore stated, except that they claim that the property purchased, and standing in the name of Weaver, is not to be conveyed to the corporation until after the plant is completed, the business thoroughly on its feet, and their money fully returned to them, and that the delivery to them of plaintiff's lease was intended to and does operate as an assignment to Weaver, to be also held in trust with the land. Several unimportant interlocutory orders were made from time to time, and on the 1st day of December, 1903, a decree on the merits was entered, whereby the court ascertained and adjudged that by the verbal agreement between the parties the plaintiff had bound himself to contribute his lease and Weaver to contribute a sufficient amount of money to erect and complete the plant for the manufacture of lime, and to open the coal mine on the lease; that the West Virginia Lime & Cement Company had been duly incorporated; that by the terms of the verbal agreement the plaintiff was to receive, as consideration for his lease, 51 per cent. of the capital stock, and Weaver the remaining 49 per cent.; that Weaver did advance sufficient money; and that he had refused to give the plaintiff the stock to which he was entitled. Thereupon it was adjudged, ordered, and decreed that 51 per cent. of the capital stock be issued to the plaintiff, and the residue to Weaver and his associates; that Weaver was the owner in fee of the land, and entitled to receive the royalties as they may accrue from the lease; that upon the issuance to the plaintiff of 51 per cent. of the capital stock he assign and transfer to said corporation his lease. The receiver was ordered to deliver possession of the property to the corporation, and it was further ordered that upon such delivery his powers should cease. His compensation was fixed at $600, and decreed against the corporation, and the cause was referred to a commissioner to ascertain and report whether there are any liens upon the lease, and upon the property and stock of the corporation, and to audit and settle the accounts of the special receiver.

From the finding of facts already stated, it is apparent that this decree is erroneous, and that the principal errors are in decreeing to plaintiff 51 per cent. of the capital stock and adjudicating the land purchased to be the property of Weaver. We do not think, however, that the evidence fully sustains, in all its details, the claim of defendants. They say no property was to be conveyed to the corporation, and that no stock was to be issued, until all their investment had been returned out of the profits of the enterprise, but that all was to remain in Weaver's hands as trustee. This claim is contradicted by Weaver's letter to Pearson, directing the Baker land to be conveyed to him, because the corporation had not, at the time of its purchase, been chartered and organized. This fact shows that the property was to be conveyed to the corporation as soon as organized and ready to receive the title. It is not to be assumed that the corporation was to own part of the property, while another part was to be withheld from it in trust, without any reason therefor. And it would be inconsistent with business principles to convey the property to the corporation without receiving anything in return for it. Consistency in the claim of the defendants also denies the proposition that no stock was to be issued; for a corporation receiving property or funds without issuing or recognizing any title to stock is a sort of anomaly, not to be established except by very clear, consistent, and positive evidence. We think the trust arrangement in the agreement was only to continue until the organization of the corporation, and that upon its organization the stock was to be issued to the persons, and in the proportion, hereinbefore stated, namely, one-fourth to Pearson, and the remaining three-fourths to Weaver and his associates, in consideration of property conveyed and credit extended. As the corporation is charged with all the money laid out and expended by Weaver and his associates, the value of the stock in the hands of all the parties is dependent upon future development, as contemplated by the agreement. No reason is perceived why Weaver and his associates should hold the title to Pearson's stock, since their outlay is a charge and an indebtedness against the corporation, rendering all the stock less valuable to the extent of that outlay, in whose-soever hands it may be. It is also inconsistent to say that Pearson's stock should be specially pledged to the repayment of the corporation's debt.

Though not entitled to all the relief given him by the decree, the plaintiff is clearly entitled to have specific performance of the contract for the purchase of his lease, conveyance of the land, and an adjudication of his right to said 25 per cent. of the capital stock of the corporation as aforesaid, and the same issued and delivered to him upon the assignment of the lease and conveyance of the other property. No adequate legal remedy for the vindication of his rights in these respects is perceived. The contract contemplates the full and complete development of a property which seems to have considerable merit and value as a mining property. It embraced among its provisions the vesting in him, as a stockholder, of a beneficial interest in real estate, not only as to the interest in his lease, so indirectly to be retained, but also in the property purchased for the corporation by Weaver and his associates. It is needless to say that equity has jurisdiction to enforce specific performance of almost all kinds of contracts relating to real estate. See West Va., etc., Co. v. Vinal, 14 W. Va. 637; Oil Co. v. Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 84, 34 S. E. 923; Bettman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 433, 26 S. E. 271, 36 L. R. A. 566; 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 104. No question is made as to whether the plaintiff has put himself in position to call for such relief by performing his own duty and demanding performance by the defendants. The demurrer is not insisted upon here, and the appellee seems to desire a decree determining the rights of all parties interested.

Why there should be any reference as to liens is not perceived. Nobody has asserted and asked enforcement of any liens by any pleadings in the cause. A reference for the settlement of the accounts of the special receiver may become necessary, but no cause for it appears as yet. No exception to any items of his report is disclosed by the record. His bill for services, amounting to $600, was excepted to, and its excessiveness is here admitted by both sides. The claim is not itemized, and the court had nothing before it from which the true character and amount of the services could be determined, and no evidence was adduced in support of the claim. Its allowance is therefore erroneous, but upon an itemization and proof of his services the court can, without difficulty, fix the amount of his compensation, and no reference for that purpose is necessary. References are expensive and should not be made without cause.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to decree an assignment by the plaintiff of his lease to the West Virginia Lime & Cement Company, and a conveyance to said corporation by the defendant Henry E. Weaver of the land purchased, as hereinbefore stated, for it, and, by such proper orders as may be necessary, to cause such assignment and conveyances to be made, and also to require the defendant the West Virginia Lime & Cement Company, upon such assignment and conveyance being effected, to issue and deliver to the plaintiff certificates for one-fourth of its capital stock, fully paid and nonassessable, and for such further proceedings, according to the rules and principles of equity, as may be necessary to secure and protect the rights and interests of the parties under their said agreement.

CARNEY et ux. v. BARNES et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 20, 1904.)

EQUITY — CANCELLATION OF DEED — JURISDICTION.

1. Chancery has jurisdiction to cancel a deed granting petroleum oil for failure to perform its covenants, where the deed has a clause annulling it for such failure.

2. Touching equity jurisdiction to cancel a deed for realty or a contract for mere failure to perform its covenants, when there is no clause of forfeiture for such failure.

3. Touching equity jurisdiction to cancel a deed void on its face, and deeds made void by evidence outside the deed.

4. To deny equity jurisdiction because of a remedy at law, the legal remedy must not be merely partial, but it must be adequate, and as complete and efficacious as that given by equity.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wetzel County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Bill by Eli Carney and wife against George W. Barnes and others. Decree for plaintiffs. Defendant Barnes appeals. Reversed.

Hall & Hall and T. P. Jacobs, for appellant.
E. L. Robinson and E. B. Snodgrass, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. Eli Carney and wife made a lease, 3d February, 1898, to E. H. Jennings & Bros. for oil purposes of a tract of land, the lease providing that the lessee should give to the lessors one-eighth part of the oil produced, to be set apart in the pipe line to the credit of said Carney and wife, as royalty or rent. Jennings & Bros. bored two oil wells on the land, getting oil, which was run into the pipe lines of the Eureka Pipe Line Company. Before operations for oil production were begun, Carney and wife, 6th September, 1900, made a deed conveying to George W. Barnes all the oil in said land except one-sixteenth; but the deed recognized the existence of said oil lease to Jennings & Bros., and provided that if that lease should expire or become void under its terms, then Barnes should have all the oil, with the right to produce it on the usual terms of leases for oil and gas purposes. Thus the deed to Barnes operated to give him half the eighth, Carney retaining one-half. For the said conveyance Barnes paid Carney a bonus of $3,000 cash, and the deed provided that Barnes should, within 30 days after the first well, and 30 days after the second well, should be completed, tubed, and tested for oil, pay to Carney $2,000 for each well, if it produced 10 barrels of oil per day for 30 consecutive days, Carney to give notice to Barnes by writing of the wells being drilled and the amount of their production. The said deed from Carney to Barnes contained this clause: "If said grantee shall, as he may do at his option, omit to pay the said sum of $2,000 for first well within the time aforesaid, except as hereinafter mentioned, then this grant shall become as absolutely null and void as though it had never been made, and said grantors shall retain the sum above mentioned as full liquidated damages." As above stated, oil was produced in the two wells bored by Jennings & Bros. As to the quantity, there is conflict of evidence, some of it tending to show less than 20 barrels per day, and some of it showing 22 barrels per day. Barnes never was on the ground, but the said deed to him from Carney was taken by an agent, Umstead, who transacted for Barnes all that he did with Carney in this matter. Carney demanded of Barnes, who lived in Ohio, by letters, payment of the $2,000 for each of the wells as stipulated in the deed from Carney to Barnes, Carney claiming that the wells produced over 10 barrels of oil per day each, so as to entitle him to said money under his deed. Barnes refused to pay the money, claiming that he could not afford to do so. He says that he was under the impression that the deed required the wells to produce 30 barrels a day before he was called on to pay the money. While the matter was in this condition, Umstead went to Carney to make some compromise, and told Carney that Barnes could not afford to pay $2,000 for each well, and proposed a compromise by which Barnes should pay $2,000 instead of $4,000, and if the third well should be drilled, producing 20 barrels a day for thirty days, then Carney should receive $1,000 more. This compromise was reduced to writing, and was signed by Carney and wife, and sent to Barnes in Ohio. Barnes refused to accept it, and returned it to Umstead, Barnes claiming that no compromise was necessary, as the wells did not produce oil in such quantity as to demand anything from him. Carney and wife then brought a suit in equity against Barnes, Jennings & Bros., and the Eureka Pipe Line Company, alleging that the said oil wells had produced more than 10 barrels each for 30 days, and that, though they thus became entitled to said $2,000 for each well, yet Barnes had refused to pay the same, had broken his contract, and that under the clause of the deed above quoted the deed had become null and void by reason of the refusal of Barnes to pay the money. The bill prayed that Jennings & Bros. disclose when each of the wells began to produce oil, and what quantity they produced per day for 30 days after their completion, and what amount they had produced since they began to produce oil; what oil from the wells had been received by Barnes, and what oil had been run from the wells into the pipe lines of the Eureka Pipe Line Company. The bill alleged that a division order certifying the right of Barnes to one-sixteenth and of Carney to one-sixteenth of the oil had been issued by said pipe line company, and it prayed that that company file a copy of it. And it prayed that said Pipe Line Company state in what proportion the oil was divided, and who received credit thereof, and state the times when Barnes sold oil produced from the wells, and what he received therefor. The bill also prayed that the deed from Carney and wife to Barnes be declared by decree to be null and void, and that the court ascertain through a commissioner the amount of oil received by Barnes, and what oil he sold from the wells, and what money he received therefor, and that a money decree go against Barnes for money arising from his sales of such oil. The bill also prayed that the Eureka Pipe Line Company be enjoined from accounting for or turning over to Barnes the oil already in its lines, or that might thereafter come into its lines from the said wells. An injunction was granted. The bill prayed also for general relief. Barnes filed an answer to the effect that the true agreement between Carney and wife and Umstead as agent was, as appears in the deed from Carney and wife, except in one particular—that is, that, whereas that deed required him to pay $2,000 for each of two wells producing 10 barrels per day, it should have provided that the wells should produce 30 barrels per day—that the said deed should in that place read "thirty barrels," not "ten barrels." His answer states that he was engaged in the business of buying oil royalties in West Virginia and elsewhere, and that he had blank deeds prepared to facilitate the execution of papers showing the purchases of royalty, and had furnished Umstead with a number of such blanks, and that Umstead had used one of those blanks in said transaction with Carney. He states that the agreement between Umstead and Carney and wife was in that respect for wells producing 30 barrels, not 10, and that the presence of the word "ten" in said deed was due to a mistake in the omission to strike out the printed word "ten" from the blank and insert in its place the word "thirty." The answer stated that the matter was overlooked by Umstead, and also by said Barnes, when the deed was sent to him. Barnes stated that in instruction to Umstead he directed him to require a minimum production from 30 to 35 barrels per day for 30 days where the sum of additional money for wells was of the amount specified in the deed. The answer further states that the territory in which said wells were bored was known to be Gordon or deep sand territory, wherein the drilling of wells would cost $8,000 to $10,000 each, and that wells producing less than 30 barrels per day would be unprofitable, and that operators under leases in that territory would refrain from drilling therein, and that wells producing more than 30 barrels would induce operators to further develop the territory, and that the payment of $7,000 for wells of less than 30 barrels capacity would be unreasonable.

The said answer denied that Carney had ever given him notice of the true quantity of oil produced by said wells as stipulated in said contract. Said answer averred that the actual production of the first well on said land was between 16 and 17 barrels per day, as shown by the reports of the Pipe Line Company, and that neither the first nor the second well produced at any time as much as 20 barrels per day each. Barnes denied that the said deed from Carney and wife to him had become void, and denied that he owed anything to Carney and wife by reason of the said Wells, and he prayed that, as the said deed from Carney and wife to him did not express the true agreement between them and him, it be reformed, and the word "ten" be stricken out, and the word "thirty" inserted in its place. The court made a decree which declared the said deed from Carney and wife to be null, void, and forfeited on account of the provisions contained in it, and the failure of Barnes to comply therewith, and denied to Barnes the reformation of the said deed sought by his answer, and referred the cause to a commissioner for a report as to the oil which had been received by Barnes, as preparatory to a decree against him on that account. The decree perpetuated the provisional injunction which was awarded restraining the Pipe Line Company from turning over to Barnes oil produced from said wells, and required it to account to Carney and wife for all oil in its lines on the date when the injunction was served upon it, and directed such oil and all oil produced in future from the wells to be credited by the pipe line company to Carney and wife, and declared Carney and wife entitled to all the oil in the lines at the date of the injunction, or thereafter produced, going to Carney and wife under their said lease to Jennings & Bros. From this decree Barnes has appealed.

Barnes contests the jurisdiction of equity to entertain this suit, alleging that Carney and wife have adequate remedy at law. We are not aided with any authority cited upon this proposition, though we have had some difficulty with it. We have, however, concluded that equity has jurisdiction for the purpose of cancellation of the instrument that is attacked. We find in 6 Cyc. 286, that the equitable remedy of cancellation is within the exclusive jurisdiction of equity, because equity courts are alone able to decree it, notwithstanding the facts which are the occasion for cancellation are many times available by way of a law action or defense. Where cancellation is the only remedy that is full and complete for all the purposes which may arise, equity cannot be denied its jurisdiction. It is abundantly sustained. In Hiett v. Shull, 36 W. Va. 563, 15 S. E. 146, this court sustained equity jurisdiction to cancel a promissory note given by an old man incapable of executing it. Judge Holt said, what will appear to anybody reading the books, that they all sustained the jurisdiction of equity for cancellation where no other remedy is adequate no matter how guardedly equity may exercise the power in some instances. He said that on this branch of remedial justice there is a wide interlock of jurisdiction, no matter that a law forum will administer partial relief. It is of no force to say that if the oil wells involved in this case produce oil sufficient to call for the payment by Barnes spoken of in the deed, and he refused payment, that refusal alone worked the nullification of the deed, and it became at once void, without any decree. It was once thought that a forged deed being void, or an instrument void for any cause, could not be canceled in equity, because a thing already void need not be adjudged to be void, but its voidness may be shown whenever it comes in question; but that idea has been frequently refuted in equity, and it is now well settled that, though an instrument be void, that fact does not oust equity of its jurisdiction for cancellation. Hoopes v. Devaughn, 43 W. Va. 447, 27 S. E. 251; Haskell v. Sutton, 53 W. Va. 206, 44 S. E. 533; Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 465, 467, 26 S. E. 291. "Whatever may have been the doubt or difficulties formerly entertained upon this subject, they seem by the more modern decisions to be fairly put at rest, and the jurisdiction is now maintained to its fullest extent. And these decisions are founded on the true principles of equity jurisprudence, which is not merely remedial, but is also preventive of injustice. If an instrument ought not to be used or enforced, it is against conscience for the party holding it to retain it, since he can only retain it for some sinister purpose." Story, Eq. § 700. Mr. Hogg, in his Equity Principles, 80, puts this healthful jurisdiction upon logical, sound basis in saying that it rests on the principle of quia timet; that is, equity acts because of the reasonable fear that the instrument may be vexatiously or injuriously used when evidence to impeach it is gone, or that it may be already, as in our case, clouding title, or affecting the interest of the party. He says that the jurisdiction is firmly established. There is no jurisdiction where the face of the instrument speaks its voidness. 6 Cyc. 290; 18 Ency Pl. & Prac. 759; Story, Eq. § 700. Rich v. Braxton, 158 U. S. 375, 15 Sup. Ct. 1006, 39 L. Ed. 1022, holds that where the face of a deed tells its voidness, or the claimant under it must, to use it, inevitably prove facts showing it to be void, equity has no jurisdiction to cancel; but where evidence outside the deed is required to prove it void, equity jurisdiction is conceded. Such outside evidence would be required as to the deed involved in this case.

Now, it is true that these principles are applied to instruments void from their beginning, which never had any force, whereas the deed in this case was valid when executed, and only became void afterwards by reason of a condition subsequent incorporated in it; but what difference is this? It has become void, and there is just as much danger of its being used to vex its makers, to cloud their title, to put them in danger, to injure the sale of their property, as if it had been void from the first. What the party needs, and what equity concedes him, is a formal adjudication of a court utterly destroying the deed, and rendering it ineffectual in future whenever relied upon. A law judgment cannot do so. As the opinion says in De Camp v. Carnahan, 26 W. Va. 839, in a case like the one at bar the remedy is not so full, adequate, and complete at law as in equity. The parties will be obliged to rest, if the court holds that the deed sought to be removed as cloud on the title is void and cancels it; if the court refuses to cancel because the deed is good, they must also rest; for in either case the question is settled. I am outspoken to say that I have always favored equity jurisdiction in such cases, because it gives the only adequate relief. Partial, incomplete relief a court of law may give, but a decree in equity wipes away the dangerous instrument—takes away its life. Is this not a plain case calling for equity jurisdiction? If Carney were entitled to relief, how could he get it at law? Suppose he sues Barnes for money received by him for oil, and sustains his action because the deed has by its terms come to an end, and he recovers. The decision would likely be res judicata between them and settle that the deed had become void when pleaded in a future action for oil later produced; but would that have the effect of preventing Barnes from getting oil in future, or prevent the necessity of a future action, or be effective to compel Jennings & Bros. to pay the oil in future to Carney, or compel the pipe line company to credit him with it? They, not being parties, would not be bound by these judgments. What Carney wants is an adjudication which will bind all the parties, and show that the deed is void, and compel Jennings & Bros. and the pipe line company to so treat it, and refuse to give credit for any oil to Barnes, and acknowledge Carney as the owner of the whole royalty oil. You could not make the pipe line company or Jennings & Bros. parties to an action by Carney against Barnes for the money produced for the oil. I do not see that the pipe line company could be sued for the oil by Carney.

The judgment of recovery of money by Carney against Barnes might be introduced as evidence of Carney's title in an action by him against the pipe line company in trover, detinue, or assumpsit, granting that one or more of those actions would lie against the pipe line company, but the recovery would not operate as an estoppel against that company. Carney wants a decree which will at one stroke destroy the deed, declare his right to all the royalty, and compel those companies to recognize his right, making the decree res judicata against all of them. To deny chancery jurisdiction because of law remedy, the law remedy must be as complete as that afforded by chancery. Rich v. Braxton, 158 U. S. 407, 15 Sup. Ct. 1006, 39 L. Ed. 1022; Hogg, Eq. Principles, 5; Nease v. Ins. Co., 32 W. Va. 283, 9 S. E. 233. Here is a deed passing a present estate, a vested estate, containing a condition subsequent to defeat the deed upon the contingency of Barnes failing to pay money—his nonperformance of a material condition. Has not Carney a right to call upon a court to ascertain and declare that Barnes has not performed that condition, and not leave it to controversy and doubt? We find it laid down in 8 Cyc. 288, that "nonperformance by the defendant has occasionally been treated as a sufficient ground for rescission of a contract by decree in equity, but the weight of authority is against his view. Thus a conveyance of land in consideration of the grantee's agreement to support the grantor during life will not, according to the weight of authority, be canceled for the mere failure to fulfil his contract, unless such failure amounts to the breach of a condition subsequent, in which case the deed may be canceled." From this we must understand that there are authorities of great repute, cited in Cyc., showing that, even where a paper contains a simple obligation on a party to do a certain thing, equity will cancel the paper. Among the cases cited is Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Galesburg, 133 U. S. 156, 10 Sup. Ct. 316, 33 L. Ed. 573, where a contract to supply a city with water was canceled in chancery for mere failure of performance. But in this case there is a positive provision in the deed that noncompliance shall work the death of the deed, and surely, under the rule stated in Cyc., there cannot be a doubt of the power of equity to cancel the deed for nonperformance with a subsequent condition, which by that deed, in express words, is to end it. In Pownall v. Taylor, 10 Leigh, 172, 84 Am. Dec. 725, it was admitted that if a covenant in a deed for support is not complied with, and the deed provides that it shall become null on that account, it would be avoided. We have cases in Virginia and West Virginia holding that failure to comply with a material provision of a deed is often ground for equity to cancel it, as for failure to support the grantor. Lowman v. Crawford, 40 S. E. 17, 99 Va. 688. Wilfong v. Johnson, 41 W. Va. 283, 23 S. E. 730, cancels a deed for support without such clause. Goldsmith v. Goldsmith, 46 W. Va. 426, 33 S. E. 266, cancels a deed containing a forfeiture clause. In the absence of a clause in words defeating a deed for noncompliance with its provisions, I would limit equity jurisdiction to cases where cancellation affords, in the particular case, the only full and complete relief.

In this case the deed provides that nonperformance shall work its death, and I have no doubt of the right of Carney, if he had good cause, to appeal to equity to give him the only full relief suitable to this case.

But though there is equity jurisdiction, we hold that Carney and wife are not entitled to the relief they ask. We are of the opinion that the provision of 10 barrels in the deed does not state the true contract as made between Umstead and Carney, and that it ought to contain the word "thirty" instead of "ten." Carney now contends that the contract was 10 barrels, but his evidence and a letter from him are inconsistent with this position. He says that a few days before the execution of the deed he and Umstead made the contract; that Umstead asked him what quantity should be put in the clause specifying the quantity, and he said to Umstead that he might take his choice of 10, 15, or 20 barrels, and that Umstead said he would fix that when he came back, and that Umstead left 10 barrels in the contract, and that he, Carney, did not notice it until he later looked over it. Carney does not say, by no means does he say, that there was a distinct agreement for 10 barrels. He simply says that Umstead left the word "ten" in the contract without his knowing it. Strange that he did not have his mind on that important matter so as to tell us that the agreement was for 10 barrels, if in fact it was. I repeat that Carney does not tell that 10 barrels was the contract. Carney, in his examination in chief, said they did not settle on any number. He also said that he was surprised when he became aware that the contract had the word "ten" in it. That negatives all idea that the word "ten" had been agreed upon. On cross-examination he stated that he got a copy of the contract from Umstead some months after its execution, and was surprised that it contained the word "ten," and the question was put to him, "And you thought all the time that the contract contained 'twenty' barrels?" and he answered, "This is what I thought; that is why I wrote Mr. Umstead that letter." He was then asked, "You conceded that the contract should rightly contain 20 barrels and be the contract?" and he answered, "We talked the three propositions, 10, 15, and 20, and there was neither proposition settled down on, and Mr. Umstead said that he would fix that when he came back, and he did; he left it 10 barrels, and I didn't notice that in the contract until I looked over it." He was then asked, "He had the right to put in 20 barrels, though?" and he answered, "He had the right to; I would not have objected." Carney wrote Umstead a letter reading as follows: "Silverhill, May 1, 1901. Mr. Umstead—Dear sir: Received your letter and signed that paper and will mail it today. I am surprised in regard to that contract for I was sure in My Own Mind that it was 20 barrels instead of 30.

I am satisfied that the well was to be tested for 30 days and the production 20 barrels but was surprised to see the contract not changed from 10 to 20 I wouldn't argue the point when you was out here for I thought all that was necessary was to look up the contract. Ell Carney." That was written when he sent Umstead the compromise contract. All this shows conclusively that 10 barrels was not agreed upon, and that Carney never so understood it, and we must therefore eliminate the provision of 10 barrels from the deed.

Then the question arises, what shall be done? Shall we say that the minds of the parties never met upon the subject of the quantity of oil which the wells were to produce to demand from Barnes the additional compensation of $2,000 per well, and cancel the contract because a material element was left out, and therefore there was no contract? Or shall we insert a quantity? If we adopt the former decision, Carney would have to refund the $3,000, and Barnes account for what oil he got. If we conclude not to adopt this decision, but to reform the deed by inserting the number of barrels, what number shall we insert? Carney says he "thought" the contract said 20 barrels, but he does not say that was actually agreed upon. Umstead swears positively that 30 was the number agreed upon. Though this is denied by Carney, the evidence of Umstead is to be preferred to that of Carney, because the claim of Carney that no quantity was agreed upon is very unlikely. It is unlikely that they would omit to decide upon an element of the contract so important. It is very unlikely that Umstead would not be particular to have a definite understanding about a matter on which such a large sum of money was to be payable, and on which Barnes had given him direction. Carney swears to no sum. Umstead swears to a particular sum. Umstead is disinterested, while Carney has thousands of dollars involved and is deeply interested. It is so hard to believe that so important a matter as the quantity of oil should not be agreed upon when thousands of dollars were dependent upon it. It is not unlikely that Umstead forgot to strike out the word "ten" from the printed form and insert the true quantity in its place. From common experience we can realize how he might overlook that little word "ten." And it is so improbable that Umstead would pay $7,000 for two little wells of 10 or even 20 barrel production. The evidence in this case shows that that production would not justify that price. Umstead had instructions not to pay such price for wells of less than 30 barrels capacity. This induces the belief that he did not depart from instructions. A fact which goes to confirm Barnes' claim that the wells must yield 30 barrels a day is that the first well struck oil 16th March, and Carney wrote Barnes, 29th March, that it would produce 40 to 50 barrels, inducing the belief that he wanted to produce the impression that it exceeded 30 barrels, the amount Umstead said was agreed on. He had not the contract then. After he got a copy, and saw the "ten" in it, he wrote a second letter telling Barnes it produced 20 to 25 barrels. So we hold that the deed should have contained the word "thirty" instead of "ten," and that it should be reformed accordingly. Though such reformation is now useless, because of the lapse of 30 days from the completion of the wells, we will decree such reformation, and reverse the decree of the circuit court and deny the plaintiffs the relief sought by their bill, and dismiss their bill and dissolve the injunction.

STOUT v. SANDS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 20, 1904.)

EVIDENCE—SUPPRESSION—PRESUMPTIONS—WITNESS—IMPEACHMENT.

1. Suppression, by one party to a suit, of a document relied upon as evidence by the opposite party, is not equivalent to an admission of the truth of the claim of the latter respecting its contents, and does not dispense with the necessity of prima facie proof of such claim sufficient to sustain a judgment or decree. But when a prima facie case is made, and doubt is cast upon it by rebuttal evidence or otherwise, suppression of the document raises a strong inference against the party failing to produce it, and determines the point in favor of the other party.

2. Though a party cannot impeach a witness called by him, he is not bound by all such witness says. He may prove the material facts by other evidence, even though the effect of it is to directly contradict his own witness; but he cannot show that the witness has made contradictory statements out of court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Action by Elmore H. Stout against C. Sprigg Sands and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. G. Smith, H. W. Williams, and L. C. Lawson, for appellant. Davis & Davis and M. F. Snider, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, P. A bill and an amended bill to reform a deed on the grounds of mistake and fraud having been dismissed by the circuit court of Harrison county for want of proof of the allegations of the bill, the plaintiff has appealed.

Some time in the year 1900 the plaintiff, Elmore H. Stout, being the owner of a tract of land containing about 200 acres, part of which is underlaid with the Pittsburgh vein of coal, and all of which is supposed to be underlaid with deeper veins of coal known by other names, executed, by the procurement of one Samuel W. Kinsey, an option of purchase of coal under said land in favor of C. Sprigg Sands, to be by him conveyed to certain persons who were then securing by purchase a large, compact body of coal in that neighborhood, composed of the aggregate area of several farms, with a view to organizing a company to open and operate coal mines. Sands had taken options on all the desired territory except that of Stout. In view of his inability to procure it at a satisfactory price, Kinsey, who was an agent of the parties to whom it was intended Sands should convey the land, was sent to Stout for the purpose of securing the option. He succeeded in doing so at the price of $40 per acre, delivered it to Sands, caused the Pittsburgh vein of coal to be surveyed, and later a deed, bearing date October 27, 1900, prepared at the instance of Sands, was presented to Stout and his wife for execution at the bank of which Sands was cashier, which they executed under the belief that it conveyed only the Pittsburgh vein of coal, but which in fact included by its terms all the coal under the land. Having discovered this later, Stout commenced this suit for reformation on the 17th day of September, 1901. Meantime Sands had conveyed the coal to James T. Blair and Cyrus T. Achre, trustees, by deed dated November 13, 1900, who, by deed dated February 20, 1901, conveyed it, together with all the other coal secured and conveyed to them by Sands, to a corporation called the Interstate Coal Company, and that company, by deed dated September 11, 1901, conveyed it to another corporation, called the Clarksburg Fuel Company. To the first bill, which was filed at November, term, 1901, Sands, Blair, and Achre, trustees, and the Interstate Coal Company, were made defendants. On the 4th day of April, 1902, an amended bill was filed in court, making the Clarksburg Fuel Company a defendant. On the 5th and 7th days of June, 1902, respectively, Sands and the Clarksburg Fuel Company answered. Sands having died, the cause was revived against his executrix and devisees in September, 1903. A number of depositions were taken and filed by the plaintiff, but none by the defendants. At the May term, 1904, the Interstate Coal Company answered, and on the 4th day of June, 1904, the decree complained of was entered.

Competent witnesses prove that there was a preliminary optional contract between Stout and Sands, embodying the terms upon which the conveyance was to be made. Kinsey swears he wrote it, and Stout's son swears he was present and heard the negotiations, saw the contract signed, read it, and signed it himself as a witness. Kinsey further swears that he delivered it to Sands, and that he knows nothing of its whereabouts, but supposes it is with Sands' papers. The bill and amended bill called for its production. Sands not only failed to produce it, but denied in his answer that any t for plaintiff's coal was in his possession had ever been written or delivered. His executrix did not answer, and no evidence was taken by any defendants. Kinsey's statement is undisturbed. To the allegation that the contract as prepared at the instance of Kinsey and his associates, or some one of them, and presented to plaintiff and wife to be signed and acknowledged, Sands does not respond by denial. Hence it must be taken as his failure to produce the contract is upon as a very strong element in plaintiff's case. It is hardly pretended that there is sufficient evidence without this circumstance to establish the contents of that instrument in accordance with the theory and the facts of the bill, and the view taken by the court for appellant seems to stand almost upon the assumption that the nonproduction of the contract is an admission that, if produced, it would prove the allegations of the plaintiff. Aside from his views, however, it is not here to ascertain what the weight of the suppression of evidence is. The suppression of documents called for is an admission that they would prove what plaintiff claimed respecting their contents. It is a very strong circumstance warranting a strong inference against the party. There must be other evidence in support of the claim. A prima facie case must be made, and, when made, and there is rebuttal evidence casting doubt upon the question of fact in controversy, the act of the party withholding evidence is taken strongly against him, and sustains the position of the plaintiff.

Then, on the unexplained refusal of a party to produce on trial documents which have been called for, the opposite party introduces parol evidence of the contents of the documents, then, if there be doubt, the probative interpretation most unfavorable to the resisting party will be adopted. But this matter solely of logical inference. "The nonproduction of written evidence," says Sir W. D. Evans, "which is in the power of the party, generally operates as a strong presumption against him. I conceive that this has sometimes been carried too far, by being allowed to supersede the necessity of producing evidence, instead of being regarded as a matter of inference, in weighing the weight of evidence in its own nature applicable to the subject in dispute." Whar. Ev. 37. "It follows, therefore, that the presumption arising from mere nonproduction of the contract cannot be used to relieve the opposing party of the burden of proving his case. But if a prima facie case is proved, sufficient to sustain a judgment, then a party is required to exhibit books which would, if produced, settle the matter either one way or other, or to give other explanations, not prejudicial to his case on trial, but preserving himself from subsequently objecting to the case of the opposite party, though sufficient for judgment, did not introduce all the facts." Id. § 1268.

It is only a circumstance weighing heavily against the party, and does not dispense with the necessity of some independent evidence in support of every necessary element of the claim of the other party. This is well illustrated and clearly shown by the application of the rule in our own decisions. See Wheeling v. Hawley, 18 W. Va. 472; Knight v. Capito, 23 W. Va. 639; Heflebower v. Detrick, 27 W. Va. 16; Bindley v. Martin, 28 W. Va. 773; Union Trust Co. v. McGlellan, 40 W. Va. 405, 21 S. E. 1025; Webb v. Bailey, 41 W. Va. 463, 23 S. E. 644.

In the light of this interpretation of the rule, the evidence for the plaintiff must be examined. It consists of the testimony of the plaintiff, his son, Kinsey, and Sidney Miley. Stout's son does not pretend to quote the language of the contract. He saw it, read it, and signed it as a witness, but does not say it mentioned only the Pittsburgh vein of coal. He says Kinsey came there to buy that vein, that they talked of that vein only, and that by the contract it alone was sold. Kinsey was not examined in chief as to the contents of the contract. After having been excused from the stand, he was recalled for further cross-examination by the defendants, and then said: "To the best of my knowledge the option said all the coal, the same as all the other options we had, except the Fleming tract of coal." Then on redirect examination he admitted that the amount of coal was described in the contract as being approximately 50 acres, that the price was based upon the acreage of the Pittsburgh vein, and that, at the time the contract was made, the outcroppings of that vein were pointed out to him. Plaintiff's testimony in chief is substantially the same as that of his son. He says he sold the Pittsburgh vein, and was paid only for that vein. When, on cross-examination, he was interrogated as to the language of the contract, he did not say it was limited to the Pittsburgh vein. It appears from what he said that he bases his case upon quite different grounds. He said he looked at the contract to see if the coal was sold by the acre, and it was, but not that he looked to see if it included only the Pittsburgh vein. The following question and answer disclose unequivocally the basis of his claim: "Q. And all you remember about it is that you sold it by the acre, and that you remember very distinctly? A. Yes, sir; that's enough to remember about it, isn't it? And I remember it very distinctly, and I remember they said it was ninety-four and a fraction acres." That the price was determined by the acreage of the Pittsburgh coal is uncontradicted. Miley says he called upon Sands, at the instance of Stout, to obtain an admission from him or a release. The material part of his evidence is as follows: "I said, 'Mr. Sands, how much did you get?'"

and he said, 'Ninety-four acres,' and I said, 'That's what he said;' and I said, 'How much did you pay for?' and he said, 'Ninety-four acres;' and I said, 'Do you claim anything outside of that?' and he said, 'Not a thing in the world;' and I said, 'You ought to release that;' and he kind of laughed and bluffed me, and I said, 'Will you release him? If you don't he will sue you;' and he said, 'I have two of the best lawyers in town, paid by the year, and they might as well do something as nothing;' and I said, 'All Mr. Stout asks you to do is to pay for all the land in the deed or release him; you have something there you haven't paid for;' and he kind of laughed and turned away, and said it didn't amount to much, he didn't know whether there was any coal there or not, and it wouldn't be operated anyhow; and he said, 'Stout sent you here, didn't he?' and I said he did. I think that was the last word was said. He went out, and I went about my business. Q. State whether or not C. S. Sands, in that conversation or at any other time, told you whether he bought the drift coal or Pittsburgh coal or Freeport coal, or what strata of coal he bought of Stout, I mean. A. He said that he had bought the Pittsburgh vein, but that was all he claimed; that Kinsey come and looked at that vein of coal, and the underneath vein of coal wasn't talked of or thought of; and Kinsey stated he didn't think of anything else, and that was all he wanted and all he asked." For its bearing upon this admission, and, in fact, as a part of it and to be read with it, the following additional statement made by Sands to Miley is given: "A. Why, he said it seemed to be the custom to give the boundary lines. That was his answer to me—that seemed to be the custom to take in the whole thing, to give the boundary lines, but they only claimed the coal they surveyed and paid for. Q. Now, what coal do you say was surveyed and paid for? A. Why, he claimed the Pittsburgh vein; he called it the Pittsburgh, at least." It further appears that, with one exception, all the other deeds taken by Sands in that neighborhood, in getting this coal property together, called for all the coal in the farms, although the price was based upon the acreage of the Pittsburgh vein. That is admitted so far as there is any testimony relating to the subject, and it is disclosed by plaintiff's witnesses.

Kinsey, it is to be remembered, is the only witness who makes an express and direct statement as to what the contract stated in respect to the quantity of coal described, and that is that it said all the coal. Stout is not held to the truth of this statement simply because he called the witness. He cannot directly impeach his own witness by attacking his character or proving his contradictory statements, but he can show the fact to be different from what the witness states it to be by other evidence. "The general rule that one cannot impeach his own witness must not be understood to imply that the party is bound to accept such testimony as correct. On the contrary, it is very clear that the one producing a witness may prove the truth of material facts by any other competent evidence, even though the effect of such testimony is to directly contradict his own witness. * * * A party is not bound by all the statements of a witness called by him, if adverse, even though no other witnesses are called to contradict him. The party may rely on part of such testimony, although in other parts the witness denies the facts sought to be proved. It has been well said that, if the other rule should prevail, every one would be at the mercy of his own witnesses, and, if the first witness sworn should swear against him, he would lose the testimony of all the rest. This would be a perversion of justice." Jones, Ev. § 860; Best's Pr. Ev. § 645; Phillips, Ev. (3d Ed.) pt. 2, 767; Hickory v. United States, 151 U. S. 303, 14 Sup. Ct. 334, 38 L. Ed. 170. Stout could have overcome Kinsey's statement by other evidence, but has he done so? He either could not or would not say that the language of the contract was limited to the Pittsburgh vein of coal. Neither did his son say so. Nor does the admission proved against Sands import that the language was so limited. The only direct evidence on that point is the statement of Kinsey. If it is broken down by anything in the record, it must be done by inference, deduced from the facts that the negotiations were for the Pittsburgh vein, that the price was based upon the acreage of the Pittsburgh vein, and the admission of Sands that he claimed nothing but the Pittsburgh vein. This admission, however, must be taken altogether. It includes the fact that his deed included all the coal, and that he claimed the right to hold it, for he unequivocally signified his intention to resist any litigation instituted for the purpose of changing his deed. The inference must also overcome adverse inferences, deducible from Stout's disclosure of the fact that he relies, not upon language in the contract, specifying the Pittsburgh coal alone, but that the contract said the coal was to be paid for by the acre, and all the acres are not paid for because of two supposed underlying veins, each equal to the entire area of the farm, making nearly 340 acres, and the admitted fact that the other deeds taken by Sands in the neighborhood are in conformity with his. How can the court reach the conclusion that he has made out prima facie proof of the fact that the contract was limited to the Pittsburgh coal? All this evidence must be reconciled as far as possible. Most of it can stand together consistently with the result that Kinsey's statement is true. It was in the power of Mr. Stout to directly contradict that statement, and he did not do it, but chose to rely upon another ground, not necessarily inconsistent with its truth. If a man will not prove his own case by his own oath, how can he expect the court to make it out from the most unsatisfactory inferences? Had he made out a prima facie case, upon which the defendant casts doubt by rebuttal evidence, then the suppression of the contract, the best evidence of what it contained, by the defendant, would have been conclusive against him and in favor of the plaintiff; but the plaintiff leaves his own case incomplete, without the intervention of any rebuttal evidence, based upon mere inferences, when he was on the witness stand, had seen the contract, had read the contract, and had signed the contract, but failed to state it contained the very thing upon which he relies in this case. If he knew that it was in there, the act of withholding his own testimony is one for which the court cannot be held responsible, and an omission on his part which the court cannot supply for the purpose of holding the other party guilty of a reprehensible act, calling for a strong inference against him. Are we to assume that, in the course of this important litigation, he had not been advised by his counsel as to what it was necessary for him to prove? He offers no excuse for his failure to say, and his son's failure to say, that the language of the contract was in reference to the Pittsburgh coal only. He does not even say he does not remember its language on that point. Moreover, all that he does say is drawn from him on his cross-examination. What inference is it possible to deduce from this except that he knew the contract contained no such language, and that, as honest men, he and his son could not testify that it did contain such language?

Having reached the conclusion that the plaintiff has wholly failed to prove the initial and basic fact in his case, there is no occasion to deliberate upon the many other questions sought to be raised, all of which were dependent upon, and have fallen with, this fact.

Seeing no error in the decree complained of, the court affirms it.

certain debts, but not his debts, and subjecting the estate's land to their payment. He is concluded by the decree.

3. Under Code 1899, c. 86, § 9, if a creditor of an estate of a decedent fail to present his claim before a decree upon a report of debts allowing debts against the estate and subjecting lands to their payment, such decree bars him from claiming participation in the proceeds of such lands until such decreed debts are satisfied.

4. When appeal from an appealable decree is barred by time, an appeal from a later decree will not review the former decree, and the later decree cannot be reversed for an error in it arising from following the former decree.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County; E. Boyd Faulkner, Judge.

Bill by George W. Trail against Alberta Trail and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jos. Trapnell and Forrest W. Brown, for appellants. D. B. Lucas and MacDonald & Beckwith, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. George W. Trail, executor for Charles H. Trail, filed his bill in the circuit court of Jefferson county against the devisees of Charles H. Trail and various creditors of Trail to settle the accounts of said executor, convene the creditors of Trail, and ascertain their debts, and to subject the real and personal estate of Trail to the payment of his debts. The court referred the cause to a commissioner to settle with the executor, to report of what real estate Trail died seised, and the debts due from him and their priorities. The commissioner made a report specifying the real estate of said decedent, and numerous debts against him, and settled the accounts of said executor, and reported that there was no personal estate to satisfy the debts. The cause was heard upon said report, and a decree was pronounced against the estate for the payment to divers persons of their divers debts, fixing their amounts, and declaring them all to be of the same class as to the assets of said estate, and decreed that the real estate reported by said reporter as the property of said decedent be sold by commissioners appointed for that purpose. This decree was pronounced June 12, 1900. Eugene Baker was a defendant to the suit, the bill stating that he claimed a debt against Trail's estate by reason of Trail having been a deputy of Baker, who was sheriff of Jefferson county, on account of tax bills for collection, for which he was to account to Baker. The report of the commissioner did not report any debt in favor of Baker. Baker did not except to the report. On February 21, 1902, Baker filed a petition stating that Trail had been his deputy as sheriff, and received tax-books and collected taxes, and on that account he was indebted to Baker in a sum left blank in said petition, and it prayed that Baker's debt might be audited and paid out of the estate. On June 2, 1902, he filed an amended petition setting up the same thing

TRAIL v. TRAIL et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 20, 1904.)

APPEALABLE DECREE—ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATE—BILL BY EXECUTOR—RES JUDICATA—FAILURE TO PROVE DEBT.

1. A decree in a suit by an executor against devisees to convene creditors and administer the assets for their payment, made on a report of debts by a commissioner, which decrees debts against the estate, and subjects its lands to their payment, is appealable, and must be appealed from within two years.

2. A bill by an executor to administer the assets of his testator for the payment of debts states that a person named claims a debt against the estate on a specific demand, and such person is made a formal party, but does not prove his claim or appear. A decree is made allowing as to the indebtedness, and claiming that it amounted to $2,880.25, and asking its payment out of the assets of said estate. On the same date he filed an answer setting up his claim. He filed no evidence of Trail's indebtedness. The sale commissioner proceeded from time to time to sell different pieces of real estate of said Trail, and made several reports of such sale, which were confirmed by the court. When the commissioner would report these sales at different times, the court would refer the matter of fixing the ratable shares or dividends in the several sale moneys of the various creditors whose debts had been decreed, requiring of the commissioner forthwith reports. This was done because there were several sales at different times, and the matter of percentage payable on the many debts was a matter of somewhat elaborate calculation. To one of these reports Baker made an exception because the commissioner had failed to report upon his claim, the court having on February 21, 1902, when Baker's petition was filed, referred it to the same commissioner to report upon Baker's demand. By a decree August 22, 1902, the court heard the cause upon the record already made and on Baker's petition, amended petition, and answer, and the forthwith report of the commissioner Cleon Moore, apportioning a fund in the hands of the sale commissioner arising from sale of a part of said realty, and the court decreed that the funds in the hands of the sale commissioner should be distributed to the creditors whose debts had been audited by the former decree under the said general order of reference, and overruled Baker's exception to the said forthwith report. Thus the court refused to allow Baker any part of the assets, to the prejudice of those creditors who had proven their demands before Commissioner Moore under the general order of reference, and whose debts had been allowed against the estate by the said decree of June 12, 1900. The court again directed the commissioner to take proof of Baker's demand, and it was afterwards reported by a commissioner's report filed February 25, 1903, at $2,957.70. It was ascertained and reported by the commissioner that the property of said decedent was not sufficient to pay his debts. The record fully discloses that fact. It discloses that said property will not pay the debts decreed by the decree of June 12, 1900. An unsigned petition, said in the record to be the petition of James E. Watson and others, was filed in the case August 22, 1902. It states that said petitioners had joined as sureties in the bond of Baker as sheriff, and that a liability had been found to exist in favor of the state and county of Jefferson against Baker as sheriff, for which they, as sureties, would be liable, and that thus they were interested in having the property of Trail, because he was Baker's deputy, applied to pay a liability of Trail to Baker by reason of Trail's having been Baker's deputy—the same liability specified above. They specified no amount of liability. They simply prayed that the fund in the case arising from said sale of Trail's property be retained in the hands of a receiver to await the liabilities of the bondmen of Baker. By the said decree of August 22, 1902, which denied relief to Baker, as above stated, the court also denied relief upon the petition of the said bondmen of Baker. Baker died pending the suit, and it was revived against his administrator. By the decree of February 21, 1900, mentioned above as ordering a reference to convene creditors, the court directed the sale of a certain piece of the realty in advance of any convention of creditors, and that property was sold, and its proceeds consumed by application upon a debt due the Bank of Harpers Ferry, which had a mortgage thereon, giving it a preference over other creditors as to the property. This decree was made because some of the parties assented to it. From all these decrees the administrator of Eugene Baker, and James E. Watson and others, joining him, in said petition have appealed.

The objection to the decree selling the piece of property in advance of the ascertainment of the debts is based on the ground that a decedent's land cannot be sold until there has been such ascertainment. This is true, but it is useless to say more about that decree, for the reason that later decrees are barred, and cannot now be reversed, as appellants' counsel freely admit, it going with them.

An assignment of error claims that it was error to confirm the report of the commissioner auditing the debts, which excluded the debt of Baker. The argument is that the court should have recommitted it to inquire into the debt of Baker, though the report was not excepted to by him, it appearing that there was such a debt, since the bill alleged it. In the first place, we cannot affect that decree because it dates June 12, 1900, and the appeal was allowed September 10, 1903, and therefore the appeal is barred by the statute of limitation so far as that decree is concerned. It is argued, however, that an appeal from that decree is not barred, because it is not a final decree, and any error in it is to be remedied under an appeal from a later decree, as it would be carried into the subsequent decrees, which are within the appeal limit. It is very true that under the case of Stout v. Phillippi, 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. 571, 56 Am. St. Rep. 843, a nonappealable decree is carried forward to the date of a later appealable decree, and is reviewable upon an appeal from the later decree. But the fault in this position is that that decree of June 12, 1900, is essentially an appealable decree, because it confirms the commissioner's report auditing debts against the estate, ascertains these debts against it, and specifies to whom they are going, and declares the assets liable, and directs the sale the real estate to pay those debts. That decree settled the rights of the parties. For claim that this is not an appealable decree we are cited to Hooper v. Hooper, 29 W. 276, 1 S. E. 280. That case repels, rather than sustains, the position that the decree is unappealable. That case holds that a decree which sustains exceptions to a commissioner's report and recommitts it is not appealable. Of course not, because it does nothing. But that is not to say that a commissioner's report not excepted to, and carried into an actual decree fixing the rights of the parties, is not appealable. The opinion virtually says that it is a final decree.

Appellant complains that the court did not recommit the report. Why should it have done so? Was not Baker a party? Did it fail to except to the report? He there raised any objection to it. Keck v. Allen, 37 W. Va. 201, 16 S. E. 520. It does not appear that he moved a recommitment, and, if he had done so, the court ought not to have granted it, because he had had his day before the commissioner, and had presented evidence to sustain his claim. It did not appear that he had any debts. The commissioner would not have been warranted in granting it, because there was no evidence to prove its existence or its amount. The court did not do so. It simply stated that if there had been Baker's deputy, and had tax for collection, and that Baker had pressed his claim to him. This feature of the case was only a suggestion that Baker and his claimed debts against the estate. The court did not say a word about their justness or amount. How could a commissioner, without evidence, predicate a report of Baker's debt upon that bill? The debt was properly one unliquidated.

Now, as to the action of the court in denying Baker participation along with the other creditors in the real assets of Trail, Inc.: the decree is final upon Baker's demand. His demand was specified in the bill, and was a party. He did not except. The court ignored his demand, and thus disallowed it; in effect, it decided against his demand. On general principles of res judicata, with reference to Code 1899, c. 86, § 9, which link that Baker would be barred. He made a party. The bill stated that he was to be a creditor on a specified demand. He could have proven it under the bill. Not having done so, he is bound by the decree alone, on common-law principles; for, if the suit is such that a party has had the matter disposed of, he is bound. Rogers v. Rogers, 37 W. Va. 407, 16 S. E. 633; Blern v. Ray, 49 W. Va. 129, 24 S. E. 530; Sheets v. Selden, 7 Wall. 416, 18 Ed. 166. His claim was involved in the suit far enough to make that decree bar demand for the reason above stated. The matter does not rest alone on the principle of res judicata outside the statute. It is plain that Code 1899, c. 86, § 9, bars Baker's claim, as it says, when there has been a convention of the creditors of a dead man's estate before a commissioner according to that chapter, and the court decrees "a distribution of the proceeds of such real estate among such of the creditors as shall have shown themselves entitled thereto, which decree, so made, shall be a bar to the claim of any creditor of the deceased who has failed to present the same to the commissioner as required by said notice, except that, if a surplus remain after such distribution, the creditor so failing may share in the same upon proving his claim at any time before a final decree is made in such suit." Now, the import of that statute is plain, its letter plain, its purpose plain. A debtor dies. It is to the interest of his creditors and heirs that his estate be wound up at once. The statute gives these creditors notice to appear before the commissioner. Certain ones appear and prove their debts, and others fail to do so. A decree is rendered for the debts reported, and the property is declared liable to such debts. That moment those creditors have fixed and vested rights upon the property by the force and effect of a decree settling the rights of all the parties interested as creditors in that estate, which rights cannot be afterwards displaced at the instance of negligent creditors. Such a decree is a decree of distribution of the assets among the decreed creditors, because it says just what debts are to be paid out of the assets. It tells us just what the assets are to pay, and after-decree does but execute the decree fixing the rights of the party. After-decree only apply the assets upon the principles marked out, settled, and fixed by the first decree. It is that decree which works the distribution in a legal point of view, for when the special commissioner later sells the land he is told by the decree confirming the sale to pay the proceeds of the sale to the creditors entitled under the former decree. The later decree cannot make any other application than that adjudged in the former decree. If this be not so, then, long after, negligent creditors may come in and demand that the diligent creditors pay back money received under the former decree. We must construe the words "may decree distribution" in the light of our statute making appealable a decree "adjudicating the principles of a cause." A decree that does this is a decree of distribution under the statute. Any decree fixing debts and charging the assets with them is a decree of distribution under this statute. It is an appealable decree—I think a final decree—and must be appealed from within two years. Lehman v. Hinton, 44 W. Va. 1, 29 S. E. 984; Core v. Stickler, 24 W. Va. 689; Buster v. Holland, 27 W. Va. 510. It is in vain to rely on appeal from later decrees than the main decree of June 12, 1900, as they are only sequences from it. They only paid out money on debts allowed by it. If even the later decrees were erroneous, the error came from that decree, and as appeal from it was barred, and it cannot be reviewed, later decrees executing it cannot be reversed. Buster v. Holland, 27 W. Va. 510. But I see no error in that decree. Appeal from later decree cannot review that decree, as it is appealable, and appeal from it barred by lapse of two years. Therefore we hold that the decree of June 12, 1900, is an effectual bar against Baker's demand. The same may be said as to the petition of Watson and others, for similar reasons. We have several times held that a decree fixing liens upon a living man's realty and subjecting it in a judgment lien suit under Code 1899, c. 139, § 7, bars a judgment not presented until after such decree. Benson v. Snyder, 42 W. Va. 223, 24 S. E. 880; Bensimer v. Fell, 35 W. Va. 15, 12 S. E. 1078, 29 Am. St. Rep. 774. For the point in hand these statutes are similar, having the same end in view. It is suggested that a difference exists between the two statutes from the fact that as to a dead man's estate the Code says the court "may" decree a distribution upon the report of debts, whereas the other statute says "shall" decree. Now, this statute was made for the benefit of creditors, and the law is that when this word "may" is in a statute made for the benefit of persons it is not simply permissive, but mandatory or compulsory. 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 237. It cannot be that when a report has been made in a creditors' suit after due notice, and the case is ready for hearing, and the creditors entitled to have their debts decreed, a public court of the country has an option to postpone it, unless cause be shown therefor. None was shown in this case. Delay was not even asked.

As to the exception to Moore's forthwith report. That was only a report touching the dividends payable out of part of the proceeds of sale to the creditors under the former decree. That was no report of debts. That report was not subject to such an exception. Exception should have been made to the first report, but it was neglected. And even at that date there was not a particle of proof of Baker's debt. It is complained that the commissioner failed to report on Baker's claim as directed by the court, and went on to decree to creditors dividends out of the sale moneys. It is said the court should have recommitted the report, and we are cited to King v. Burdett, 44 W. Va. 561, 29 S. E. 1010. The answer is, this was a report of dividends only. The rights of the parties had been decreed already, before Baker's petition was filed. If the debts had not been decreed, there might be some force in the suggestion that the report—I mean the forthwith report of dividends—should have been recommitted. Such was the case in the case of King v. Burdett. That case is wholly without force in this instance. It is useless to tell us that Code 1899, c. 86, § 3, provides that the real estate of a decedent shall be assets for the payment of debts and all lawful demands against his estate in the order in which personal assets are to be applied, and that after preferred debts such assets go to all other debts ratably; or to cite us to section 3, c. 86, making the real estate of a decedent liable for debts. Those provisions only declare the liability of real assets and fix their order for payment of debts; but they do not change or apply to a decree which has already ascertained what debts shall be paid. Those statutes tell a court how debts that are reported shall be decreed, but they do not give ground to overthrow a decree already passed at the instance of a party who has failed to prove his case. We do not think section 26, c. 87, Code 1899, relates to the case. It applies to ex parte settlements in the probate court, not to a creditors' suit in circuit court. I add that it was right to allow Baker to prove his debt before a commissioner, so as to have a decree against the estate or a surplus, should one appear; but that did not say it was to prejudice debts already decreed.

For these reasons we dismiss the appeal as to the decrees of February 21, 1900, May 1, 1900, June 12, 1900, June 4, 1901, as appeal from them is barred, and affirm the decrees of February 25, 1902, August 22, 1902, and February 25, 1903.

HONESDALE SHOE CO. et al. v. MONTGOMERY, et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Dec. 6, 1904.)

ACTION—BEGINNING—CREDITORS' SUIT—DISMISSAL—RECORD—CONTRADICTION.

1. A summons to begin a suit under chapter 124, § 5, Code 1899, once issued, brings a suit into being.

2. A suit by a single creditor of an insolvent debtor, under chapter 74, § 2, Code 1899, whether in his own name only or for himself and other creditors, is from the date of the summons a suit for all creditors, and he cannot dismiss it, against the will of other creditors, at rules or in term. It may be dismissed as to him, but others can prosecute it in their names as substituted plaintiffs. If he dismisses it at rules, other creditors may at the next term have it reinstated, though the summons has not been served or the bill filed.

3. Oral or other extrinsic evidence cannot be allowed to deny, contradict, vary, or enlarge a record; but it may be allowed to prove matters as to which the record is silent, though such matters relate to, but do not vary or contradict, it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Suit by the Honesdale Shoe Company and others against Wells D. Montgomery and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

¶ 1. See Action, vol. 1, Cent. Dig. § 728.

E. G. Smith and Harvey F. Smith, for appellants. Davis & Davis and Sperry & Sperry, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. The Honesdale Shoe Company and others presented their bill, asking that it be read also as a petition, to the circuit court of Harrison county, stating that Wells D. Montgomery on and prior to March 23, 1903, was indebted to it and other named creditors, and was on that date insolvent, and that on that date he made a deed of trust to Jamieson, as trustee, conveying certain property to secure a debt to Articia C. Montgomery; that the Koblebard Company, as a creditor of Wells Montgomery, brought suit in chancery on August 21, 1903, within four months after the recordation of said deed of trust, which was on April 22d, having the purpose to set aside said deed of trust as an unlawful preference of Articia C. Montgomery over other creditors, and to apply the property pro rata among all his creditors; that the summons issued had not been served on the defendants; that it was returnable to September rules; that by reason of some arrangement between the Koblebard Company and Montgomery, by which the debt of the Koblebard Company had been adjusted, said summons was recalled by the Koblebard Company, and not served by the sheriff into whose hands it had been delivered for service; that no bill was filed, but at the September rules the suit was, on motion of the Koblebard Company, dismissed. The said bill of the Honesdale Company was presented to the court at the next term after such dismissal on the 7th of October. It asked the court to set aside said office dismissal and reinstate the case, and to grant leave to the Honesdale Company and other creditors joining in said bill and petition to allow them to prosecute said suit in their names as plaintiffs. The bill set up the facts touching said deed of trust, and prayed that it be held void so far as it preferred the debt of Articia C. Montgomery, and held for the benefit of all creditors. The court entered an order saying that, it appearing that the summons had been placed in an officer's hands and returned unserved by order of the Koblebard Company, and no bill filed, and that the suit had been dismissed, and the purpose for which the suit was instituted in no manner appearing from the record, the court refused to set aside the office dismissal and reinstate the case, and refused to let the Honesdale Company and the creditors joining it in said bill prosecute the suit as plaintiffs. From this order the Honesdale Company and its associates appeal.

When the writ issued, a suit came into being. Code 1899, c. 124, § 5; Manufacturing Co. v. Chewing, 52 W. Va. 523, 44 S. E. 123; Lawrence v. Winifrede Co., 48 W. Va. 189, 35 S. E. 925. Though that suit was in the sole name of the Koblebard Company, not one in terms for itself and all other creditors of Montgomery, yet Code 1899, c. 74, § 2, made it a suit for all such creditors by the words "every such suit shall be deemed to be brought in behalf of the plaintiff and all other creditors of such insolvent debtor." From the start it was a general creditors' suit. For this purpose we must assimilate it to a creditors' suit against a decedent's estate, or a judgment lien creditors' suit, or one against an insolvent corporation, and apply the law applicable in such cases. Our cases show that when a suit bears that character it is for the benefit of all creditors, and not under the unlimited control of the nominal plaintiff, properly so called. Whether brought by a plaintiff in his own name only or for himself and other creditors, when a reference is made to convene creditors, it is then surely a suit for the benefit of all, because the reference is for all, and gives the character of the creditors' suit. Arnold v. Casner, 22 W. Va. 444; Laidley v. Kline, 23 W. Va. 565. Without statute the reference makes the suit a general creditors' suit, but the statute in this case makes it such ab initio. If it did not say so, the law would make it so after the reference, without aid from the statute. The statute would not be needed to make it such a suit from the reference, and we can thus fairly say that the statute makes it a creditors' suit from the birth of the suit. The statute does not say it shall have that stamp only after reference. Being a creditors' suit, the nominal plaintiff cannot dismiss it at will to the prejudice of other creditors, as it is their suit no less than his. He can dismiss it as to himself, but others can become plaintiffs by order of the court, if not already parties, or be transposed from the position of defendants to that of plaintiffs. Without this statute, after a reference the plaintiff on the record, though his debt might be paid, or he wish to dismiss, could not do so against the will of other creditors. Linsey v. McGannon, 9 W. Va. 154; Bilmyer v. Sherman, 23 W. Va. 656. In Lewis v. Laidley, 39 W. Va. 422, 19 S. E. 378, we held that "it is error to dismiss a general lien creditor's suit on motion of the nominal plaintiff whose debt has been paid." He may have the cause dismissed as to himself, but not as to other creditors, who are parties, formal or informal. Howard v. Stephenson, 33 W. Va. 116, 10 S. E. 66, gives right to another creditor to ask the suit to go on, as do also the cases cited above. To give the nominal plaintiff absolute right of dismissal would, as the opinion in the Lewis Case by Judge Dent says, allow the defendant debtor to collude with the nominal plaintiff in controlling the litigation, and in this manner often greatly delay, hinder, and defraud other lien creditors.

In Bilmyer v. Sherman, after saying that the plaintiff might dismiss as to himself, when the court could direct the case afterwards to go on in the name of some one else, the court, by Judge Snyder, added: "If such were not the case, the other creditors would be at the mercy of the nominal plaintiff, and the uses of the creditors' suit would be greatly impaired, if not entirely destroyed." One creditor, as in this case, brings a suit, and, after it is too late for others to sue, wants to dismiss it. Can it be that he can thus end it, and destroy other creditors, in the face of a statute which plainly intends that one suit shall go for the relief of all, and thus avoid multiplicity of suits with consequent costs? That would be a misapplication of the statute; would defeat its object and remedial utility. We must apply it as a remedial statute. We are, however, told that, while these principles may apply to a full-fledged suit, or after reference, they do not apply to a mere writ not served, where no bill has been filed; that they cannot, at earliest, apply before the writ is served; that till then there is no suit. There is a suit born of the summons. If a creditors' suit, it has that stamp from the issuance of the summons, because that summons is a part and parcel of the suit. Necessarily, there must be a period, long or short, between its date of summons and the filing of the bill; and it looks odd to say that the suit does not in that period have the cast which the bill has, which, when filed, relates back to the date of the summons. Cannot a notice of lis pendens be recorded on the date of the summons, though the bill be not then filed? It is a suit in the interim, else the lis pendens would be void. What reason for drawing such distinction, and thus work the mischief suggested by Judges Dent and Snyder? It must be conceded, under decisions above cited, that after bill filed the formal plaintiff could not dismiss to the harm of the others, and I cannot see why, if they have a right to participate in the suit at a later point in its life, they have not equally so in an earlier, since it is apparent that a dismissal may prejudice them equally in both cases. If parties, in legal contemplation, at one time, why not at another?

We must not impute to these creditors want of diligence in not bringing each one his own suit. The statute relieves them from bringing each suit, as it tells them that the one suit is for the benefit of all. In fact, it being a creditors' suit, a fair construction of the statute would make it forbid such suits. I doubt not that if, with knowledge of such suit by one creditor, they bring other suits, they would pay their own costs, because otherwise the debtor's assets would be devoured in the costs of multiplied suits. Laidley v. Kline, 23 W. Va. 565. The second would likely be suspended by the first suit under the case cited. Then why bring it? These other creditors applied at the earliest possible date to have the court order the suit to continue for their benefit. The Code gives the court power at the next term to reinstate a cause dismissed in the preceding vacation. We have seen that they had such interests as entitled them to move a reinstatement.

It is urged that, as no bill was yet filed to show the object of the suit, evidence dehors the record cannot be allowed to show it, as that would violate the rule that the record speaks for itself; and evidence cannot be received to vary, explain, or supplement it. This is so on matters spoken by it. As stated in Perry v. McHuffman, 7 W. Va. 306, and State v. Vest, 21 W. Va. 796, it is elementary law that a record imports such absolute verity that nothing can be pleaded or proven against its statements. You cannot prove its statements false, or vary or explain the effect of the record as to what it speaks, or add to it to change its effect or meaning; that is, you cannot thus alter or deny its effects. In 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 193 (2d Ed.), we find that this rule is limited to matters to which the record relates, and that "it is never permissible to introduce parol or other extrinsic evidence to vary or contradict a judicial record; but where the record on its face does not show the precise question determined, or in other respects leaves any matter open to doubt, parol and other extrinsic evidence, which is not in conflict with the record, may be introduced to aid and explain it by showing the precise questions which were determined, or that certain questions were not passed upon, or otherwise clearing up any doubts which might exist." Under this principle oral evidence was allowed where a record of confession of judgment by attorney, not showing whether it was by an attorney at law or in fact, to show that it was by an attorney in fact, Calwell v. Shields, 2 Rob. 305. Evidence is always allowed where res judicata is involved, and the record does not disclose the exact matter in issue, to show the matter actually tried. "To apply the judgment or decree, and give effect to the adjudication, when the record leaves the matter in doubt, such evidence is admissible." Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 608, 24 L. Ed. 214; Legrand v. Rixey, 83 Va. 862, 877, 3 S. E. 864. Ancient and modern law is stated in 7 Rob. Prac. 263, 264, in these words: "To take averment, which stands with the record, and which doth not impugn anything apparent within the record, the law doth well admit and allow." In this instance it is not proposed to deny or contradict anything of record. Before we talk of oral evidence to vary or explain or add to a record, we must have a record. The bill proposes to prove only the purpose of the suit of the Koblebard Company not to contradict anything already done by the court, nor even to deny a pleading.

Therefore, reversing the order of the circuit court, we set aside the dismissal made rules, and reinstate the case to the condition of a pending cause, and order the said to be filed at rules after service of process, and give leave to the plaintiffs to prosecute the same suit in their names as plaintiffs, and dismiss it as to Koblegard Company, and give leave to said plaintiffs to set out alias or further summons in their names as plaintiffs substituted in place of Koblegard Company, and remand the case for further proceedings at rules and the circuit court.

INTESTATE — PERSONAL ESTATE — CLAIM FOR WRONGFUL DEATH — PLEADING — SPECIAL PLEAS — ACTION BY ADMINISTRATOR — SECURITY FOR COSTS — SPECIAL INTERROGATORIES.

C. was employed as a laborer by the defendant at its manufacturing plant in O. county, Va. While engaged, under direction of defendant's labor foreman, in tearing down a scaffold which had been erected by defendant and attached to it, he was injured by the falling of one of the platforms of the scaffold, and from the effect of his injuries died in Bellaire, in the state of Ohio, where he resided. He having intestate, the county court of Ohio county committed his estate to R., sheriff of said county, to be by him administered. R., as administrator of C., instituted this action in O. county, at the time of his death, C. had no mansion or known place of residence, any real estate, any property situate in the state of West Virginia, and since his death no property being to him or to his estate, except the claim damages sued for in this action, has come into his estate.

It is held, that said claim against defendant in action for damages for the death of plaintiff intestate must be deemed property, within the meaning of our statute; that the county court of O. county had authority to commit the estate of C. to the sheriff of that county, to be by him administered; and that said sheriff, as administrator of C., had the right to institute and prosecute this action.

Special pleas which aver matters only that should be given in evidence under the general issue should be rejected.

A resident administrator who brings an action in a court of this state to recover damages under our statute for the death of his intestate, who was a nonresident, should not be required to give security for costs.

Where, in an action for fatal injury, it arises a question whether death resulted from injury, or from disease with which it had no connection, the party causing the injury is not to escape full liability without showing that death must have resulted if the injury had been done.

If the master cause to be constructed a scaffold in an unworkmanlike manner, and use defective or unsound materials, all of which render the scaffold dangerous and insecure, and the master or his foreman in charge of the work knew it, or ought to have had knowledge of it by the exercise of reasonable attention, care, and diligence, but direct such to be done and that character of materials be used, he is liable to his workman, who, by himself in the exercise of reasonable care, is injured thereby while working thereon, unless the workman, by the use of ordinary care, ought to have detected the unworkmanlike construction of, and the defective or unsound materials used in, the scaffold.

6. Point 4 of syllabus in Andrews v. Mundy, 38 W. Va. 22, 14 S. E. 414, approved and applied.

7. When a servant enters into the employment of a master, he assumes all the ordinary risks incident to the employment, whether the employment be dangerous or otherwise.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ohio County; Thayer Melvin, Judge.

Action by H. C. Richards, administrator, against the Riverside Ironworks. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Wm. H. Hearne, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Howard and T. S. Riley, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. John W. Campbell, the plaintiff's intestate, was before and on the 20th day of January, 1899, and also on the 18th day of February, 1899, the time of his death, a resident of Bellaire, in the state of Ohio. For some time previous to the first-mentioned date he had been employed as a general laborer by the defendant, the Riverside Ironworks, a corporation, at its manufacturing plant in Benwood, Ohio county, W. Va. A short time before January 20, 1899, a wooden scaffold, consisting of three platforms, had been built by defendant to enable its bricklayers to work therefrom in rebuilding and painting for it a brick wall at one end of its stockhouse. The bricklayers worked on the scaffold with brick and other materials, and completed the wall after several days' labor thereon. Intestate, with other laborers, worked on the scaffold, attending the bricklayers, but did not assist in the construction of it. After the work on the brick wall had been completed, Campbell and Barkhurst, another laborer, were directed by one Lowe, a labor foreman then in the employ of defendant, to tear down the scaffold. This Campbell and Barkhurst proceeded to do, and, while so engaged, the scaffold fell. They were thrown to the ground. Campbell was injured on the head and elsewhere about his body, and from the effects of his injuries so received he died at his home, in Bellaire, Ohio, at the time above stated.

On the 15th day of May, 1899, the county court of Ohio county committed the estate of said Campbell, deceased, to H. C. Richards, then sheriff of that county, to be administered. On the 28th day of June next thereafter, Richards, as administrator, commenced this action, in which he claimed $10,000 damages from the defendant on account of the death of his intestate, resulting from said injuries occasioned as aforesaid. The defendant interposed its plea to the jurisdiction of the court in the action, and therein denies the right of the plaintiff to maintain his said action, because it says that neither the said county court had jurisdiction to so commit the estate of said John W. Campbell, deceased, to said Richards to be administered, nor had said Richards authority by reason of said action of the county court to institute or prosecute this action against defendant, for the following reasons, to wit: That said John W. Campbell, who was at the time of his death a nonresident of the state of West Virginia, died intestate in Belmont county, in the state of Ohio, where he then resided, and where his family still reside; that at the time of his death he had no mansion house or known place of residence, or any real estate or any property of any kind, situate in the state of West Virginia, nor since then has he had any property in the last-mentioned state, unless the claim sued for in the said action can be regarded as property.

A demurrer by the plaintiff to this plea was sustained by the court. This ruling of the court involves a construction of our statute under which the action is brought and prosecuted. Section 5 of chapter 103 of the Code of 1899 provides that: "Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action to recover damages in respect thereof; then, and in every such case, the person who, or the corporation which, would have been liable if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to murder in the first or second degree, or manslaughter." The statute gives the right to institute and prosecute the suit. But for our statute, the action could not be maintained. The Supreme Court of Indiana, in Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Swayne's Adm'r, 26 Ind. 477, 484, in discussing a similar statute, says: "The action given by the statute is for causing the death, by a wrongful act or omission, in a case where the deceased might have maintained an action, had he lived, for an injury by the act or omission. The right of compensation for the bodily injury of the deceased, which died with him, remains extinct. The right of action created by the statute is founded on a new grievance, namely, causing the death, and is for the injury sustained thereby by the widow and children or next of kin of the deceased, for the damages must inure to their exclusive benefit. They are recovered in the name of the personal representative of the deceased, but do not become assets of the estate. The relation of the administrator to the fund, when recovered, is not that of the representative of the deceased, but of a trustee for the benefit of the widow and next of kin. The action is for their exclusive benefit, and, if no such person existed, it could not be maintained. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Keely's Adm'r, 23 Ind.

133; Lucas v. New York C. R. Co., 21 Barb. 245; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Morris, 28 Ill. 400; State v. Gilmore, 24 N. H. 461; Johnston v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 7 Ohio St. 836, 70 Am. Dec. 75; Commonwealth v. Eastern R. Co., 5 Gray, 473."

Section 6 declares that: "Every such action shall be brought by and in the name of the personal representative of such deceased person; and the amount recovered in every such action shall be distributed to the parties and in the proportion provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal estate left by persons dying intestate. In every such action, the jury may give such damages as they shall deem fair and just, not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and the amount so recovered shall not be subject to any debts or liabilities of the deceased." Section 4 of chapter 85 provides that, "In case of a person dying intestate, the jurisdiction to hear and determine the right of administration of his estate shall be in the court which would have jurisdiction as to the probate of his will, if there was a will." Section 22 of chapter 77, Code 1899, reads as follows: "The county court shall have power and jurisdiction to hear proof of, and admit wills to probate as follows: First. In the county wherein the deceased, at the time of his death had a mansion-house or known place of residence; or, second, if he had no such house or place of residence, then in the county wherein any real estate devised thereby is situated; or, third, if there be no real estate devised thereby, and the testator had no such house or place of residence, then in the county where he died, or in any county wherein he had any property at the time of his death." Subsection 16 of section 17 of chapter 13 of the Code of 1899 says: "The words 'personal estate' or 'personal property' include goods, chattels real and personal, money credits, investments and the evidences thereof." It is suggested that the alleged right to recover damages from the defendant in this action is not property, within the meaning of the law, but that, if such right be deemed property for the purposes of this action, the same was not consummate until the death of Campbell, which occurred at his legal residence in the state of Ohio, and that therefore the legal situs of the right or property was and is in the state of Ohio. But it will be observed that our statute gives right to the action for death caused by injuries which would have been actionable had death not ensued, without regard to the residence of the decedent at the time of his death. The statute is remedial, and should be construed liberally for the purpose of carrying out the legislative intent. Marvin v. Maysville St. R. Co. (C. C.) 49 Fed. 438. In Hartford & New Haven R. Co. v. Andrews, 36 Conn. 215, the court says that the claim, if valid, is property, within the meaning of the statute, and that it was not the province of the court of probate to pass upon the validity of the claim. It was enough for that court to be satisfied that there was an apparent claim, and a bona fide intention to pursue it, and that administration was necessary to its pursuit. 2 Woerner, Am. Law of Adm'n, § 306. "Personal property, whether of a tangible or an intangible character, is considered as located, for the purposes of administration, in the territory of that state whose laws must furnish the remedies for its reduction into possession." Speed v. Kelly, 59 Miss. 47, 51. In Perry, Adm'r, v. St. J. & W. R. Co., 29 Kan. 420—an action upon a statute almost identical with our own—it was held: "A claim for damages for causing the death of a party, under section 422 of the Code, is prosecuted by the administrator for the benefit of the widow and children or next of kin of the deceased, and is not an estate of the deceased to be administered within this state, within the meaning of the act respecting executors and administrators. * * * A probate court has no jurisdiction to issue letters of administration on the estate of an intestate where such intestate is not an inhabitant or resident of this state at the time of his death, and leaves no estate in the state, and none comes into it afterwards. * * * Where a probate court has no jurisdiction to issue letters of administration on the estate of an intestate, its acts in doing so are void for all purposes." In Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Swayne, supra, Marvin v. Maysville R. Co., supra, and Central R. Co. v. Cragin, 71 Ill. 177, the decisions are in accord with the Kansas case above cited. A different conclusion, however, is reached in other states, where, as in our state, the fact that the statute gives such a right of action to the personal representative, and to him alone, implies the right to appoint, if necessary, an administrator to enforce it; and, where there is property or a fund or right of action which cannot otherwise be made available, it is competent for the probate court to appoint an administrator for the sole purpose of collecting and receiving assets, which will not be general assets of the estate of his intestate, or liable for his debts, but which will belong to particular persons who by law or by contract with the deceased will be entitled thereto. In such case it is for the probate court to determine whether there is an apparent claim, a bona fide intention to pursue it, and that administration is necessary to its pursuit. That it is the duty of the probate court to appoint under such circumstances seems to admit of no doubt, for, if the right to bring the action is given to no one but an administrator, the refusal to appoint one would render the statute giving the remedy nugatory. 1 Woerner, Am. Law of Ad. § 205; Hutchins v. St. Paul R. R., 44 Minn. 5, 46 N. W. 79; Brown v. L. & N. R. R., 97 Ky. 228, 232, 30 S. W. 639; Findlay v. Chicago R. R., 106 Mich. 700, 64 N. W. 732; Morris v. Chicago R. R., 65 Iowa, 727, 728, 23 N. W. 143, 54 Am. Rep. 89; Sargent v. Sargent, 168 Mass. 420, 47 N. E. 121; Hartford R. R. v. Andrews, 36 Conn. 213. In the light of the authorities cited, we must hold that the county court of Ohio county had legal authority to commit the estate of the decedent to Richards, as sheriff, and that he, as such sheriff, with the powers of administrator thus cast upon him, had the right to institute and prosecute said action against defendant. The court therefore did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the plea aforesaid.

Plaintiff in error complains that security for the costs of the action was not required of the plaintiff, and assigns this for error, on the ground that the residence of the distributees or beneficiaries of the damages, if any should be recovered, reside in the state of Ohio. We think this contention is not tenable. The residence of the plaintiff in the action and the situs of the demand are in Ohio county. This being so, the law relating to security for costs does not apply.

The defendant also tendered two special pleas in bar, one of which avers that it was not decedent's injuries, but the low order of his vitality, produced by the use by him of intoxicating liquors, which produced his death; and the other, that the injuries of the deceased were not of themselves sufficient to cause his death, but that his death was due primarily to his low order of vitality and his alcoholic condition, produced by the continuous drinking by him of liquors. Both of these pleas, upon objection thereto by plaintiff, were properly rejected, because everything averred therein could have been given in evidence under the general issue. The pleas were, in effect, the general issue, which had been pleaded by defendant to the declaration and issue thereon joined. Hagerstown v. Klotz (Md.) 49 Atl. 836, 54 L. R. A. 940, 86 Am. St. Rep. 437.

The material averments in the declaration are that the scaffold was constructed by the defendant, its agents and servants, from old and defective timber, which, on account of its defects and unsoundness, was unfit to be used in the construction thereof; that the defendant, its agents and servants, well knew of the unsoundness and unfitness of the timber at and before the scaffold was constructed therefrom; that the defendant negligently and willfully permitted the timber to be used in the construction of the scaffold; that the scaffold was built in an unworkmanlike manner, and that by reason of the unsound and defective materials, and the unworkmanlike manner in which the scaffold was built therefrom, the scaffold was dangerous and unsafe; that, with knowledge of the dangerous and unsafe condition of the scaffold, defendant ordered and directed the plaintiff's intestate, who had no notice thereof, and was not aware of the insufficiency, unsoundness, or dangerous condition of the scaffold, to ascend the same for the purpose of tearing it down; and that, while tearing the scaffold down as directed and ordered to do, it gave way, thereby precipitating decedent to the ground, and thus causing him injuries, from the effects of which he died.

Charles Grimm testifies that he was at the time, and before Campbell was injured, the foreman of the defendant Riverside Furnace. He says: "I had the scaffold built to enable the bricklayers to do some work in trimming up the end of the stockhouse. The scaffold had three platforms." J. W. Detter, a carpenter, testifies that he is a carpenter, and had charge of the construction of the scaffold under Grimm, who told him what to do, and who had authority to tell him what to do. The material used in its construction was taken from a pile of lumber belonging to defendant, near by, and by direction of defendant's foreman. Most of the lumber had been used before. There is no question about the soundness of the four uprights of the scaffold, but there is evidence tending to prove the unsoundness and weakness of the other lumber used therein. Speaking of the lookouts which held the uprights in place, and also supported the floors of the several platforms of the scaffold, Mr. Hughes, a carpenter, who, with one Reilly, put up the scaffold, says: "Well, the timber was pretty knotty, and also windshaky." He further testifies that some of the lookouts were doubled, but states, as to the strength and sufficiency of the scaffold: "Well, I didn't think that it was a good scaffold. I wouldn't consider it a good scaffold." Campbell, the decedent, and Barkhurst commenced on the third and upper platform to tear down the scaffold. They threw off the boards and knocked the lookouts from the uprights on that floor, then went down to the second and did the same, and thence to the first. While they were standing on that floor or platform, about two minutes after they reached it, a lookout supporting one end of the floor gave way, and decedent and Barkhurst were thrown to the ground. One of the lookouts of the lower platform was afterwards seen hanging by the nails at one end from an upright to which it had been fastened, the other end having given way entirely. There is other evidence tending to prove the same and other facts, and some testimony tending to contradict them. Suffice it to say that the evidence upon the material points in issue is somewhat conflicting and contradictory.

It was shown that some of the lumber used in the scaffold had knots in it. J. W. Detter was asked to what extent a board is weakened by a knot. The question was objected to by defendant. The objection was overruled, and exception made. His answer was: "Well, in my experience, a knot is equal to nothing. A knot might just as well be out, as far as strength is concerned. It don't amount to anything. That is my experience in carpenter work." He further said that "a knot weakens the board as much as a hole the same size." He had been carpentering for 30 years, and was the person in charge of putting up the scaffold. We see no reason why his evidence should have been rejected. G. V. Hughes, a carpenter, who had worked at his trade for 20 years, and who assisted in constructing the scaffold, was also a witness for plaintiff. The following questions propounded to him, and the answers thereto, were permitted, over the objections of defendant: "Ques. Now, state what you know as to the character of the timber in those lookouts, and as to their fitness for the use that was made of them? Ans. Well, they were not fit for the use they were made of. * * * Ques. Why? Ans. Because it was not of proper material." The witness had had long experience in working timber and lumber, and also possessed actual knowledge of the material used in the scaffold. His evidence was therefore proper. The court did not err in allowing it to go to the jury. There are several other interrogatories to witnesses, the several answers to which were objected to by defendant, but allowed to go to the jury as evidence. A discussion and decision of them here serialim would involve much time and great labor. We have examined them carefully, and are unable to detect any error of the court in respect thereto prejudicial to defendant.

The court, at the instance of the plaintiff, gave to the jury the following instructions:

"No. 1. The court instructs the jury that the law imposes upon the defendant company the duty of furnishing its employé with reasonably safe and sound material with which the employé may be engaged in and about the doing and performing of his work, and a failure of the defendant company to discharge this duty is, in the law, negligence for which the company is liable. Therefore, in this case, if the jury believe from the evidence that the scaffold upon which the plaintiff's decedent was working, by reason of weakness or defectiveness in the material of which it was constructed, was not sufficiently strong to support itself, together with the weight that the scaffold was sustaining by the work then and there being done by the plaintiff's decedent in the course of his duties, and that by reason of such weakness or defectiveness the said scaffold fell, and thereby injured the plaintiff's decedent and caused his death, then it is the duty of the jury to find for the plaintiff.

"No. 2. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the witness Detter was put in charge of the construction of the scaffold in question, and of the men constructing the same, by the defendant, then his acts in the performance of his duties as a foreman in the construction of said scaffold were the acts of the defendant company, and the defendant is liable for any negligence or want of proper care on his part, or the workmen in his charge, in the selection of the timber or the construction of said scaffold.

"No. 3. The court instructs the jury that if they find for the plaintiff the damages are not limited to the losses sustained at the precise period of Campbell's death, but may include prospective losses, provided they are such as the jury believes from the evidence will result to his distributees as the proximate damages arising from the wrongful death; and the jury may take into consideration, in estimating the pecuniary injury, the nurture, instruction, physical, moral, and intellectual training which the children would have received from their father, and, as a whole, assess such damages as, in the opinion of the jury, will be fair and just, not exceeding in amount $10,000."

To which instructions, and each of them, defendant excepted.

The action of the court in refusing to give the following instructions was also excepted to by defendant:

"No. 5. If the jury believe from the evidence in the case that the Riverside Ironworks, by its officers and agents, was guilty of negligence in the construction of the scaffold, which negligence of construction caused the injuries to the plaintiff's intestate, nevertheless the jury are instructed that they must find for the defendant if they further believe that the injuries received by the plaintiff's intestate would not have produced death, had it not been for the low order of vitality of the plaintiff's intestate, produced by long and continuous drinking of alcoholic and malt drinks by the plaintiff's said intestate.

"No. 6. If the jury believe from the evidence in the case that the injuries to the plaintiff's intestate would not have caused death had not the plaintiff's intestate been of low order of vitality, occasioned by the drinking of alcoholic and malt drinks, then the jury are instructed that they must find for the defendant.

"No. 7. If the jury believe from the evidence that one end of one of the lookouts which supported the platform and which gave way was so far detached from the upright to which it had been nailed as to have been discoverable upon inspection or examination by the plaintiff's intestate when upon the scaffold, had he looked or used his eyes, then the jury are instructed that they must find for the defendant.

"No. 8. If the jury believe from the evidence that from some cause one end of one of the lookouts which supported the platform which gave way was detached, in whole or in part, from the upright to which it was nailed, in some manner, and that the defendant was not aware that the said lookout had been so detached as aforesaid, then the jury must find for the defendant.

"No. 9. If the jury believe from the evidence that defective materials were used in the construction of the scaffold, yet they are instructed that they cannot find a verdict against the defendant unless they further believe that the use of such defective materials was the cause of the injury to the plaintiff's intestate.

"No. 10. If the jury believe that the same injury would have resulted to the plaintiff's intestate even if the best of material had been used, then they must find for the defendant.

"No. 11. The jury are further instructed that they must find for the defendant if they believe the injuries to the said John W. Campbell arose from the negligence of a fellow servant or workman, either in the selection of the material from which the scaffold was constructed, or in the unworkmanlike manner in which it was built."

The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $3,500, and also returned with their verdict four several questions in writing, which had been submitted to them by the court, on motion of defendant, with the several answers thereto, which are in the words and figures following:

"Q. 1. Was not the injury to John W. Campbell, in the opinion of the jury, caused by one end of one of the lookouts supporting the third or lowest platform becoming detached at one end from one of the uprights? A. Yes.

"Q. 2. What caused the lookout supporting the platform from which John W. Campbell fell to give way? A. Faulty construction and insufficient bracing.

"Q. 3. Was it not the case that the dropping of boards by John W. Campbell or his fellow workman, Harry Barkhurst, in tearing down the platforms above, by one or more of the boards composing the platforms falling upon the lookout which gave way, the cause its becoming detached? A. No.

"Q. 4. If the lookout that gave way, and which supported the platform which gave way, was unsafe either before or after John W. Campbell and Harry Barkhurst went on the scaffold to tear it down, did not John W. Campbell have better or at least equal means of ascertaining the unsafe condition of the lookout than the defendant? A. No."

A motion of defendant to have the verdict set aside, and a new trial of the action granted to it, was overruled by the court. Judgment was then rendered on the verdict. All of the rulings and other proceedings in the case with the evidence heard upon the trial thereof are saved and certified in a bill of exceptions, which is made part of the record. The questions arising on the instructions will be first determined.

It is a well-established general proposition that under the common law in America a master is liable to his servant for any neglect of the master's duty, whether committed by the master himself, or by one to whom he has delegated his authority. Madden's Adm'r v. C. & O. R. Co., 28 W. Va. 610, 57 Am. Rep. 695; Ray on Neg. Imp. Duties, 35

The test of liability is the negligence of the master, not the danger of the employment, though the danger of the employment may determine the ordinary care required in the case. Stewart v. O. R. Co., 40 W. Va. 188, 20 S. E. 922. Buswell on Pers. Inj. 391, 392, says: "So if the material used in erecting scaffolding is bad, and the master knew it, but directed the material to be used, he is liable to his workmen who, being themselves in the exercise of due care, are thereby injured. But if the workman ought to have detected the defect, or if this was due to his own fault, or, it is said, that of his fellow workmen, the master is not responsible. But the duty of the master in this respect is not to be avoided by delegating it to another, whether to a fellow servant of injured employé or to a contractor, if the means of doing the work are furnished by the owner and are defective. For the master, when acting through an agent, undertakes that his agent shall be a suitable person for the position he holds, and is responsible for his negligence." Buswell on Pers. Inj. § 193; Corcoran v. Holbrook, 59 N. Y. 517, 17 Am. Rep. 369; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 55 Ill. 492, 8 Am. Rep. 661; Northern Pac. R. R. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 650, 6 Sup. Ct. 590, 29 L. Ed. 755; Behm v. Armour et al., 58 Wis. 1, 15 N. W. 806. In Roberts v. Smith et al., 2 H. & N. (Eng. R.) 213, it is stated in the syllabus that: "At the trial, it was proved that the defendants had employed a laborer to erect the scaffold. The materials for the scaffold were in bad condition. The laborer broke several of the putlogs in trying them. One of the defendants told him to break no more; that the putlogs would do very well. The laborer used such as he thought sound. One of the putlogs so used having given way, the scaffold fell, and the plaintiff was injured. On this evidence, the judge at the trial directed a nonsuit. Held, on appeal to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that there was evidence to go to the jury of the liability of the defendants." The materials for the scaffold under consideration here were taken from the lumber pile of defendant, near by. The laborers of defendant were directed by defendant's foreman to take the lumber from that pile. Some of it is shown to have been defective and unsound. Some of the lookouts were knotty. Dettler and Hughes took the materials for the scaffold from the lumber pile by order of Grimm, defendant's turn boss. Their attention was called to the defects in the lumber used for the lookouts. The defendant had good material on the ground, but it was not used because Grimm directed the use of the lumber which went into the scaffold. Decedent did not assist in handling the materials for, or aid in, building the scaffold. He is not shown to have had any knowledge of its unsound or unsafe condition. The part which gave way and precipitated him to the ground was a lookout, answering to a joint, which was covered by, and supported one end of, the boards of that platform. While the defendant contends that intestate did not observe, but could have observed, any defects in the materials of the scaffold or in its workmanship, by the exercise of ordinary care, this circumstance, connected with the fall of the scaffold, seems to negative that presumption. We do not think that plaintiff's intestate was bound, under the law, to make an examination of the scaffold before going upon it to work. It is held in Clark v. Liston, 54 Ill. App. 578, cited by plaintiff in error, that: "In the destruction of a building there is no attempt or obligation to make it secure. The work of removal is one in which, in turn, each part of the structure is rendered insecure. This every workman understands, and must be governed accordingly." But the court in that case also says: "Plaintiffs in error were not bound to furnish Liston a safe place in which to work, while they were under an obligation not to send him into a place they knew to be dangerous, and which he could not by the use of ordinary care perceive to be so." The jury, in answer to question No. 4, say that Campbell did not have equal means with defendant for ascertaining the unsafe condition of the lookout which gave way; and, in answer to No. 2, they further say that faulty construction and insufficient bracing caused the lookout supporting the platform from which Campbell fell to give way. The master owes the duty in all cases of disclosing to the servant defects and dangers of which he (the master) ought to have knowledge by the exercise of reasonable attention, care, and diligence, and of which the servant has no knowledge, and would not discover by the exercise of reasonable care. Dresser on Emp. Liability, 464; Hough v. Railway Co., 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. Ed. 612, 53 Am. Rep. 702, 1 Am. St. Rep. 548. Upon the facts as presented, the plaintiff's instructions appear to propound the law correctly. It was not error to give them.

Defendant's rejected instructions Nos. 5 and 6 do not state correct legal principles. They, in effect, say to the jury that if the injuries received by the intestate, together with another antecedent cause, occasioned his death, they must find for the defendant. In Beauchamp's Adm'r v. Saginaw Mining Co., 50 Mich. 163, 15 N. W. 65, 45 Am. Rep. 30, it is held that where, in an action for fatal injury, it becomes a question whether death resulted from the injury, or from some disease with which it had become involved, the party causing the injury cannot escape full liability without showing that death must have resulted if the injury had not been done. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Jones, 83 Ala. 376, 3 South. 902; Cooley on Torts (2d Ed.) 76; Tiffany, Death, etc., § 76. There being no proof upon which said instructions could be based, they were and are irrelevant, and were properly refused.

Nos. 7 and 8 assume that the lookout became detached from the upright, and that the injury was occasioned to intestate thereby. No such assumption by the court would be permissible.

Nos. 9 and 10 are the same, in substance, as instruction No. 3 given at the instance of the defendant, in the words following: "If the jury believe that the same injury would have resulted to the plaintiff's intestate even if the best of material had been used, unless the jury believe the accident resulted from defective workmanship in the manner in which scaffold was put together, then they must find for the defendant." Where an instruction has already been substantially given, the court is not bound to repeat it. Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 8 S. E. 493, 2 L. R. A. 668; Davidson v. P., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 41 W. Va. 407, 23 S. E. 593. Under this rule, the two instructions last mentioned were and are improper.

No. 11 submitted to the jury a question of law relating to fellow servants, and also a question of fact, and was and is therefore erroneous. It is the duty of the court to determine the law, and the province of the jury to find the facts. "All of the adjudications recognize the principle that to the court, in civil cases, belongs the law; to the jury, the facts." 1 Rob. (Old) Practice, 342. So, if a party submit a question involving facts with law, and demand the opinion of the court on both, the motion for such opinion may be overruled. Id. 340. Instruction No. 11 was not erroneously rejected.

Defendant also requested the court to submit the following five several questions to the jury, for answers:

"No. 5. Was not the lookout which gave way and let the platform fall unbroken, and the nails in the end at which it became detached still in it, after it became detached, and after John W. Campbell had fallen?"

"No. 6. Would the wounds, in the opinion of the jury, occasioned by the fall of John W. Campbell, have produced death to a man in good physical condition and state of health previous to that fall?"

"No. 7. Was not John W. Campbell at that time of his fall in a low order of vitality, by reason of his previous drinking of alcoholic and malt drinks?"

"No. 8. Would not the lookout which became detached, if caused by falling boards, as asked in the question just preceding, have been caused, whether the scaffold was constructed of good and proper material, and erected in a workmanlike manner, or the reverse?"

"No. 9. Could the defendant, by any inspection before Harry Barkhurst and John W. Campbell went on the scaffold to tear it down, have detected that the lookout which supported the platform from which John W. Campbell fell, and which gave way, was in any particular unsafe, dangerous, or in any wise detached from the uprights to which it was nailed?"—which questions the court refused to submit, and thereupon the defendant again excepted. In Andrews v. Mundy, 36 W. Va. 22, 14 S. E. 414, it is held that "submitting to the jury particular questions of fact, under our statute, is within the discretion of the trial court, subject to review; but it is not erroneous to refuse to permit such questions to be propounded when they are immaterial or irrelevant, and unless the answers thereto, if contrary to the general verdict, would control the same, and be conclusive of the issue." All of the rejected questions, except possibly No. 8, are obnoxious to the rule above stated. No. 8, in effect, assumes that the lookout became detached by reason of the falling boards. This assumption is a mere inference. Besides, the scope of questions Nos. 2 and 3, already allowed, permitted any answer which might have been given under No. 8. It was not error to refuse all of said rejected interrogatories.

We now come to the most important question in the case: Did the court err in overruling the motion to set aside the verdict and to grant a new trial? That the scaffold fell, and that its fall caused the injuries to the decedent from which he died, is conclusively established. But "the mere fact of injury received by the servant raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the master." Knight v. Cooper, 36 W. Va. 232, 14 S. E. 999. In Johnson v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 36 W. Va. 73, 14 S. E. 432, it is held that: "From the mere fact that injury results to a servant from a latent defect in the machinery or appliances of the business, no presumption of negligence on the master's part is raised. There must be evidence connecting him with the injury. The mere fact that machinery proves defective, and that an injury results therefrom, does not fix the master's liability." There is much evidence that faulty material was used for the lookouts, but it is also shown by a great preponderance of the evidence that the lookouts which were made from faulty material were placed in the uppermost and in the second or middle platforms, and that no defective or faulty material was used for the lookouts of the lower platform, the falling of which caused the injury to decedent. It is also shown that a broken lookout was seen after the fall of the scaffold, but that it had belonged to and supported either the uppermost or the second platform. It is proved that the faulty material used in the scaffold was not used for the lookouts of the lower platform. As above stated, the jury found, and properly so, as we believe, that the injury to Campbell was caused by one of the lookouts which supported the lowest platform becoming detached at one end from the upright to which it had been nailed; and the jury further found that the cause of the detachment, or giving way of that end of the lookout, was due to faulty construction and insufficient bracing. We have evidence that the scaffold was braced one way from the northwest post or upright to a window in the stockhouse, and was also braced from the southwest post into a beam which ran from a shed to the stockhouse. The witness says: "Those braces would have the effect of preventing the scaffold from toppling over. That is all they had to do—keep the scaffold standing. They had nothing to do with the strength of the scaffold—only to hold it up." It also appears that after its completion, and before it was torn down, the scaffold had served its purpose. The bricklayers and their attendants who furnished the brick and other materials for the repair of the stockhouse had worked upon the platforms of the scaffold without any part of it having given way, so far as the evidence discloses. Regarding the lookouts of the third or lowest platform, Mr. Hughes further testified: "I think they were sufficiently strong." One of the witnesses did not think that the scaffold was a good one. He did not consider it a good scaffold. He does not specify any particular part of it wherein the scaffold was faulty in construction. In fact, there is no evidence found by us which specifically points out wherein the construction of the scaffold was unworkmanlike or faulty. Barkhurst says that he and Campbell went upon the first or uppermost platform, and threw off the boards of that floor; and, with a sledge, weighing from 8 to 12 pounds, knocked off the lookouts and braces from the uprights without any particular care, and then went down to the next or second platform and did likewise. Three of the uprights to which the lookouts and braces near the top of the scaffold were fastened were 4x4 inches in size, and the other 4x6 inches: They were about 32 feet in length, and therefore of considerable weight. After the braces and lookouts above were removed, the uprights, not being otherwise held together, would cause great strain or tension on the lowest lookouts. Our observation and experience teach us that the destruction and manner of demolition of the scaffold would necessarily weaken it as the work thereof progressed. "Every person is presumed to know facts of common everyday experience, and the court takes judicial notice of such common knowledge. When, therefore, the risk arises from a condition of things which common experience recognizes as dangerous, the plaintiff is presumed to know and appreciate the danger, and cannot be heard to deny it or offer evidence upon the subject." Dresser, supra, § 95. Speaking of the master's duty, 1 Shear. & Red. on Neg. 816, says: "He is not bound to keep the place of work constantly safe when the servant's work, in its very nature, renders the place for the time unsafe, nor where the very work which the servant is employed to do is to make a dangerous place safe." Clark v. Liston, supra. A workman employed in a quarry, in which, by reason of the constant removal of stone therefrom in the course of its operation by himself and his fellow servants, the conditions and surroundings are constantly changing, assumes the risks of the place becoming unsafe, and cannot recover for an injury due to the falling of a mass of stone loosened by succeeding blasts. Mielke v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 103 Wis. 1, 79 N. W. 22, 74 Am. St. Rep. 834, 54 L. R. A. 139; Peffer v. Cutler, 83 Wis. 281, 53 N. W. 508; Larsson v. McClure, 95 Wis. 533, 70 N. W. 662; Petaja v. Aurora I. M. Co., 106 Mich. 463, 64 N. W. 335, 66 N. W. 951, 32 L. R. A. 435, 58 Am. St. Rep. 505. The dangerous condition of the scaffold was occasioned by the work of its own destruction, which was performed by the decedent and his fellow laborer in a manner that necessarily increased the danger to themselves as the work progressed. The extent of the danger of this work to decedent, the defendant could not possibly foresee, and against which it could not, and was not required to, guard. By acceptance of the employment a servant assumes all risks of injury caused by the dangers incidental to the business. No duty is imposed upon the master to protect the servant against these risks, and he consequently cannot be guilty of negligence. Dresser, supra, § 88. In Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285, 55 Am. Rep. 304, it is held that when a servant enters into the employment of a master he assumes all the ordinary risks incident to the employment, whether the employment is dangerous or otherwise. Reese v. Wheeling & E. C. R. Co., 42 W. Va. 333, 28 S. E. 204. Applying the legal principles above stated to the facts and circumstances of the case, it is plainly evident that the scaffold was rendered weak and dangerous by the work done thereon by decedent and his fellow workman in and about its removal, which they were employed to accomplish, and that decedent must have known the dangers incident to that undertaking, and assumed the risk of such danger.

It is well-settled law that where a case has been fairly submitted to a jury, and a verdict fairly rendered, it ought not to be disturbed by the court unless manifest wrong and injustice has been done, or unless the verdict is plainly not warranted by the evidence or facts proved. Miller v. Ins. Co., 12 W. Va. 116, 29 Am. Rep. 452; Grayson v. Com., 6 Grat. 712. In the case last cited it is held that a new trial will be granted where the verdict is against law, or where it is contrary to the evidence, or where the verdict is without evidence. Mil- ler v. White, 46 W. Va. 67, 33 S. E. 332, 76 Am. St. Rep. 791. We are of opinion that the verdict is plainly contrary to the law and the evidence. Therefore the judgment is reversed and annulled, the verdict set aside, a new trial granted, and the case remanded.

BRANNON, J. (concurring). I concur in the opinion and conclusion reached by Judge MILLER. I wish to add a few words of my own, as a reason weighing much with me in favor of the decision in this case. It is evident that a theory for recovery—indeed, the sole ground for recovery—was that bad material was used in the construction of the scaffold. There is no evidence to sustain the verdict on that basis. The plaintiff's very first instruction, which I think induced the verdict, was that if bad material was used, and because of that the scaffold fell, then the jury must find for the plaintiff. The evidence did not support that theory. No bad wood was used in the platform which fell. This instruction presented, with the sanction of the court, to the consideration of the jury the question whether bad wood was anywhere used in the scaffold, and whether there was ground for recovery on account of that bad material. This would mislead the jury to a false issue, an immaterial issue, under the whole evidence. A verdict on that basis would not stand. Bloyd v. Pollock, 27 W. Va. 75, tells us that, though there is some evidence going to sustain the theory contained in an instruction, yet, if it is not sufficient to sustain a verdict, and it would be the duty of the court to set aside a verdict resting on that theory, it ought not to be given. McDonald v. Cole, 46 W. Va. 133, 32 S. E. 1033; State v. Belknap, 39 W. Va. 427, 19 S. E. 507; State v. Manns, 48 W. Va. 480, 37 S. E. 613; Pasley v. English, 10 Grat. 236. By statute and practice this court has power to set aside a verdict on insufficient evidence. So has a circuit court. Davidson v. Railroad, 41 W. Va. 408, 23 S. E. 593. A court may direct a verdict when the evidence is not enough to sustain a recovery or defense, or may strike out the evidence. Ketterman v. Railroad, 48 W. Va. 606, 613, 37 S. E. 683; Thomason v. Southern, 113 Fed. 80, 51 C. O. A. 67. The judge is responsible for the trial at last, and should not allow investigation or give instruction upon questions not really and practically before the jury under the evidence. Why instruct a jury and tell it to pass on a matter when he would have to set aside the verdict standing on that question? Notwithstanding the ability of the judge presiding at this trial, I am impelled to the opinion that plaintiff's instruction No. 1 was inapt in this case. I do not see why interrogatory 9 asked by defendant was not proper.

KEMBLE'S COMMITTEE v. SMALLWOOD.
KEMBLE'S ADM'R v. SMALLWOOD et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 6, 1904.)

DECREE—REVERSAL—NECESSARY PARTIES.

Syllabus in Reger v. Gall, 54 W. Va. 373, 46 S. E. 147, approved and applied.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Taylor County;
John Homef Holt, Judge.

Bill by Kemble's committee against W. P. Smallwood, and by W. P. Kemble, administrator, against J. H. Smallwood and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

A. W. Burdett, for appellants. C. P. Guard and J. G. Sinclair, for appellees.

MILLER, J. On the 6th day of December, 1898, George F. Powell was appointed committee of William P. Kemble, who had been adjudged a lunatic, and who was the owner in fee of a tract of land situated on the Valley river, in Taylor county, which tract was assessed in the name of A. Payne and William P. Kemble, and was returned delinquent for the nonpayment of taxes for the year 1896 in the name of said Payne and Kemble. Some time in the month of December, 1897, after Kemble had been adjudged a lunatic, this land was sold for taxes by the sheriff of Taylor county, at which sale one J. H. Smallwood became the purchaser, and on December 14, 1898, the clerk of the county court executed a deed for said land to Smallwood. George F. Powell, as the committee of said Kemble, made an effort to redeem said land by tendering to Smallwood the sum of $25 in payment of said taxes and for the redemption of said land, which sum was in excess of the taxes, interest, etc., but the offer was declined. At the October rules, 1899, said Powell filed his bill in the circuit court, setting forth these facts, also tendering said sum in court, and charging therein that he had a right at any time during the disability of Kemble to redeem said land; that the value of the land consists in its timber; that Smallwood is insolvent, and has threatened and commenced to cut said timber; that said tax title or deed constitutes a cloud upon the title of his ward; and alleging that he is without complete and adequate remedy; praying for an injunction to restrain said Smallwood from cutting or removing any of said timber; that said tax deed might be canceled; and for general relief. The bill was demurred to by Smallwood, and the demurrer was sustained, and said Powell, as such committee, obtained an appeal.

The question presented upon that appeal was whether the committee of an insane person, during the period of his insanity, could redeem the land of such lunatic which had been sold for taxes delinquent thereon. This court reversed the decree of the circuit court, which, in effect, denied that right, and remanded the cause. In its opinion the court said: "And in view of the facts presented by the record in this case, George Powell, the committee of William P. Kemble, an insane person, had the right to redeem the lands of said insane person during his disability, upon compliance with the requirements of the statute providing for the redemption of lands which have been sold for taxes." Powell v. Smallwood, 48 W. Va. 298, 37 S. E. 551.

On the 28th day of December, 1899, Kemble, having been restored to sanity, was discharged from custody in the Hospital for the Insane at Weston, where he had been confined, and was given a certificate thereof by the examining board, in accordance with Code 1899, c. 58, § 25. On the 12th day of January, 1900, he, through his attorney, A. W. Burdett, tendered to Smallwood $30, for the purpose of redeeming the land, which sum Smallwood refused to accept. About the 1st of March, 1900, Kemble died testate, and his last will and testament was, on the 6th day of the same month, duly probated and admitted to record in the office of the clerk of the county court of Taylor county. In and by his will he devised and bequeathed all of his property, both real and personal, to Virginia Linch and Francis Marion Kemble, his sister and brother, respectively, to belong to them in common, during the lifetime of Virginia, but, at her death, to go to Francis Marion, to be disposed of by him as he might desire. Francis Marion Kemble was named in the will as executor thereof, and at the time of its probate qualified as such, and assumed his duties thereunder. At the December rules, 1900, said Francis Marion Kemble, as executor and devisee, and Virginia Linch, as devisee, filed their bill against Smallwood in the circuit court of the county aforesaid, in which they allege the insanity of their testator; his commitment to the hospital for the insane; his restoration to sanity, and discharge from the hospital; his ownership in fee of the land; its assessment with taxes in the name of A. Payne and W. A. Kemble for the year 1896; its delinquency and sale to Smallwood in December, 1897, for the nonpayment of said taxes; and the execution of a deed by the clerk of the county court to Smallwood therefor. They further allege various irregularities and defects in said sale and deed, and charge that the deed is void. They set out specifically the several items and sums legally requisite to redeem the land from Smallwood, which sums, as stated, amounted to only $24.95 at the time the tender of $30 was made by testator's attorney as aforesaid. They also aver and show that as heirs and devisees of William P. Kemble, deceased, they, within one year next after his restoration to sanity as aforesaid, also tendered to Smallwood $30 for the purpose of redeeming the land, which sum was largely in excess of the amount then legally due to him, but which Smallwood also refused to accept; and that he has refused and still refuses to accept any amount from either William P. Kemble in his lifetime, or from plaintiffs since his death, for the redemption of said real estate. The bill prays for an injunction against Smallwood; that an account be taken to ascertain the amount, if anything, which plaintiffs may be required to pay to defendant to redeem the land; that the $30 tendered by them with their bill be held by the court until such amount may be properly ascertained as aforesaid; that said real estate be conveyed to them as devisees under the will; and for general relief.

Francis Marion Kemble having departed this life, one L. Dudley was, on the 17th day of November, 1900, appointed and qualified as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of said William P. Kemble, deceased; and at the January term, 1901, of the court, the cause was revived, and ordered to be prosecuted to final decree in the name of Dudley, administrator as aforesaid. At the September term, 1901, an order was made and entered by the court which recites that "these two causes came on this day to be further heard upon process duly executed on the defendant; cause regularly matured; bill and exhibits filed; decree nisi; and bill taken for confessed as to first-styled cause, former orders and decrees in the second," etc. There is no caption or other mark of identification directly connecting this order with the above-styled causes, or either of them, but upon examination of the whole record, we are satisfied that it refers to the causes of Powell, Com., v. Smallwood, supra, and the suit now under consideration.

Smallwood answered the bill filed in the second suit, and in his answer denies that William P. Kemble, at the time of his commitment to the hospital, was the owner in fee of the tract of land in the bill described, and avers that Kemble was only joint owner thereof with one Amos Payne; denies that Kemble was restored to sanity or finally discharged from the hospital, and calls for full proof thereof; denies that there are any irregularities in the proceedings of the sheriff, relating to, or connected with, the sale of the land to respondent, which will vitiate the deed therefor to him; denies that Kemble, the decedent, his attorney, committee, or the alleged devisees, ever tendered to respondent "a sum sufficient to entitle them in law to a redemption of the land before the institution of the suit or since, but, on the contrary, avers that the sums necessarily expended by him on account of said land amounted to thirty dollars, including the interest thereon alone, without taking into consideration the improvements." He avers that he had improved the land "prior to said pretended tenders to the value of at least fifty dollars"; but he does not deny that he had refused and still refused to accept any amount from either William P. Kemble or the plaintiffs for the redemption of said real estate. No replication to this answer was filed. At the January term, 1902, another decree was made and entered, in which it is stated that "these causes came on this day to be heard together, the first named upon the papers heretofore read, former orders herein, upon process duly executed upon defendant's bill filed and exhibits therewith, the demurrer of defendant thereto sustained, in which demurrer plaintiff joined, and upon the mandate and order of the Supreme Court of Appeals entered at a special term of said court on the 24th day of November, 1900; and the last-named cause upon process duly executed upon the defendant, cause regularly matured at rules, bill filed and exhibits, demurrer of defendant thereto overruled, the answer of defendant thereto filed, the depositions on behalf of plaintiff filed and read, both causes set for hearing together, and was argued by counsel. Upon consideration whereof the court is of opinion that these causes are for the defendant, and that the plaintiffs should therefore take nothing by their said suits. And it is accordingly adjudged, ordered, and decreed that these causes be dismissed; and it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the plaintiffs in said causes do pay to the defendant his costs about his defense to said suits in this behalf expended." From that decree this appeal was allowed.

The bill in the first-mentioned cause was by this court held to be sufficient, and that it presented such facts as entitled Powell, as committee, to redeem the land in controversy during the disability of Kemble, "upon compliance with the requirements of the statute." Powell, in his bill, alleges a tender of $25 to defendant, in payment of the taxes, which sum he charges to have been in excess of the taxes, interest, etc., then due. This allegation is not denied by an answer, but, as shown by the record, is taken to be true. The answer of defendant to the second bill, in effect, admits the tenders as alleged, and does not deny the material allegation that respondent had refused, and still refuses, to accept any sum in redemption of the land. These allegations, not denied, must also be taken as true.

Before the final decree was made in the causes as aforesaid it was brought to the attention of the court by the record that after the institution of the first suit by Powell, as committee, Kemble had been restored to sanity, had afterwards died testate, leaving devisees of the land in controversy, and that one of those devisees was then dead. In whom his interest in the land vested the court is not informed. In Straight v. Ice (decided at the present term) 48 S. E. 837, the court, in construing section 4 of chapter 127 of the Code of 1890, says: "Under this [section], if a lunatic should become sane, whereby the powers of his committee would cease, a revival could be had for or against the former lunatic." Therefore the first suit could have been revived in the name of Kemble after his restoration to sanity. After his death, and before final decree, it should have been revived in the name of the devisee then living, and also in the names of the heirs or devisees, according to the facts, of the deceased devisee. In the second suit the death of Francis Marion Kemble is suggested. Whether he died testate or intestate does not appear. No revival of that cause was had, except in the name of L. Dudley, administrator de bonis non, as above stated. Why this was done we cannot understand. In Reger v. Gall, 54 W. Va. 373, 46 S. E. 147, it is held that "if in any way it be shown by the record that the final decree was rendered in the absence of necessary parties such decree will be reversed, and the cause remanded in order that proper parties may be made." Gallatin L. Co. v. Davis et al., 44 W. Va. 109, 28 S. E. 747.

The final decree made in these suits, in their then plight, was and is plainly erroneous. The decree must therefore be reversed, and the causes remanded for such other and further proceedings to be had therein as are and may be essential to a proper adjudication thereof.

BAKER v. TAPPAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 29, 1904.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—SETTLEMENT.

1. If, pending an appeal, the parties, by consent and agreement, cause such further proceedings to be had in the court below as dispose of the whole subject-matter of the controversy, this court is thereby deprived of its jurisdiction, and the appeal will be dismissed, without costs.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County; L. N. Tavenner, Judge.

Suit by S. B. Baker against D. R. Tappan and others. From the decree for plaintiff, F. P. Moats, trustee, appeals. Dismissed.

V. B. Archer and William Beard, for appellant. McCluer & McCluer, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, P. By a decree entered by consent of all the parties, and carried into full and complete execution since the appeal in this case was allowed settling all the rights of the parties respecting the subject-matter of their controversy, this court has been deprived of its jurisdiction, and the appeal must be dismissed, without costs.

S. B. Baker and D. R. Tappan were equal partners in the hotel business, but a third party held a lien by deed of trust on Tappan's interest for purchase money. Owing to complications and adversities in the course of the business, Baker caused a receiver to be appointed, who took charge of the business, and was managing it, when the trust creditor caused Tappan's interest to be advertised for sale. Thereupon, on petition of the receiver, the court enjoined the sale, and upon errors assigned against the action of the court in refusing to dissolve the injunction an appeal was allowed. Soon afterwards a decree directing a sale of the property, consented to by the creditor, was entered, a sale was made under it, and the sale confirmed. Thus the subject-matter of the litigation has been withdrawn and disposed of by act of the parties. No matter what this court might do, there is no sale to be made or prevented now, and a reversal of the order appealed from would be without the slightest effect. The case therefore is ruled by principles announced in Elbon v. Hamrick, 55 W. Va. —, 46 S. E. 1029; State v. Lambert, 52 W. Va. 248, 43 S. E. 176; Taylor v. Maynor, 40 W. Va. 588, 33 S. E. 260; and Hamilton v. Ammons (decided at the present term) 49 S. E. 128. In these cases the subject is fully discussed, and many authorities cited.

For the reason stated, the appeal will be dismissed, without costs.

SHOWALTER et al. v. LOWNDES et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 13, 1904.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—PROPERTY SUBJECT—LEASEHOLD ESTATE SUBJECT THERETO.

1. A leasehold estate, being an interest in land, is subject to a lien under section 3, c. 75, Code 1899, in so far as any structure is erected thereon by the lessee which enhances the value or otherwise benefits such estate.

2. An oil-well derrick erected for the purposes of such lease is such structure.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Bill by C. L. Showalter and others against Richard L. Lowndes and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Haymond Maxwell, for appellants. R. S. Douglass and L. C. Criles, for appellees.

DENT, J. An appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Harrison county by C. L. Showalter and others, appellants, against Richard T. Lowndes and William E. McBride, appellees. Appellants filed their bill claiming a mechanic's lien on an oil-well derrick and leasehold estate belonging to appellee Lowndes, for lumber furnished appellee McBride, and used in the construction of such derrick, amounting to the sum of $173.70. Lowndes demurred to the will. The circuit court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the bill.

The sole question presented is as to whether an oil-well derrick attached to a leasehold estate is subject to a mechanic's lien by those furnishing the lumber to build the same. The circuit court answered this question in the negative. A careful examination of the law and decisions shows considerable confusion on the subject, but the decided preponderance of authority tends to sustain the contention of the appellants. It is claimed that an oil-well derrick is personal property liable to be levied on and sold under execution, and that mechanics' liens do not attach to personal property. Church v. Griffith, 9 Pa. 117, 49 Am. Dec. 548; Phillips on Mechanics' Liens, § 171, p. 302. Such conclusions were arrived at under statutes not subjecting leasehold estates to such liens. The almost universal rule now is that leasehold estates may be subjected to mechanics' liens, for the reason that they are interests in land, although they are personal property, and may be levied on and sold under execution. Section 17, c. 13, cl. 13, Code 1899; Donahue, Petroleum and Gas, 114; 20 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 301, 303, note 4. This is the gist of the whole question, and is in effect that, if a leasehold estate is subject to a mechanic's lien, then any structure that becomes a part of such estate or interest in land is likewise subject to such lien, although it may be treated for other purposes as personal property. Loonle v. Hogan (N. Y.) 61 Am. Dec. 697, note; Lyon v. McGuffey (Pa.) 45 Am. Dec. 678, note. The wording of section 3, c. 75, Code 1899, so far as involved in this decision, is as follows: "Every material man * * * furnishing any material * * * for the construction of any house or other structure * * * shall have a lien to secure the payment of the value of * * * the material * * * upon such house or other structure, and upon the interest of the owner in the lot of land on which the same may stand." From an examination of the foregoing authorities, it is perfectly plain that the word "interest" covers all leasehold estates, although chattels, real or personal property; and the word "structure" includes any structure that enters into, benefits, and enhances the value of the particular interest to which it is attached. 20 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 304. When the plaintiffs' lumber was built into the oil-well derrick, it ceased to be separate personalty, but became a part of the lessee's interest in the land, to the enhancement of its value, and the materialman could no longer seize it as his property and hold it until he was paid therefor, nor could the derrick be levied on and sold separate from the lease without injury to or destroying the value of both. For the purposes of the mechanic's lien law, the lease and any structure erected thereon are regarded as real estate, although, under strict legal classification, united or separate they are personal property. These considerations lead to the conclusion that the circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer to plaintiffs' bill.

The decree is reversed, and the cause remanded.

CHARTIERS OIL CO. v. MOORE'S DEVISEES.

Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

DEFECT OF PARTIES—INTERPLEADER—AFFIDAVIT—PRAYER.

It is made to appear that the rights of those who are necessary parties have been neglected in a cause, who are not made parties to the suit, the decree will be reversed and the case remanded, that such parties may be heard.

A bill of interpleader there must be annexed to the plaintiff's affidavit that there is no controversy between him and any of the parties. All of interpleader should pray that the claimants be compelled to interplead their several claims, so that the court may determine to whom the same debt, duty, or obligation belongs.

as by the Court.)

Filed from Circuit Court, Monongalia County, West Virginia.
John W. Mason, Judge.

By the Chartiers Oil Company against John Moore's devisees. Decree for plaintiff Simon L. Moore and others appeal allowed.

E. Glasscock, for appellants. Cox & Glasscock, for appellee.

HORTER, J. John Moore was the owner of a tract of 312 acres of land in Monongalia County, District, Monongalia county. On the 1st day of December, 1892, he made an oil and gas lease thereon to D. J. Sterling, for 10 years and as much longer as oil should be found in paying quantities. On the 29th day of August, 1893, the said John Moore assigned said lease to the Chartiers Oil Company. On the _____ day of _____, John Moore departed this life, having made a will devising said land to his son, Daniel V. Moore and Abraham Moore, two specific parcels thereof. On August 15, 1900, a suit was brought in the circuit court of Monongalia county by a part of the devisees of John Moore against the other part of such devisees, for partition of the 312 acres. The same was partitioned among them, lot No. 1 being assigned to the son of Linsey C. Moore, lot No. 2 to Amos Moore, lot No. 3 to John I. Moore's heirs, lot No. 4 to Sarah Moore, and lot No. 5 to Prudence Shriver's heirs, all of which lots and parcels were described by plat and record of the commissioners making partition of that portion of 312 acres which was not devised by John Moore specifically to his son, Daniel V. Moore and Abraham Moore, but which he devised to said two sons was in the following language: "I give and bequeath unto my sons, Daniel V. and Abraham Moore, the Alpheus Sine's tract of land, called for 45 acres, and also the land that I bought of Thomas and Clinton Davis." In the partition there was no mention made of the oil and gas lease, which was still in full force. The lessee and his assignee, the Chartiers Oil Company, paid all the rental required by said lease, up to the 21st day of June, 1901, when the said oil company commenced to drill a well, which was completed as a gas well, producing gas in paying quantities, on the 3d day of September, 1901. Said well was located on that part of the 312 acres assigned in the partition to the heirs of Prudence Shriver, who claimed the $200 royalty money which was due to be paid on the completion of the well. The other devisees of said John Moore also claimed that they were entitled to their fair proportion of said royalty money. The Chartiers Oil Company filed its bill in the circuit court of Monongalia county against the devisees of John Moore, to whom were set apart and assigned in the partition lots Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, which bill was in the nature of an interpleader, and brought into court and paid to the clerk thereof the $200 then due under said lease for the year beginning September 8, 1901, taking and filing the receipt of the clerk for the said sum, and praying that the court should decree to whom the plaintiff should pay any after payments of money royalties on account of the gas well or any other well drilled on the 312-acre tract of land, as well as the like disposition of the royalty in oil, if it should be produced, and that the conflicting claims and interests for said royalty oil and money royalties be determined and adjudicated, and plaintiff be permitted to pay the same as the same might or should become due under the provision of said lease; that the said plaintiff might be fully protected in said payment and delivery of royalties; and for general relief. The bill was taken for confessed as to the adult defendants, and the infant defendants, by their guardian ad litem, filed their answer. On the 20th of June, 1902, the cause was heard upon the bill of complaint and exhibits, upon process duly executed upon or accepted for all the adult defendants, and the bill taken for confessed as to them, the answer of the infant defendants by their guardian ad litem, and general replication thereto, when it was adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the clerk pay and apply said $200 as follows: "He shall first pay the costs of this suit, and the residue he shall pay to the heirs of Prudence Shriver, the defendants Presley Shriver, John Shriver, and Rebecca McCord, or their counsel of record;" and further decreed that the said heirs of Prudence Shriver take and receive and hold as their own property all sums required to be paid on account of gas by said lease for the gas from the well now on, or the wells hereafter drilled under said lease on, that part of the said 312-acre tract of land which was assigned to them in said partition, and that they take the royalty in oil under said lease from all wells drilled or hereafter to be drilled on lot No. 5, and that the several owners of the four other several lots do receive, take, and hold, as their own property, all moneys to be paid on account of gas, and the royalty in oil to be delivered from all wells under said lease thereafter drilled on their respective lots of said 312-acre tract of land, and that Daniel V. Moore and Abraham Moore do receive, take, and hold as their own property or moneys, to be paid on account of gas and the oil royalties to be delivered from all wells under said lease thereafter drilled on the part of the 312 acres described as the Alpheus Sine's tract of land, calling for 45 acres, and also the land bought by John Moore from Clinton Martin and Thomas Martin, which land was devised to them by the last will and testament of John Moore. From this decree the devisees of John Moore, except the heirs of Prudence Shriver and Abraham Moore, appealed to this court, and assigned as error that the bill filed in the cause, being a bill of interpleader, has not annexed thereto an affidavit that there is no collusion between plaintiff and any of the parties to this cause, as is required to be done under the laws of this state; (2) because the court erred in decreeing that the heirs of Prudence Shriver should take, receive, and hold as their own property all sums to be paid on account of gas by the lease executed by John Moore in his lifetime, and from the wells thereafter to be drilled under said lease on that part of the 312 acres designated as lot No. 5, as well as the royalty on oil to be produced from said lot, and in not decreeing that the gas and oil lease having been made in the lifetime of John Moore, reserving the money royalty, if gas should be found and marketed, and the oil royalty, which being a sale of the oil and gas, the royalties reserved in money and in kind were purchase money, and especially was the money royalty reserved on account of gas purchase money, and being reserved by the lessor in his lifetime upon the sale of the oil and gas, the same then being real estate; that the purchase money should pass to the representative of John Moore, deceased, and be divided among his heirs and devisees as personal property; and because the decree adjudicated the rights and interests of Daniel V. Moore and Abraham Moore, two of the legatees and devisees of the said John Moore, in and under said lease, without having made them parties to the suit. In 2 Daniel's Ch. Pl. & Pr. 1562, it is said: "As to the sole ground on which the jurisdiction of the court in this case is supported is the danger of injury to the plaintiff from the doubtful title of the defendants, the court will not permit the proceeding to be used collusively to give advantage to either party. Therefore, with a bill of interpleader the plaintiff must file an affidavit that there is no collusion between him and any of the parties. The bill is demurrable, if the affidavit is not annexed, or, at least, filed with it. The affidavit may be sworn before the bill is actually filed. Where there are several plaintiffs they must all join in the affidavit, or the affidavit must show satisfactorily why the other plaintiffs do not join;" and cases there cited. Also in Story's Equity Pl. (10th Ed.) § 291: "As every such bill is founded upon the admitted want of interest in the plaintiff, and is at the same time susceptible of being used collusively to give an undue advantage to one of the contending parties, two things are required as precautions to prevent any abuse of the proceeding. In the first place, the plaintiff must annex an affidavit that there is no collusion between him and any of the parties; in the next place, if there is any money due he must bring it into court, or at least offer to do so by his bill. If he does not do so, it is in strictness a good ground of demurrer." In Dickeschied v. Bank, 28 W. Va. 340, at page 345, speaking of bills in interpleader, the court says: "The prayer of the bill of interpleader should also be correctly framed by praying that the defendants may set forth their titles and may interplead and settle and adjust their demands between themselves. * * * To such bills an affidavit is always required of the plaintiff that he does not collude with either of the defendants." In case at bar there is neither affidavit annexed to the bill nor filed with it, which affidavit is held to be essential. It does not appear from the record that Daniel V. Moore and Abraham Moore were made parties to the bill, while it appears from the record that they are devisees of parts of the 312 acres, and are necessary parties to the suit. In Gallatin, L. C. & O. Co. v. Davis, 44 W. Va. 109, 28 S. E. 747, Syl., point 3, it is held: "It is immaterial in what manner it is brought to the attention of this court that the decree complained of was rendered in the absence of proper parties, the case will be reversed and remanded in order that proper parties may be made." As to the rights of the defendants, respectively, the court having adjudicated such rights in the absence of necessary parties, the decree must be reversed and the cause remanded for proper parties to be made thereto, and for further proceedings to be had therein.

MANNON v. CAMDEN INTERSTATE RY.
CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 20, 1904.)

CARRIERS — INJURY TO PASSENGERS — STREET
RAILROADS — TROLLEY WIRES — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE..

1. Street railway companies, for the protection of their passengers, are bound to exercise extraordinary care, and the utmost skill, diligence, and human foresight, in keeping in repair the necessary appliances used by them in the transportation of such passengers, and the slightest negligence on their part renders them liable for all accidents to such passengers occasioned thereby.

The frequent breaking of a trolley wire at a given point is evidence to justify a finding such a company negligent in discharging the duties it owes to the public and passengers.

Whether a passenger acted with ordinary care in leaping from a car in motion, or a rash apprehension of danger which did exist, under circumstances of age, time, experience, and other facts, about which able men might differ as a justification of such conduct, is a question of fact for a jury and not a question of law for the court. Judgment of the circuit court overruling a demurrer to evidence will be affirmed unless it is contrary to the plain preponderance of the evidence, or it is without evidence to support it on some material question at issue. (Habus by the Court.)

Remanded to Circuit Court, Cabell County; E. E. Coblentz, Judge.

Decision by Charles Mannon against the Camden Interstate Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mannon & Thompson, for plaintiff in error; Neal & Null and Campbell, Holt & Dunlap, for defendant in error.

MENT, J. The Camden Interstate Railway Company complains of a judgment rendered in favor of Charles Mannon, rendered by the circuit court of Cabell county on 27th day of March, 1902, for the sum of $2,500, damages occasioned by an accident on the 12th day of September, 1901, Charles Mannon, the plaintiff, an unsophisticated country boy from the state of Ohio, leaped an open car on the defendants' street railway line extending from the city of Huntington to the town of Guyandotte. While the car was running at a rapid rate, the trolley wire, which had been in use since 1900, and which had broken quite a number of times near the same spot, parted, and made considerable noise, causing the wires to rattle, and one of the poles, rotten near the ground, to break off and fall over against the wires. The boy became excited and mixed along with the other passengers, before the car could be stopped, being apprehensive of danger, leaped from the car, broke his leg, and tore the ligaments of his ankle, so that he became permanently disabled for life. The defendant demurred to the evidence, and the jury found a verdict for $2,500. The defendant moved to set it aside as excessive, but the court, having determined the demurrer to the evidence in favor of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff having released $1,000 of the verdict, entered judgment against the defendant for $1,500, following the case of Ohio R. R. Co. v. Blake, 38 W. Va. 718, 18 S. E. 957. It is not competent to say with regard to this matter that $1,500 is not excessive, considering the nature and character of the injury received, and that the plaintiff is maimed and disabled for life. It is doubtful whether $2,500 should be considered an excessive verdict as a matter of compensation in consideration of the character of the injury received by a strong, healthy boy 18 years of age.

There are really only two questions of importance that are presented by the record in this case: First, was the defendant guilty of negligence? Second, was there such apparent danger as justified the plaintiff leaping from the car?

The law on both these questions seems to have been fully considered and settled. They are primarily jury questions, and, if the evidence in relation thereto is sufficient to sustain the verdict of a jury, this court is bound to affirm the judgment overruling the demurrer.

As to the first of these questions, the defendant is in duty bound to the public, from which it enjoys its franchise and fares, to exercise the utmost diligence possible to secure the safe transportation of its passengers, of all ages, character, disposition, and information. To this end it must furnish appliances of the most approved construction, and keep them in perfect repair, so far as human skill and foresight can provide. It must at all times exercise the highest degree of vigilance in superintending the appliances used by it, so that they may be kept in the best possible condition, for it is using the most dangerous of all propelling agents, and to neglect its duties in this respect is to trifle with human life, and render its negligence criminal in its nature. Snyder v. Wheeling Electrical Company, 43 W. Va. 661, 28 S. E. 733, 39 L. R. A. 409, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922; Searl v. Ry. Co., 32 W. Va. 370, 9 S. E. 248; Cooper v. Ry. Co., 24 W. Va. 37. The slightest negligence on the part of the railway company is gross negligence. Railroad Company v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 23 L. Ed. 898; Railroad Company v. Derby, 14 How. 486, 14 L. Ed. 502; The Steamboat New World v. King, 16 How. 469, 14 L. Ed. 1019; R. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. Ed. 627. The cases on this question are generally reviewed in the case of Spellman v. Lincoln Rapid Transit Company, 36 Neb. 890, 55 N. W. 270, 20 L. R. A. 316, 38 Am. St. Rep. 753.

The evidence in the present case from which a jury would have the right to find negligence is the smallness of the wire, its use, wear and tear, and exposure to the elements for 10 years, its frequent breaking near the same place, its patchwork condition and the rotten character of the line poles, all tending to show want of that degree of care that the law requires. The fact that the new patch out of old wire broke tends to show that the wire used was for some reason weaker than the old wire which had been breaking previously.

In the case of Railway Company v. Bowles, 92 Va. 738, 24 S. E. 388, it is said: "Electricity is an agency no less powerful and dangerous than steam, and imposes equal obligations upon those who use it. The trolley wire is a contrivance essential to the use of electricity in the mode adopted by the defendant company, and the frequently recurring accidents which happened to the particular wire which is the subject of investigation in this controversy were quite sufficient to warn the defendant of its unsafe condition."

On the question of negligence the evidence is more than abundant to sustain the verdict of a jury according to the law as settled beyond dispute or doubt.

Nor is the law less settled on the question of apparent danger. It is not necessary that the danger actually exists, but that the plaintiff has been placed by the negligence of the defendant in a position which has to him the appearance of imminent danger threatened, and forces him to momentarily act for the preservation of his safety and life. This is a question for the jury to determine from the negligence of the defendant, the nature of the accident, the age and experience of the plaintiff, and all the surrounding circumstances of time, place, and conduct of others. Whether the passenger exercised ordinary or reasonable care under the circumstances, or acted from a rash appearance of danger which did not exist, is a question of fact, and not of law. 1 Thomp. Neg. §§ 80, 81; Poulsen v. Nassau Electric R. Co., 18 App. Div. 221, 45 N. Y. Supp. 941; Gannon v. N. Y. Ry. Co., 173 Mass. 40, 52 N. E. 1075, 43 L. R. A. 833; 8 Thomp. Neg. § 3558; Choquette v. Southern R. Co., 80 Mo. App. 515.

The plaintiff, by its demurrer to the evidence, having admitted that, if there was evidence to support it, the finding of the jury would have been against it, both as to the question of negligence and the justifiable conduct of the plaintiff under the circumstances, this court cannot do otherwise than affirm the judgment of the circuit court, overruling the demurrer to the evidence.

1. In a suit at law for the possession of personal property purchased under a written contract, where the evidence of the defense shows a mistake on the part of the defendant as to the identity of the property sold, yet the defendant makes no offer to place the plaintiff in statu quo, but relies wholly on the defense of no sale, the court cannot do otherwise than render a judgment in accordance with the plain preponderance of the evidence.

Error to Circuit Court, Wayne County; E. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Action by the Kenova Transfer Company against the Monongahela River Consolidated Coal & Coke Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Campbell, Holt & Duncan, for plaintiff in error. W. W. Marcum and Simms & Enslow, for defendant in error.

DENT, J. Writ of error of the Monongahela River Consolidated Coal & Coke Company, defendant, to the judgment of the circuit court of Wayne county in favor of the Kenova Transfer Company, plaintiff, for the possession of a white pine barge or fuel flat, or, in lieu thereof, the sum of $1,000.

The facts are as follows, to wit:

On the 18th day of January, 1902, the agent of the plaintiff, F. R. Peck, entered into the following contract with S. D. Swaney, agent of the defendant:

"Kenova, W. Va., January 18th, 1902. The Monongahela River Cons. C. & C. Co. hereby sell to the Kenova Transfer Co., of Kenova, W. Va., two wrecks of coal boats, together with their contents, and all the coal that may have come out of said wrecks, lying on the bed of the river within a radius of 200 feet from each piece, located about 500 to 700 feet below the Kenova bridge, near the West Virginia shore.

"Also all pieces of wrecks not mentioned above lying in the Ohio river, from a point 100 feet below the Kenova bridge to Virginia Point. All as lost by the steamer 'Fred Wilson,' Dec. 30th, 1901.

"In consideration of which the said Kenova Transfer Company hereby agrees to pay to the said Monongahela River Consolidated Coal & Coke Company the sum of fifty dollars ($50.00), receipt of which is hereby acknowledged.

"[Signed]

M. R. C. C. & C. Co.,

"Per S. D. Swaney,

"Master Str. Fred Wilson."

Under this contract the plaintiff raised, brought to the shore, and repaired the fuel flat in controversy, claiming the same as covered thereby. The defendant then seized and carried the same away. The plaintiff sued and recovered judgment, and the defendant complains thereof. The question raised depends entirely upon the evidence. The plaintiff proves by a strong preponderance of the testimony that the fuel flat is one of the wrecks named in the contract and purchased by it, and it is almost clear on the defendant's behalf that defendant's agent, when he sold the fuel flat, thought it to be an ordinary coal barge—it then being covered by water—and that he did not intend to sell it, if it were the fuel flat. It is a case of mistaken identity as to the property sold. The mistake, from the evidence, which it is wholly unnecessary to set out in full, was on the part of the defendant; and, had it sought to have had the contract rescinded, and offered to place the plaintiff in statu quo, it might have furnished a good defense to plaintiff's suit. In total disregard of plaintiff's rights, it determined arily settle the controversy by an seizure of the fuel flat. 24 Am. & Law (2d Ed.) 645. NT, J. F. A. Prichard & Co. sued out achment on the 30th day of October, against Samuel Critchlow for the sum 353.26 in the intermediate court of n county, and had the same served ith on the South Penn Oil Company, rnishee. The garnishee filed several rs and amended answers, setting up ct that it was a corporation of the of Pennsylvania; that it was indebted to the defendant in said state of Pennsylva- nia, where said debt was contracted and pay- able, to the amount of $796.71, which it was ready and willing to pay over according to the direction of the court; that W. G. Phil- lips had instituted suit on the 19th day of October in the common pleas court of Greene county against the same defendant for the sum of $673.34, and had an attachment is- sued, and forthwith placed in the hands of the sheriff of said county to be levied; that James Phillips had done likewise for the sum of $292; that on the 20th day of October, 1900, Ingraham had done likewise for the sum of $418.38½; that Charles Ligne had done likewise for the sum of $385; that the Lidecker Tool Company had done likewise for the sum of $624; that on the 2d day of November, 1900, all said last-named attach- ments were served on the garnishee. With its answers the garnishee filed exemplifica- tions of the records of such suits, which clearly show the issuance and service of the attachments as alleged, and also that the garnishee has filed answers to such last- mentioned attachments, setting up the serv- ice and pendency of the writ of attachments in this suit. The intermediate court of Mar- ion county was of the opinion that the plain- tiff's attachment, although issued last, hav- ing been served on the garnishee first, was entitled to priority over the Pennsylvania at- tachments, although they were issued and placed in the hands of the officer first, but were last in service on the garnishee, and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The garnishee appealed to the circuit court, and that court, being of the opinion that as the statute of Pennsylvania fixed the priorities according to the time the attachments were placed in the hands of the officer for serv- ice, and not when served, this gave the Penn- sylvania attachments priority, reversed the judgment and dismissed the plaintiff's at- tachment.

The judgment of the circuit court appears to be premature. By its own ascertainment, the common pleas court of Pennsylvania first had jurisdiction of this controversy, and, being first in time, should have been permit- ted to adjudicate the same, and the circuit court of the state should have awaited such adjudication. If prior jurisdiction were in doubt, as the question involved the con- struction of the Pennsylvania statute on at- tachments, as a matter of comity, and to save confusion in and conflict of decisions to the detriment of litigants, such doubt should be resolved in favor of the Pennsyl- vania tribunal. The court of that state should construe its own statutes, and the courts of this state are bound by such con- struction. Otherwise endless confusion would result. Nimick v. Mingo Ironworks, 25 W. Va. 184. It is true that the courts of Pennsyl- vania have apparently settled the law in ac- cordance with the contention of the gar- nishee, to wit, that the lien of the attachment begins at the time it is placed in the hands of the officer, and not at the time of the service on the garnishee. Underhill v. McManus, 175 Pa. 39; Bank v. Hilgert, 3 Pennypacker, 440. The common pleas court has not yet passed on the attachments involved, so as to bring them within the pale of these decisions, and has rendered no judgment against the garnishee. Hence the garnishee is not in a position to plead such attachments in bar of the plaintiff's attachment, nor should the circuit court dismiss the plaintiff's attachment until such plea is available and is filed, but should stay proceedings on the plaintiff's attachment until the prior attachments are disposed of and ended. 14 Am. & En. En. Law (2d Ed.) 870. The fact that prior garnishment proceedings are pending against the garnishee is not ground for discharging the garnishee in the subsequent proceedings, as he may not eventually be charged in the prior proceedings to the full extent of his indebtedness to the defendant, or in fact may not be charged at all therein. Id.

The circuit court, having reached the conclusion that the common pleas court had prior jurisdiction of the property in controversy, should have left the determination of both the law and facts to that court, and should have continued the plaintiff's attachment to await such determination, as the garnishee showed by its answer that it was endeavoring to have the questions involved decided by that court.

For these reasons, the judgment is reversed and the case remanded.

Action by the state, to the use of the county court of Tyler county, against the Sistersville, Middlebourne & McElroy Turnpike Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

T. P. Jacobs, for plaintiffs in error. O. W. O. Hardman, Pugh & Pugh, and I. M. Underwood, for defendant in error.

DENT, J. The Sistersville, Middlebourne & McElroy Turnpike Company, E. J. Miller, Robert McCormick, G. B. West, G. B. Siemaker, and John H. McCoy claim they are aggrieved by a final judgment of the circuit court of Tyler county in favor of the state of West Virginia, suing for the use and benefit of the county court of said county, for the sum of $10,638.16%, with interest and costs. The suit in which such judgment was rendered was founded on a bond executed by the defendants to the state of West Virginia at the instance of the county court in the penalty of $40,000. The condition of the bond, among other things, was that if the defendant corporation should macadamize that portion of the Sistersville and Salem Turnpike from the corporate limits of Sistersville to the iron bridge near J. C. McCoy's, according to the plan, profile, and specifications now on file in the clerk's office of said court, then the obligation was to be void; otherwise to be in full force. The county had given the company the use of this road, with the right to collect tolls thereon, provided it should improve it as aforesaid, and also turned over to the company $20,000 in bonds of Lincoln district, in said county, for a certificate of stock to this amount. The county claims that the company failed to carry out its contract, and thereupon it brought this suit in the name of the state on the bond, for its use and benefit.

The first claim of the defendants, and seemingly their main reliance, which is raised by demurrer, motion to exclude the evidence and instruct the jury for the defendants, and motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, is that the county court has no such interest as entitles it to maintain the suit. The contract to macadamize this road was made with the county court. The road was under the court's supervision and care for the benefit of the public. It granted the use of the road, with the privilege of collecting tolls thereon, on condition that the roadbed was constructed according to certain plans and specifications. If the company failed to comply with such condition, the county had the right to institute proceedings to forfeit the company's right to such tolls and recover the same. The county court is also the legal representative of the district of Lincoln. Such district can only sue and be sued in the name of the county court, for it is a legal nonentity, having no existence in the light of the law, except by and through the county court. Hence the county court has the right to sue upon this bond for any injury suffered by reason of the breach thereof by such district. Neale v. County Court, 43 W. Va. 90, 27 S. E. 370. As a part of the consideration of the bond in suit, $20,000 in bonds of the district was delivered to the company to enable it to prosecute the building of the road, and on condition that the road should be completed according to the plans and specifications. The failure of the company to perform its contract in whole or in part destroyed the consideration for such bonds in whole or in part, and the county court was entitled to have such bonds returned to it, or to recover the value thereof, at least to the extent the consideration therefor had failed. The money thus recovered would belong to the district, and, according to the vote of the people, should be used in completing the company's contract, or in making the road just as good and valuable as the contract would have made it. But it is said that the district is a stockholder. This is true, but it is a conditional stockholder, subject to the completion of the road according to contract; and as to such condition, and until it is fulfilled, the district is a creditor of the company.

It is said that recovery in this action will reduce the assets of the company, and will diminish the stockholders' dividends. Such is the case with every creditor who is also a stockholder, and because the payment of his debt will diminish his dividends is no legal reason why his debt should not be first satisfied. From all this, it is plain that the county court has two distinct causes of injury for which it could sue. One would be in its own right, strictly, for the forfeiture of the toll franchise or privilege, and the recovery of the tolls, which it might have otherwise received itself, and the other in behalf of the district for the recovery of its bonds, or the value thereof, to the extent the company has failed to comply with its contract. So it seems plain that the county court has the right to maintain this suit in the name of the state, on proper allegations, for either of the purposes aforesaid.

The declaration is demurred to for the reason that the injury to the county court, and of which it complains, is not sufficiently set forth to give the defendants notice thereof. The declaration alleges that the company failed to properly construct the road, and that it "will be of defective service for the people who are compelled to use it," but it fails to allege that the county court has sustained any injury by reason thereof, or that the consideration for the bonds of Lincoln district has thereby failed in whole or part, and the county court is entitled to have the same returned to it or to recover the value thereof. The county court certainly cannot recover unless it shows by proper allegations in what manner it has been injured. Section 2, c. 10, Code 1899. If it sues for injury done to Lincoln district, it should so allege, so that the recovery may be credited to such district, and expended as its voters directed. If it sues for an injury to itself, it should so allege, for the same reason. If the county court had gone on and completed the road according to the plans and specifications, and made good the company's contract, it would be entitled to sue and be reimbursed for its outlay. The declaration fails to show whether the county is endeavoring to recover from the company and its sureties the amount of its default for the benefit of itself, or of the district of Lincoln. If a recovery should be had on behalf of the district, the company would be entitled to have the same expended in the improvement of the road, or to have a proportionate number of the shares of stock held by the county for the benefit of such district returned to it and canceled. The county court cannot both hold the stock and recover the money back, unless it uses the money in completing the company's contract. The defendant is interested to this extent in knowing in whose behalf and for what injury the recovery is demanded. The county court has authority to sue for an injury suffered by Lincoln district, but, in doing so, it should so allege. Its double capacity makes such allegations necessary; otherwise its causes of action would be confounded, and the proof thereof confusing to both court and jury, and the recovery indeterminate as to the proper beneficiary. In short, the omission is so essential that judgment according to the very right of the case cannot be given. Section 29, c. 125, Code 1899.

To whom does the recovery in this case belong—to the county court or to the district of Lincoln? The defendants have the right to know, and the declaration should inform them, for they are interested in the disposition of the proceeds, and the conclusiveness thereof.

The declaration being insufficient, it becomes unnecessary to consider other errors presented, as the judgment must be reversed, the demurrer to the declaration sustained, and the case be remanded, with leave to the plaintiff to amend its declaration if so advised. Reversed.

CLARK et al. v. HENDRICKS CO., Limited, et al.

McNEELEY v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 20, 1904.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—COMMISSIONER'S REPORT.

1. Where a decree is based upon a commissioner's report, in which many complicated accounts are involved, and to which numerous exceptions are filed, pointing out various mistakes in the calculations, which run through the whole statement and report, and affect the result thereof, and the exceptions are overruled and the report confirmed, some of the mistakes being admitted, but others thus pointed out being so connected and intermingled with the whole statement and report that they cannot be segregated and corrected without a restatement of the accounts, which is impracticable here, this court, for the reasons stated, will reverse such decree, and, without passing upon them seriatim, will sustain the exceptions and remand the cause, with instructions to recommit it to a commissioner.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by C. B. Clark and others against the Hendricks Company, Limited, and others, and by W. O. McNeeley against the same defendants. Decrees for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

C. W. Dailey, for appellants. Conley & Smith and W. B. Maxwell, for appellees.

MILLER, J. The Hendricks Company, Limited, was incorporated under the laws of this state on the 21st day of June, 1892, for the purpose of carrying on a wholesale and retail mercantile business. The incorporators were J. E. Poling, J. A. McNeeley, W. O. McNeeley, C. B. Clark, and T. W. Ryan. Its principal office was at Hendricks in Tucker county. The capital stock subscribed was $15,000, in shares of $100 each, par value, but the authorized capital was $50,000. Acts 1893, 207 Corp. The stock was afterwards increased to $20,400. The company did an extensive business, and acquired a large amount of property, both real and personal. It also became indebted to various persons and firms in sums the aggregate of which was not definitely known to the stockholders at the date next below mentioned. By their contract in writing, bearing date on the 18th day of May, 1897, severally signed by them, J. E. Poling, J. A. McNeeley, W. O. McNeeley, C. B. Clark, Alice Clark, and T. W. Ryan, the then stockholders of the company, determined and agreed to discontinue the business of the corporation, as such, from and after that date, wind up its affairs, provide for the payment of its debts and liabilities, and also for a division among its stockholders of its capital and property, after the payment of its debts and liabilities; it being then believed by the stockholders that the solvent claims due to the corporation were much more than sufficient to pay all of its indebtedness. It is, among other things, stipulated in the contract that the following provisions be and were thereby made for the division of the property of the corporation among its stockholders, and also for the payment of its debts and liabilities: First. That J. E. Poling and T. W. Ryan should have and hold as their own from that date, with respective interests therein, as between themselves, to be proportioned according to their respective interests in the corporation, and subject to their assumption and payment of certain enumerated debts of the company, the payment of which was therein mentioned as assumed by them, the entire stock of merchandise, belonging to the corporation, situated and being in the store and ware rooms of said corporation at Hendricks, in the county of Tucker, and at Harman, in the county of Randolph, together with all fixtures belonging thereto, as theretofore listed or inventoried, etc., and also certain claims due to the company, which were thereby transferred to Poling and Ryan, without recourse upon the company, and which claims amounted to the sum of $4,- 504.52. Poling and Ryan were also to have and hold as their own, in the proportion aforesaid, as between themselves, the house and lot in Hendricks, called the John W. W. Moore property, all amounts due from Moore to the company on notes and account, but without recourse, and all bark and pulpwood contracts then held by the company; said Poling and Ryan thereby assuming all liabilities of the corporation in relation to said contracts accruing after 12 o'clock m. on the 18th day of May, 1897. Second. That J. A. McNeeley, W. O. McNeeley, C. B. Clark, and Alice Clark should have and hold as their own from that date all the real estate of said corporation, wherever situated, except the Moore house and lot above mentioned, and all the lumber belonging to said corporation, with respective interests therein in all of said property, as between themselves, to be proportioned according to their respective interests in said corporation. It was further stipulated that the real estate of the corporation should by proper deeds be conveyed to the persons respectively entitled thereto under the agreement whenever the debts of the company should all be settled, and that in the meantime none of said parties shall in any way convey or incur any of said real estate, except expressly subject to the debts of the corporation. In consideration of the premises, Poling and Ryan, in and by the agreement, assumed the payment of certain specified debts of the company, amounting to $15,004.52, and also agreed to secure for the company releases to it from all liability on account of said debts so assumed by them. It was further agreed that Poling and Ryan shall not be required to pay more than $15,004.52 as consideration for that part of the property and rights to be acquired by them under the agreement. The other accounts and claims due the company were placed in the hands of Poling, to be by him collected in the name of the corporation, and the proceeds thereof paid out on its debts and liabilities, other than those assumed by Poling and Ryan as aforesaid. It was further agreed by the parties that if the amount collected on claims owing to the company, exclusive of those transferred to Poling and Ryan, should prove insufficient to satisfy the debts of the corporation, exclusive of those assumed by Poling and Ryan, then the parties to the agreement shall pay the remainder of such debts; each paying such proportion of such unpaid debts as the stock owned by him or her bears to all the capital stock of the company.

At the execution and date of said agreement the stock of the corporation was owned and held as follows:

J. E. Poling, 50 shares.....	$ 5,000
J. A. McNeeley, 50 shares.....	5,000
W. O. McNeeley, 50 shares.....	5,000
C. B. and Alice Clark, 50 shares.....	5,000
T. W. Ryan, 4 shares.....	400
Total, 204 shares.....	$20,400

At the date of the decree appealed from the stock was owned and held as follows:

J. E. Poling, 50 shares.....	$ 5,000
T. W. Ryan, 4 shares.....	400
J. E. Poling & Co., 50 shares.....	5,000
W. O. McNeeley and W. S. Michael, 100 shares	10,000

Total, 204 shares..... $20,400

C. B. Clark and others, the then stockholders of the corporation, except said McNeeleys, filed their bill in the first-mentioned cause against said corporation, J. A. McNeeley, W. O. McNeeley, and also many others who were its creditors; and, in the second-described suit, said W. O. McNeeley filed his bill against the corporation and its stockholders, except the plaintiff, and also against its creditors. The object of the two suits was and is practically the same; that is to say, the bills therein pray that a receiver be appointed to take charge of all of the property of the corporation, both real and personal; that its indebtedness be ascertained and paid; that its business be closed up and the corporation dissolved; that the property taken by the stockholders, respectively, be charged with its proper proportion of the indebtedness; and that the remaining assets be divided among the stockholders in the proportion that each stockholder's stock bears to the stock; and for general relief.

The indebtedness of the corporation appears to have been afterwards paid in part from its assets, and in part by the stockholders. During the progress of the suit, up to that time, two reports had been made by Jeff Lipscomb, a commissioner in chancery, and filed in said cause. But no settlement having been made between the stockholders and the corporation as to their indebtedness to it, or between themselves, under said contract, the court on the 20th day of June, 1901, again referred said causes to Lipscomb, with directions to ascertain and report upon various matters specified in the order of reference of that date, and also any other matter deemed by him pertinent, or, being pertinent, that might be required by any of the parties. Acting under this order, the commissioner made up, and on the 3d day of June, 1902, completed, a statement and report, which consists of 109 pages of the printed record; and, having retained it in his office for 10 days thereafter, he on the 13th day of the same month returned it with all of the evidence taken by him upon the hearing before him to the court. To this report W. O. McNeeley and W. S. Michael made and indorsed thereon 1, and J. E. Poling, J. E. Poling & Co., and T. W. Ryan 27, several exceptions, which were afterwards increased by them to 34. One year after said report had been returned to the court, and exceptions thereto made and indorsed as aforesaid, to wit, on the 13th day of June, 1903, the said commissioner made and returned to the court another statement in writing, signed by him as commissioner, consisting of 14 pages of the printed record, which is styled by him as "The answer of Commissioner Jeff Lipscomb to the exceptions filed to his report by J. E. Poling, J. E. Poling & Co., and T. W. Ryan, in the chancery causes of W. O. McNeeley v. The Hendricks Company, Limited, and others, and C. B. Clark v. Same, filed in the circuit court of Tucker county." The commissioner, in his answer, which is, in substance and effect, a new or additional statement and report, reviews his former report and the several exceptions thereto, and thereby attempts to explain the same and to correct the errors therein. He says: "Relative to exception No. 2, I find that there is an error of $18, which will be hereafter adjudicated." He also says: "Relative to this exception [No. 7], I desire to state that the report does plainly show how the commissioner arrived at his conclusions, and these exceptors do not show what other items should go into the findings of the commissioner in order to make a greater amount than ascertained by him, due J. E. Poling & Co. from the Clark interest; but, in order that the court may not be confused, I will restate the items, going into the second finding and aspect of this case." He then restates matters, making six findings, of $3,000.74, $290.71, $11,432.04, $7,546.98, and $7,042.85, respectively. He further says: "But from an inspection of said accounts, I find an error in both the accounts of W. O. McNeeley and C. B. Clark in the matter of the Rumbarger draft, as follows: W. O. McNeeley is improperly credited with the item of $964.00, that item being the interest of W. O. McNeeley and C. B. Clark in the Rumbarger draft. Said W. O. McNeeley was credited $482, his one-half of the Clark and McNeeley part of said draft. Said W. O. McNeeley is charged with the whole of said draft of $1,049.36 [Rumbarger draft], which is wrong, because he did not get the draft; and, making this correction, said W. O. McNeeley's account should stand credit $6,227.21, instead of $6,142.88." He then, according to this theory of the case, corrects this error by his answer. He again says: "I also find a mistake in the account of W. O. McNeeley, a credit by stock account, $1,000, which should be eliminated from my original finding; and the same, so corrected, would leave the account of W. O. McNeeley stand $5,227.21 instead of $6,227.21. These errors will run through all the settlements." He follows this with a restatement, consisting of four pages, upon that branch of his former report. To this answer or additional report exceptions were also filed, and its consideration objected to by J. E. Poling, J. E. Poling & Co., and T. W. Ryan.

On the 18th day of June, 1903, five days after Commissioner Lipscomb's "answer" was filed, the said two causes came on to be again heard together upon the papers there-tofore read, former orders and decrees therein, and upon the report of Commissioner Jeff Lipscomb, "to which there is one exception by W. O. McNeeley and W. S. Michael, and thirty-four exceptions by J. E. Poling, J. E. Poling & Co., and T. W. Ryan, the answer in writing by said Commissioner Jeff Lipscomb to said exceptions, and exceptions in writing thereto by J. E. Poling & Co. and T. W. Ryan, and were argued by counsel, upon consideration whereof the court doth overrule the exceptions to said answer, and all of said exceptions, except as to the item of the $1,000 in the account of W. O. McNeeley, and also except as to the other errors corrected by said Commissioner Lipscomb in his answer to said exceptions; and, as corrected, the said report is confirmed. * * * It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that J. E. Poling do pay to W. O. McNeeley and W. S. Michael the sum of $6,542.77, with interest thereon from the 12th day of June, 1903; that W. O. McNeeley and W. S. Michael do pay to J. E. Poling, T. W. Ryan, and A. H. Harper, partners under the firm name and style of J. E. Poling & Co., the sum of $2,486.11, with like interest thereon; that T. W. Ryan do pay to W. O. McNeeley and W. S. Michael the sum of $421.65, with like interest thereon; that J. E. Poling do pay to J. E. Poling, T. W. Ryan, and A. H. Harper, partners under the firm name and style of J. E. Poling & Co., the sum of $2,777.80, with like interest thereon; that T. W. Ryan do pay to J. E. Poling, T. W. Ryan, and A. H. Harper, partners under the firm name and style of J. E. Poling & Co., the sum of $310.15, with like interest thereon; and that J. E. Poling do pay to T. W. Ryan the sum of $69.46, with like interest thereon; and the said parties, and each of them, have leave to enforce payment of the amount so decreed to them respectively by execution or other appropriate proceeding, and the rights of the parties among themselves are finally adjudicated and said corporation dissolved by this decree."

From this decree, J. E. Poling, J. E. Poling & Co., and T. W. Ryan appeal, and assign several grounds of error therein. Among other things, they aver that W. O. McNeeley, J. S. McNeeley, and C. B. Clark were each allowed $2,500 against the corporation for services as directors thereof, and that said allowances were directed to be so made after the 18th day of May, 1897; that said alleged error and the $1,000 error which is admitted to be such by the commissioner in his answer enter into all of his calculations and findings relating to the said settlement among the stockholders, and affect the results thereof; that the final decree confirms the report, except so far as changed by the commissioner's answer as aforesaid; and that no finding in the several different statements of the commissioner warrants the decree in favor of McNeeley and Michael against J. E. Poling for $6,542.77. The answer of the commissioner, which was by him deemed necessary to explain the errors in his former report, pointed out by the exceptions thereto, is, if anything, a new or additional report. It was made up and returned to the court, so far as the record discloses, without notice to the parties, or appearance by them. It does not appear to have been required by the court or requested by any of the parties. It was an attempted adjudication of the rights of the parties out of court without notice or appearance. No notice of its completion was given by the commissioner to the attorneys of record in said causes. It was not retained in his office 10 days after its completion for examination by the parties interested (Code 1899, c. 129, § 7), but was returned to the court; and within five days after its date the said causes were heard thereon, with the report which it sought to correct. It, with the erroneous report, thus became the basis of the decree appealed from. The exceptions to this "answer" should have been sustained, the paper stricken from the record, and the cause recommitted. Thompson's Adm'r v. Catlett, 24 W. Va. 524; Lynch v. Henry, 25 W. Va. 416. The answer being improperly in the record, all of the errors which it attempted to correct remain in said report, and the exceptions thereto as aforesaid stand overruled and confirmed by the decree.

The court finds that at the date of the decree the stock of the corporation was held as follows, to wit: By W. O. McNeeley and W. S. Michael, 100 shares; by J. E. Poling, 50 shares; J. E. Poling & Co., 50 shares; and by T. W. Ryan, 4 shares.

In his answer or explanation, the commissioner says:

"J. E. Poling stands credited with fifty shares of stock in the following items in his account, and all the credit he is entitled to under any consideration, to wit:

By D. & P. note taken up by him.....	$ 500
By D. P. note taken up by him.....	500
By D. & P. note taken up by him.....	500
By D. & P. note taken up by him.....	500
By bills payable.....	500
By stock account.....	1,000"

These several items amount to only $3,500—an apparent discrepancy in the statements of $1,500. All of the parties, and also the decree, treat the shares of stock as of the par value of $100 each, and paid up. This statement is variant from others in the record as to the stock then held by Poling, and, if erroneous and carried into the decree, is prejudicial to him.

As to the alleged error on account of the allowance of $2,500 to J. A. McNeeley, W. O. McNeeley, and C. B. Clark, each, as special salaries to them for services as directors of the corporation, we find in the record book of the company the following entries:

"Hendricks, W. Va., March 15, 1893. At a meeting of the stockholders of the Hendricks Co., Ltd., on this day and date with J. A. McNeeley in the chair and upon motion of W. O. McNeeley and seconded by C. B. Clark the following persons were re-elected directors for the ensuing year: W. O. McNeeley, J. A. McNeeley, T. W. Ryan, C. B. Clark, J. E. Poling. And the following yearly salaries were ordered allowed: W. O. McNeeley, $400.00; C. B. Clark, $400.00; J. A. McNeeley, $300.00.

"Hendricks, W. Va., March 25, 1895. At the annual meeting of the board of directors of the Hendricks Co., Ltd., on this day and date with J. A. McNeeley in the chair and upon motion of C. B. Clark and seconded by W. O. McNeeley the following directors were re-elected for the ensuing year, T. W. Ryan, W. O. McNeeley, J. A. McNeeley, J. E. Poling and C. B. Clark. The minutes of the previous meetings having been read and passed upon and adopted and approved on motion of C. B. Clark and seconded by W. O. McNeeley this meeting was adjourned sine die. C. B. Clark, V. P. and Clerk. J. A. McNeeley, Secy. W. O. McNeeley, Prest.

"March 25/'95. On account of the income tax the following extra salaries were approved and directed and ordered credited to this date: T. W. Ryan, $75.00; J. A. McNeeley, $2,500.00; C. B. Clark, $2,500.00; W. O. McNeeley, $2,500.00 and same to be credited to each party named in a separate salary account and to be finally transferred to their respective personal accounts and deducted from stock account earnings."

Code 1899, c. 53, § 53, relating to joint-stock companies, declares that there shall be no compensation for services rendered by the president or any director unless it be allowed by the stockholders. The commissioner, in his answer, referring to the aforesaid allowances, says: "This statement makes the totals, as they appear on page 10 of this report, and includes the special salaries of $2,500 allowed to McNeeleys and Clark, and other additional salary allowed on the minute books, but which had never been carried into the personal accounts of the parties." These specific allowances of $2,500, respectively, to the directors named, seem to be unauthorized by the statute. It will be readily seen that they are far in excess of the amounts to which the parties would have been respectively entitled, if entitled to anything upon that account, under the said resolution of March 15, 1893. The allowances, if erroneous, are prejudicial to the other stockholders. The explanation of the commissioner, given in his answer, if it could even be considered by us, is not clear; but the parties may be able to satisfactorily explain this transaction if given an opportunity to do so. As the decree must be reversed, and the causes remanded for a restatement and report, involving this matter with others, we refrain from expressing an opinion thereon. The foregoing excerpts are taken from the record of the proceedings had before the commissioner to show the confusion, uncertainty, and errors therein. The briefs filed for appellants and appellees admit that there are errors in both the report and decree.

Without restating the accounts between the parties, the labor of which we are not required to perform, and which would be impracticable here, we are unable to determine whether all or only a part of the exceptions to the report be well taken, and also whether they reach all of the errors in the report. We are therefore of opinion that, without passing upon the matters raised by each of said exceptions seriatim, we should reverse the decree, and sustain all of the exceptions to the report of the commissioner, because of its uncertainty and the admitted errors therein. B. & O. R. Co. v. Vanderwerker et al., 44 W. Va. 229, 28 S. E. 829.

The decree appealed from is therefore reversed and set aside; the exceptions to the report of the commissioner, and also to his "answer" to said exceptions, are severally sustained, the said answer stricken from the record, and said causes remanded to the circuit court, with instructions to recommit the same to a commissioner for the ascertainment and report thereon of the following specified matters, and any others which may be pertinent, to wit: First. What property, real or personal, did the Hendricks Company, Limited, own on the 18th day of May, 1897, at the time the said contract took effect, exclusive of the real estate, merchandise, accounts, etc., set apart and transferred by the agreement to Poling, Ryan, J. A. McNeeley, W. O. McNeeley, C. B. Clark, and Alice Clark, or to any or either of them? Second. What claims and demands were due to the corporation on that day, exclusive of those assigned to Poling and Ryan, whether from the directors of the company, or other persons, the several amounts thereof, and what disposition has been made of the same? Third. To whom was the corporation indebted on that day, and in what sums, exclusive of the several debts which were assumed by Poling and Ryan in and by said agreement as aforesaid? Fourth. Have Poling and Ryan paid the indebtedness which they assumed for the corporation, and, if not, how much is yet due thereon? Fifth. What part of the indebtedness of the corporation, exclusive of the debts assumed by Poling and Ryan as aforesaid, has been paid, and by whom, and how paid? Sixth. After applying the assets of the corporation (not including those set apart and transferred to Poling and others as aforesaid) to its indebtedness, existing on the 18th day of May, 1897, what balance remains unpaid? Seventh. Who should pay such balance, and what part thereof should be paid by each person liable therefor under said agreement?

Co., on the 16th day of October, 1900, by the corporate action of its board of directors, duly adopted its line of railroad, of which a preliminary survey had been made through the lands of W., whereby it acquired priority of right to condemn the right of way through the said land of W. Between the 15th day of July, 1902, and the 5th day of August, 1902, the B. & N. R. R. Co. located and staked off its line of railroad through the land of said W., which was duly adopted as and for the location of its line of railroad by the board of directors of said company on the 3d day of September, 1902. W. Va. S. L. R. R. Co. in September, 1902, by its engineer, staked out a line through the land of W., claiming it to be on the said line adopted by it on said 16th day of October, 1900, and commenced condemnation proceedings based upon the survey of September, 1902, which was shown to be at material variance from the said location of October 16, 1900, and in conflict with the adopted location of the B. & N. R. R. Co. Held, the line staked out in September, 1902, for the location of the railroad line of W. Va. S. L. R. R. Co., was a new location not adopted by corporate action of the company, and could not be the basis for condemnation proceedings.

2. Querre: Whether, under the circumstances of this case, the W. Va. S. L. R. R. Co. did not, by its delay of more than two years in prosecuting its condemnation proceedings after it had acquired the right to do so by its action of October 16, 1900, lose its right of priority thereto.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company against the Belington & Northern Railroad Company and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Murphey, A. G. Dayton, and Fred O. Blue, for appellant. Ice & Ice, Reese Blizard, and Samuel V. Woods, for appellees.

McWHORTER, J. This is a "battle royal" between two railroad companies as to the priority of location of right of way over a particular piece of ground. On the 9th day of December, 1902, the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company, having given due notice thereof to J. W. Wheeler, owner of the land purposed to be taken, the Burnsville & Eastern Railroad Company, the Belington & Northern Railroad Company, and the Washington Coal & Coke Company, corporations under the laws of the state of West Virginia, the latter being the owner of the coal under said land, filed its petition in the circuit court of Barbour county, proposing to condemn the strip of land, 100 feet wide, particularly described in the petition and plat filed therewith, marked "Exhibit A," containing 5.17 acres, and paying for the appointment of commissioners for that purpose. The Burnsville & Eastern Railroad Company and Belington & Northern Railroad Company, defendants, appeared to said notice and petition, and moved the court to quash the return of service upon them, of which motion the court took time to consider, and the defendants were given until the 1st day of February, 1903, to file in writing with the clerk of the court such other motion, demurrer, pleas, or answers to said notice and petition as might be good in law. At a regular term on the 20th day of February the Belington & Northern Railroad Company entered its demurrer to the petition, and moved to quash the return of the service of notice upon it, in which demurrer and motion the petitioner joined, and the said demurrer and motion were overruled. The Belington & Northern Railroad Company tendered and offered to file a plea in writing to the petition, to the filing of which the petitioner objected, and moved that the same be rejected; but the court overruled the objection, and permitted the plea to be filed, and the petitioner replied generally thereto. The said special plea is to the effect that the defendant is a corporation duly organized under the laws of West Virginia, with its principal office at Belington; that it was duly authorized to build and construct a railroad through the said county of Barbour from the town of Belington, down the west side of the Tygarts Valley river, to the mouth of the Middle Fork river, and thence to a place at the mouth of the Buckhannon river, and, acting within the powers granted to it by its charter and organization, had located, laid out, and adopted, by surveys, maps, and profiles thereof which had been duly certified and filed in the clerk's office of Barbour county court, and in the office of Secretary of State by resolutions properly adopted by its board of directors on the 3d day of September, 1902, a route for the location and construction of its branch line railway, as it might do under its charter and laws, from the mouth of the Middle Fork river in said county, down the west side of the Tygarts Valley river, to the mouth of the Buckhannon river, and that the route for its said branch line of railroad had been surveyed and located through and over the land of the defendant J. W. Wheeler, which defendant was by proper proceedings seeking to condemn and acquire; and averred that the center line of petitioner's railroad, as described in its petition in this proceeding and plat filed therewith, marked "Exhibit A," extending over and through the land of said Wheeler, did not correspond with the alleged location or either of revised lines of petitioner's said railroad over and through said land, but that the same was a wholly different line and location, and that no map or profile had ever been filed to show what portion of land of said Wheeler petitioner was seeking to condemn to its use, and that said location as described in plaintiff's petition was not surveyed and laid out until the month of September, 1902, and that said line as surveyed conflicts in part with the line surveyed and adopted by defendant over and through the land of Wheeler. And, for further plea, said that the survey and location of defendant's said branch line of railroad over and through the land of said Wheeler was made between the 15th day of July, 1902, and the 5th day of August, 1902, and a map and profile thereof filed in the county clerk's office of Barbour county on the 3d day of September, 1902, and that said survey and location were made prior to the survey made by petitioner of its line of railroad over said land as described in its petition in this proceeding; and averred that the petitioner, the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company, was now owned, controlled, and operated by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, a corporation which owned and operated a railroad extending from Grafton, in Taylor county, up the east side of the Tygarts Valley river to Belington, in Barbour county, and that for said Baltimore & Ohio Railroad to construct and build a road from the mouth of the Buckhannon river up the west side of the Tygarts Valley river to Belington would be to parallel its own line of railroad; and averred that it was not the intention of the said Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company or of petitioner to build and construct a railroad on the pretended location line now claimed by petitioner, but that the only purpose and object of both petitioner and the said Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company was to fraudulently hinder, delay, and prevent defendant from constructing its proposed line of railroad from the mouth of the Middle Fork river to the mouth of the Buckhannon river, in Barbour county; that, in order to carry out this purpose, the agents and employes of the petitioner and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, when defendant was attempting to acquire right of way for the construction of its said railroad over the lands of the defendant J. W. Wheeler and others, went to them and procured from them contracts whereby said landowners agreed not to sell or convey to defendant or to any one else a right of way over their lands, and defendant alleged that said contracts were made for the express purpose of hindering and delaying the construction of its said line of railroad in the manner set forth, and denied the right of petitioner to condemn and acquire a right of way over the land of J. W. Wheeler that would conflict in any manner with the right of way sought to be acquired by defendant over said land, and over which its said line of railroad was located; and averred that the survey and location of defendant's line of railroad over the land of Wheeler was prior to that claimed by the petitioner; wherefore it prayed judgment, etc. And on the said 9th day of December, 1902, the Belington & Northern Railroad Company filed its petition, in the same circuit court, for the condemnation of a line of its railroad through the lands of said J. W. Wheeler, having given due notice thereof to said Wheeler, the Burnsville & Eastern Railroad Company, and the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company, praying for the appointment of commissioners for the purpose of condemning said property. On motion of the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company, it was given leave until the 1st day of February, 1903, in which to interpose and file such motion, demurrer, pleas, and answers to notice and petition as might be good in law. On the 23d day of February said defendant, the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company, tendered its answer in the nature of a plea to plaintiff's petition, to the filing of which plaintiff objected, which objection was overruled and answer filed, and plaintiff replied generally thereto, in which plea it is alleged: (1) That, prior to the institution of this proceeding, this defendant instituted its proceedings to condemn and acquire the same land, in whole or in part, mentioned in the petition, which proceeding was then pending in the same court; (2) averred that it was chartered on the 7th day of February, 1895, by which charter it was authorized to build a public railroad from New Martinsville, by the most practical route, to near Clarksburg, thence to the town of Belington in Barbour county, with its principal office at Clarksburg, and was then operating its road from New Martinsville to Clarksburg, a distance of 60 miles, and proposed to complete the building of said line of railroad, and was then engaged in the actual work of building and constructing its said road from Clarksburg, a distance of 39 miles, as authorized by its charter; that, before it began the building and construction of its said railroad, it caused the line therefor to be located from New Martinsville to Belington, which line was duly and legally adopted by the defendants, and maps and profiles thereof filed for record in the clerks' offices and in the office of Secretary of State as required by law; that said line was so located and legally adopted long before the location of the line of petitioner, the Belington & Northern Railroad Company, and the proper maps and profiles were on record in the proper offices long before the alleged location of the line of the petitioner, the Belington & Northern Railroad Company, and which prior location so adopted by defendant was through the land, among others, of the defendant Wheeler; (3) that the defendant desired and proposed to proceed with the construction of its said railroad through the lands of said Wheeler, and that the land proposed to be taken belonging to Wheeler, when so taken, would be used by it for the purpose of constructing, building, and maintaining its said road, and that said land was necessary for such purpose, and needed for public use, and, when condemned by defendant, would be devoted to such public use; (4) that said land so sought to be condemned by it through the lands of Wheeler was necessary for the proper exercise of its corporate franchise, and that it could not enjoy and exercise its corporate franchise without the same; (5) that, by reason of prior location and adoption of its line, defendant had acquired priority to go through the lands of said Wheeler, and that the petitioner, the Belington & Northern Railroad Company, had not the right to acquire the land mentioned in its petition, in so far as the same would interfere with defendant in acquiring the land mentioned and described in its petition against Wheeler for the said purpose, and prayed that this proceeding might be dismissed, and the defendant recover its costs.

Certain facts were agreed by the parties in writing as to the issuance of the charters of the two railroad companies respectively, and the authority thereby granted to each of them, as to certain surveys, maps, and profiles made and filed by them respectively, and agreed that extracts from the minutes of the stockholders' and directors' meetings offered in evidence should be admitted in lieu of the original minutes of such meetings. Depositions were taken by both companies, and filed in the cases. On the 10th day of November, 1903, the two cases, by consent of the parties, having been submitted to the court, upon the question as to the rights of the respective plaintiff railroad companies to condemn the real estate set forth in their petition, and to determine and ascertain which had the superior right to take and condemn the real estate described in their respective petitions and answers thereto, as was claimed by both to be necessary for the rights of way for their respective railroads, it was ordered by consent that the two cases be heard together, and the testimony and agreement of facts and exhibits should be regarded as filed and made a part of both cases, whether formally filed in both or not, all of which being duly considered, the court was of the opinion and adjudged that the Belington & Northern Railroad Company was entitled to take and condemn the real estate in its petition mentioned and described, as against the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company's petition, and that the case made by the Belington & Northern Railroad Company was one in which the applicant had the lawful right to take the said property, described in its petition and notice, for the purposes and public use set out in its petition, and that said lands so proposed to be taken were necessary for the said purposes; and the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company objected and excepted to the opinion and judgment of the court, and moved the court to set aside said judgment, which motion was overruled, to which action in overruling said motion the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company excepted, and obtained from this court a writ of error and supersedeas, claiming that it was error to hold that the said Belington & Northern Railroad Company, from the pleading and facts in the case, was entitled to the superior right to take and condemn the real estate sought to be condemned by petitioner, and that it was error for the court to fail and refuse to hold that plaintiff in error had the superior right, as against said Belington & Northern Railroad Company, to take and condemn said real estate.

It appears from the record that a preliminary survey was made by the short line railroad company through the land of defendant Wheeler about the last of September or early in October, 1900; that at a meeting of the board of directors of said company held on the 16th of October, 1900, the following action was taken:

"Whereas it appears that on the 15th day of October, 1900, at a meeting of the stockholders of this company, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas it is expedient, for the purpose of avoiding difficult curves and undesirable locations, to change and revise in part the line adopted by this company on the 25th day of August, 1900, extending from Clarksburg to Belington. Be it

"Resolved, that the portion of said line extending from the mouth of the Buckhannon river, in Barbour county, to the town of Belington, in said county, be revised and altered in conformity with the accompanying map and profile, and that the location and route shown upon the map and profile hereto attached, following the course of the Tygarts Valley river, from the mouth of the Buckhannon river to Belington, be adopted as the location and route for the railroad of this company between the points aforesaid. And be it further

"Resolved, that a copy of this resolution be certified by E. M. Goodwin, acting secretary of this corporation, to the Secretary of State, to be by him recorded as provided in section 33 and subsection 5 of section 50 of chapter 54 of the Code of West Virginia; and the chief engineer of this company is likewise instructed to cause to be made a copy of the accompanying map and profile, to be duly recorded in the office of the Secretary of State and in the offices of the clerks of the county courts of Harrison and Barbour counties, as provided by law.'

"Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, that the action of said stockholders in the premises be and they are hereby ratified, approved, and confirmed, and adopted as and for the actions of this board; and the line finally adopted under said resolutions be adopted as the location and route of the road of this company between the points therein named."

This action of the board of directors of the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company, under the rulings of this court in case of C. & O. Ry. Company v. Deepwater Ry. Company (decided at the present term), was a sufficient location of said route, and gave the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company the priority of right to condemn the same on that particular location so adopted for its use as a public railway. Pierce on Railroads, p. 157; Railroad Co. v. Railroad Co., 141 Pa. 407, 21 Atl. 645, 12 L. R. A. 220; Kanawha & R. R. Co. v. Glen Jean & R. R. Co., 45 W. Va. 119, 30 S. E. 86; 2 Lewis on Em. Dom. §§ 306 and 307; 3 Elliott on Railroads, § 927. From that date, the 16th of October, 1900, until the 19th of November, 1902, no steps were taken to exercise its right so acquired by the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company, when it seems to have been quickened into life by the action of the Belington & Northern Railroad Company, which in July, 1902, began to survey a line on the west side of the Tygarts Valley river between the mouth of the Middle Fork river and the Buckhannon river. This line was surveyed and staked out upon the ground from the 18th of July to August 5th by the engineer and his assistants of the Belington & Northern Railroad Company, and a map and profile thereof made, and at a meeting of the board of directors of the Belington & Northern Railroad Company on the 3d day of September, 1902, the same was "ratified and adopted as the final location of said company's branch railroad between said points." Mr. Lemley, the assistant engineer of the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company, says he was instructed to relocate the line of said company from Craigmere to Belington in July, 1902, purchase rights of way, and proceed with the construction as rapidly as possible; that he retraced the location from Tygarts Junction to Belington after the 1st of August, 1902. He says they aimed to follow the original location as close as possible, and made plats through the properties which had been purchased, and which were placed on record with the deeds. He said he did not file in the clerk's office a map or profile of relocation of the said road; that it was not necessary to file a retracing. He was asked if the relocation of that line of road made by him occupied the same ground as the preliminary survey made in 1900. He said they retraced the location made in 1900 as close as it was possible to do from the stakes that remained in the ground from the time that they made the relocation. It is insisted by counsel for the Belington & Northern Railroad Company that the location laid out by the short line railroad company and sought to be condemned, and as described in its petition and the map "Exhibit A," describing the strip to be condemned, is a new location, and not that which was adopted by the resolution of its board on the 16th of October, 1900. If this be true and there is a material departure from that location so adopted in 1900, then the action of the board would be necessary to adopt the new location made by its engineers in 1902. Being a new location and different from that adopted by the board of directors October 16, 1900, the same corporate action is required to adopt it as a final location as was required to adopt the preliminary survey of October, 1900; "the mere fact that an engineer alone surveyed and marked out a line is not sufficient to amount to a valid appropriation of the location by the company, and it cannot afford ground for proceedings against a rival company occupying that line." Wood on Railroads, § 269, and authorities cited. This action was not taken on the part of the board. The engineer, H. S. King, of the Belington & Northern Railroad Company, who made the survey and location adopted by the Belington & Northern Railroad Company, made the survey and staked out the line upon the ground, and testifies that he took some measurements between the two lines made for the short line railroad company in 1900, and that made by the short line railroad company in 1902, which he supposed was made by Mr. Lemley; that station 35 of the 1902 survey was 47 feet above station 37x28 of the old short line; that station 47x75 of 1902 survey by the Baltimore & Ohio is 59 feet above station 47 of the old short line. Station 58 of the 1902 survey by the Baltimore & Ohio was 95 feet above station 59 of the old short line survey. Witness was not sure as to whose land this was on, but thinks it was on Swick's land, just across the property line from Wheeler. Asked why he spoke of it as the "1902 survey by the B. & O.," said: "Because it was made in 1902. I suppose that it was the B. & O. people there at that time, and the line was run by their people;" that it was his understanding that the Baltimore & Ohio engineers ran that line in 1902. The witness was asked to "look at the map filed as 'Exhibit A with Petition,' and also the map filed as 'Profile and Map W. Va. S. L. R. R. No. 4, Oct. 15, 1900, Mouth Buckhannon River to Belington,' and state the relative length of the 8-degree curve as shown on the lines on those two maps, through the lands of J. W. Wheeler." Ans. "One of them is 633.7 feet, one is 570 feet; the difference is 63.7 feet." "The one 'Exhibit A with Petition' is the longer by 63.7 feet." And he further says the two lines on the map "Exhibit A with Petition," and "Exhibit Profile and Map W. V. S. L. R. R. No. 4, Oct. 15, 1900, Mouth Buckhannon River to Belington," cannot be made to coincide on the ground when there is the difference in the length of the 8-degree curves of 63.7 feet as shown on the maps. V. C. Norton, chief engineer of Belington & Northern Railroad Company, testifies the survey adopted by the board of directors of said company September 3, 1902, as the line of their road, was run by H. S. King, engineer, under his direction, and was a location line staked on the ground between July 15, 1902, and August 15, 1902. When questioned as to the map filed as exhibit "Profile and Map

W. Va. S. L. R. R. No. 4, Oct. 15, 1900, Mouth of Buckhannon River Belington," and the map marked "Exhibit A with Petition," and asked to state the difference between the line of railroad as represented on said maps through the land of J. W. Wheeler, he said, if actually run and placed on the ground, they would not occupy the same ground; that "the 8-degree curve on one is 63.7 feet longer than the other," and that "whenever you run a curve on a ground and turn a tangent to said curve, that tangent will have a certain bearing, and, if you run 63.7 feet farther on that curve and turn tangent, you will be going in an entirely different direction, and, in going about 1,100 feet on the tangent shown on the maps, the end of the tangent would be in the neighborhood of 80 feet apart." He testified that he had examined the calls of the line of railroad made for the short line railroad company by Mr. Lemley in 1902, and compared them with the line of railroad represented on Exhibit "Profile and Map W. Va. S. L. R. R. No. 4, Oct. 15, 1900, Mouth of Buckhannon River to Belington," between the mouth of Buckhannon river and the mouth of the Middle Fork river, and states, "There are no two curves or no two tangents of the same length." Mr. Norton corroborates the testimony of Engineer King as to the difference of location in October, 1900, and that in 1902. J. W. Wheeler testified that he saw the line that was run in the fall of 1900. Saw some stakes with figures on them, but did not understand them. Was asked, "About how far from the river was this line, as you observed it, located?" Ans. "Places I should judge to be a hundred feet or over; other places not near so far." He says a line was run through his land about September, 1902. "I do not know whether it was Mr. Lemley or his assistants. We all then understood and called them the B. & O. engineers;" that "just previous to that line being run there were other engineers had cut a line through there. We called them Wabash engineers, and they had run a line through above this old line, as we called it, or the West Virginia Short Line. About the same time the B. & N. engineers was running a line, and met not far from my line above, I think. My information from what we called the Wabash engineers, then some time after, in September, I presume, the B. & O. engineers, according to my information, runs a line over nearly, if not quite, the same ground or line that the Wabash engineers run. I saw the stakes. I mean that the Wabash engineers and B. & O. engineers." He was asked to state "how far, in your opinion, is the line last run by the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company through your land above the first line run by it in 1900." Ans. "Well, in places I would say it was 100 feet, and then there are places—two places that I should say I notice—that is not quite 100 feet. That is just guessing at it; I never measured it."

On cross-examination, he is asked if he made an actual survey, or was his statement based on anything else than his recollection of the first line, and his belief in this variance was from such recollection of it. Ans. "I did not make any survey, but I seen the lines recently, and most of the old lines can be traced to-day."

It is very clear from the evidence that the short line company was resting satisfied with the advantage of priority of right to condemn it had acquired in the location of its line in October, 1900, until the Belington & Northern was proceeding to establish and locate its line above that of the short line, when it immediately took steps to relocate its line through the land of defendant Wheeler. The great preponderance of the evidence is that this location of September, 1902, is from 47 to 100 feet above the location of October, 1900, and is in fact a new location. In its attempt to strain its location of October, 1900, sufficiently to prevent the location of a competing line, it found itself so far above it as to amount to an abandonment of said location, and occupying ground without authority. There is no evidence directly on that point, but it appears from the record almost certainly that the location of the Belington & Northern would interfere but little, if any, with the location of the short line of October, 1900. The relocation by the West Virginia Short Line in 1902, and its proceedings to condemn it as relocated, is an abandonment of its right of priority in the line located by it in October, 1900, if, indeed, it had not already lost its priority of right to condemn by its prolonged inactivity. This question does not arise in this case, as the new location of 1902 of the West Virginia Short Line Railway Company was never adopted by corporate action, and that of the Belington & Northern was duly adopted, giving it the right of priority over the line attempted herein to be condemned by the two companies respectively so far as the lines conflict; but the circumstances of the case strongly suggest the question whether the West Virginia Short Line Railroad Company exercised reasonable diligence in prosecuting its work while holding its right of way, to the exclusion of all others. In this day of the rapid development of the resources of the state of West Virginia, when the policy of the state is to press to the front her commercial and industrial interests in active competition with the progress of her sister states; considering the topography of her territory: that railroads in the mountainous portions of the state can only be constructed along the streams, and on many of which there is room for no more than one line on the same side of the stream—would it not be decidedly against the public interests to permit a railroad company, by taking the initiatory steps or proceedings by adopting a location for its line simply by making a preliminary survey, or even a permanent survey and location of its line, and to stop all proceedings, holding the location to be the exclusion of all others, closing to those who would gladly open up the way the only practical route, thus cutting off all competition, and creating a monopoly, so far as that particular section of the state is concerned? Is it not really an abuse of the right of eminent domain? Do not the public interests demand that a corporation thus invested with the strong arm of the law should use the power conferred with due regard to the rights of the public, and use diligence in prosecuting the work it has been, by its charter, commissioned to perform, and which it has undertaken, presumably for its own profit? In this excellent work, Elliott on Railroads, vol. 2, p. 927, we are told, "When a proposed line has been regularly located and staked off, and the expense thereof has been paid, the corporation by which it is done has a prior claim to the right of way for a reasonable time;" in 2 Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 306, it is said, "A priority once obtained in any of the ways or cases above specified may be lost by neglect in following it up, or by permitting another company to occupy and build over the same property." In the case at bar there was a lapse of more than two years from the date of the adoption of its line by the West Virginia Short Line Company, from the time that it crossed the Buckhannon river to Belington, without taking any steps to procure the right of way either by purchase or condemnation. It was then inspired thereto by the action of a competing railroad company in taking measures to acquire the right of way through the same property. There is no error in the judgment, and it is affirmed.

Va. 553)

STATE v. JACKSON et al.*

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 20, 1904.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—SALE—FORFEITURE TO STATE—EVIDENCE—TAX DEED—REDEMPTION—GRANT BY STATE—SECOND SALE—ESTOPPEL—PAYMENT—PRESUMPTION—TRIAL BY JURY.

A record of a proceeding to sell land as forfeited to the state for nonpayment or non-payment for taxes, which condemns the land to be sold as forfeited, in which it appears that a deed issued from the state to a certain person, that by specific conveyances the land had been transferred to the ownership of another person, is prima facie evidence, against strangers to the state, of the fact of forfeiture, and also that a grant issued to such person, and that title vested in the person in whose name it was condemned as forfeited.

Under section 29, c. 31, Code 1899, a tax deed is conclusive evidence against strangers to the state to show that such title as was sold to the person was vested in the person in whose name it was sold.

In 1884, in a proceeding by a commissioner of school lands to sell forfeited land, a decree was made for the owner to redeem, and declared the land redeemed and released from forfeiture, and ordered that the owner should also occupy the land for a purchaser from the commissioner.

Such owner took not only the title redeemed, but also any other title vested in the state at the time of the redemption.

4. One purchasing land sold as forfeited in a proceeding under chapter 105 of the Code of 1899 holds a grant from the state, within the meaning of section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution, so as to take under that section the benefit of another forfeited title.

5. Section 18, c. 105, Code 1891, giving all the state's title to forfeited land redeemed or purchased, makes a legislative grant from the state, within the meaning of section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution, to enable a person coming within that statute to take forfeited titles under that section of the Constitution.

6. One who seeks to get the benefit of a forfeited title to land, under article 13, § 3, of the Constitution, must prove the payment of taxes as therein required.

7. One asking to make redemption of forfeited land under section 17, Code 1899, c. 105, must prove that at the time when his land became vested in the state he held a good and valid title, legal or equitable, superior to that of any other claimant, whether that claimant be the state, holding a superior title by forfeiture or otherwise, or an individual.

8. When land has been once sold as forfeited under a proceeding under chapter 105 of the Code of 1899 to sell forfeited land, the state cannot, in a later proceeding, under that chapter, again sell the same land as forfeited under another title. The record of the first sale is an estoppel against the state, preventing such second sale.

9. When, in a proceeding to sell land as forfeited, there is a decree of redemption, with a saving clause as to those tracts protected from the effect of redemption by section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution, the person redeeming, when his redemption comes in question, is not called on to prove the location of the tracts so protected before he can avail himself of his redemption.

10. In a proceeding under chapter 105 of the Code of 1899 to sell forfeited land, a decree allowing redemption by payment of taxes is prima facie evidence of redemption as to third parties, and cannot be collaterally attacked for error on account of the sum paid to redeem being less than the amount really due the state.

11. There is no presumption of payment of taxes arising simply from the duty of payment.

12. If a senior title to land is forfeited, and then transferred, by section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution, to the owner of a junior title, and the junior title itself afterwards becomes forfeited, a sale by the state, in proceedings under chapter 105 of the Code to sell the land as forfeited under the senior title, will pass to the purchaser both titles.

13. Forfeited land cannot be redeemed from forfeiture if already the state's title by such forfeiture has been transferred to another title under section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution.

14. The state cannot sell land that is forfeited by a suit under chapter 105 of the Code, if the title has already been transferred to a claimant by operation of section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution.

15. Trial by jury is a matter of right, under Code 1899, c. 105, § 18, in a proceeding by the state to sell forfeited land, when conflicting titles to land are to be tried, if there is a controversy of fact dependent on oral evidence, but not where there is no controversy of fact, or where that controversy depends entirely on documentary evidence.

BRANNON, J. The state of West Virginia filed a bill in chancery in the circuit court of McDowell county in 1899 against Jane Jackson and others, stating that on March 1, 1860, the commonwealth of Virginia issued to Joseph Jackson and John C. Harrison, Jr., a grant for 4,610 acres of land, and that it had been omitted from the land tax books for more than five years since 1869, and that it had thus become forfeited and vested in the state, and prayed that said tract be sold as forfeited land. W. M. Ritter filed a petition asking to be admitted as a party defendant in the case, and he was admitted as such. Ritter's petition set up that the tract of 4,610 acres was not vested in the state, but that he was the owner of it by good and valid title, superior to the claim of the state and every other claimant thereto, and that said land was not subject to sale as forfeited land vested in the state; and the petition resisted such sale at the instance of the state. Ritter's petition states that Virginia, by patent, March 4, 1795, granted to Robert Morris a tract of 320,000 acres, and that a specific portion of it (50,000 acres) had, by conveyances specified in the petition, come to the ownership of Ritter. Ritter's petition further states that while Samuel Cameron was owner of the 50,000 acres, in 1869, it was sold for taxes in his name and purchased by the state, and not redeemed, and that it had ever since, up to the year 1885, been omitted from the taxbooks, but was charged thereon for the year 1885 in the name of Max Landsburg, who had become owner of said 50,000 acres under Cameron. Ritter's petition contested the validity of the sale to the state in 1869 for some defects in the tax-sale proceedings, and avers that its omission from the landbooks after 1869 did not forfeit it for nonentry because of the state's purchase in 1869. His petition stated that Henry C. Auvil, commissioner of school lands, had on the 28th of July, 1882, filed a report and petition in the circuit court of said county to the effect that the Morris tract of 320,000 acres had been forfeited to the state for omission to enter it on the taxbooks from 1866 to 1877, and prayed that the whole tract be sold as forfeited, and vested in the state. Landsburg was a defendant to Auvil's petition, and filed an answer in 1882 asking to be allowed to redeem the tract of 50,000 acres, he claiming the same; and on the 6th of April, 1883, a decree was made adjudicating that the title of Landsburg to the 50,000 acres was superior to that of other claimants, except the junior claimants protected from the effect of redemption by law, and allowing Landsburg to redeem. In this proceeding, upon Auvil's petition, the court directed a large number of junior claimants to be summoned in to show their title, and referred the case to a commissioner to report upon their titles, and to report what taxes they had paid on the land which they claimed. The Jackson-Harrison tract was not mentioned among these tracts claimed by junior claimants, nor was any owner of it made a party. A decree later recited that it was impracticable to pass on the rights of so many claimants, and dismissed them without decision of their rights, but protecting their rights from the effect of the proceeding. On the 9th of July, 1884, a decree was made in the Auvil case which fixed the sum to be paid by Landsburg to redeem the 50,000 acres at $2,200.62, after deducting taxes which had been paid by junior claimants, and the decree declared Landsburg entitled to redeem by the payment of that sum; and it condemned the 50,000 acres as forfeited and liable to sale, and directed its sale, on failure of Landsburg, to pay within a fixed time. On the 8th of October, 1884, a decree was made in the Auvil case stating that Landsburg had paid the money required to effect a redemption, and, with the consent of Auvil, decreeing that, in addition to the privilege to redeem given him by a former decree, Landsburg be "allowed also to occupy the attitude of a purchaser of said 50,000 acres from Auvil, commissioner, for said sum; * * * the court treating said 50,000 acres as the excess of purchase money above taxes, damage, interest, and costs." The decree "ordered that the title of the state to said 50,000 acres (subject to the qualifications hereinafter stated) be, and is hereby, released to the said Landsburg, and the said tract of land is hereby fully exonerated and released from all forfeitures and former taxes whatsoever. But this order shall in no wise affect or impair the rights, titles, and claims of any claimant within the boundary of said 50,000 acres whose titles and claims are protected under the Constitution and laws of this state; but the titles and claims of such claimants shall remain as valid as if this order had not been entered."

Ritter's petition set up the said proceedings in the Auvil case, and relied upon them as an adjudication preventing the state from claiming that the 50,000 acres, which covered the Jackson-Harrison 4,610-acre tract, was forfeited and subject to sale, and relied upon the Auvil proceeding as operating to bar the state from claiming the land in any way. Ritter claimed that the state had no title to the 4,610 acres. Ritter's petition further states that a part of the 50,000 acres had been sold from Landsburg by decree of the Circuit Court of the United States, and conveyed under such sale to Henry McCormick; that all taxes had been paid on the land after the redemption in 1884, except that it was returned delinquent in the name of Landsburg for taxes of 1895, and sold in 1897 for such taxes, and had been conveyed under that tax sale to McCormick. McCormick had conveyed the land to Ritter. Ritter claimed that, when the Jackson-Harrison grant issued for the 4,610 acres, the state of West Virginia could not confer any title by that grant, for the reason that said 4,610 acres was covered by the 50,000 acres, which was part of the old Morris grant, of 1795, of 320,000 acres. Ritter claimed that, though the Jackson-Harrison grant passed no title, yet any title that might be supposed to arise from its forfeiture inured to the benefit of the owners of the 50,000 acres by force of section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution, by reason of the owners of that land having paid taxes for five years after the year 1865, and that thus any shadow of title under the Jackson-Harrison grant was transferred to the owners of the 50,000 acres, and did not belong to the state, to be sold by it. Ritter claimed to own any shadow of title conferred by the Jackson-Harrison grant, and denied the right of the state to sell it. The Jackson-Harrison land was assessed with taxes for 1865 to 1870, inclusive, and was delinquent for the last four of those years. It does not appear that the taxes for 1865 and 1866 were paid. From 1871 to 1879, inclusive, half of the 4,610-acre tract of the Jackson and Harrison 2,305 acres was charged on the taxbooks, and four times sold to the state for some of those years. This half was omitted from the taxbooks from 1880 to 1895, inclusive. It vested in the state four times by purchase for taxes, and later was forfeited for nonentry several times, viewed without regard to Ritter's rights. In November, 1876, it became irredeemable, and vested in the state as tax purchaser; and, if thereafter chargeable with taxes, it vested in the state, for omission from the taxbooks, not later than January 1, 1885. The other half of the 4,610 acres was never on the taxbooks after 1870, and was several times forfeited for omission; the first forfeiture being complete January 1, 1876.

H. A. McCurdy, claiming the Jackson share of the 4,610 acres granted to Jackson and Harrison, filed an answer in the said suit of The State v. Jane Jackson, setting up his claim, admitting the forfeiture of the tract to the state, and asking to be allowed to redeem. W. R. Thompson and T. J. Pritchard, as trustees, claiming the Harrison share of the 4,610 acres, filed their petition in the suit of State v. Jane Jackson, admitting the forfeiture of said tract, and asking to be allowed to redeem. The petition charged that the sale to the state in 1869 of the 50,000 acres had vested it in the state, and alleged that taxes had been paid on the 4,610-acre tract from 1865 to 1879, and that by reason of such payment the state's title to the 50,000 acres had been transferred to the owners of the 4,610 acres by the Constitution (article 13, § 3). Thompson and Pritchard also filed their petition, making practically the same defense as did McCurdy, and claiming that the 50,000 acres was forfeited, and that the forfeited title vested in the owners of the Jackson-Harrison land. Thus the state claimed the 4,610-acre tract by forfeiture, and sought to sell it; and Ritter claimed that the state had once sold this same land to Landsburg under the forfeiture of the Morris title, and that he owned the 4,610 acres because by forfeiture it was vested in the state, and that the title to it had been transferred from the state to the owners of the 50,000 acres; and McCurdy and Thompson and Pritchard claimed the 4,610 acres, and also title to its extent under the Morris grant, because of its forfeiture and inurement or transfer by the Constitution to the owners of the Jackson-Harrison grant. Ritter resisted the redemption of the 4,610 acres. It is a title contest between the state and Ritter, and between the state and McCurdy and Thompson and Pritchard on the other.

The court referred the case to a commissioner to report whether the 4,610 acres was forfeited, and in whose name, and, if forfeited, in whom the title was at the date of the forfeiture, and what person was entitled to redeem, and any other pertinent matter. The commissioner's report found that on the 4th of March, 1795, a grant issued to Morris for 320,000 acres, and that by regular conveyances 50,000 acres of it had been passed to Ritter, and that the 4,610 acres was within the 50,000 acres, and that no evidence had been adduced to show that, when the grant to Jackson and Harrison issued, the 50,000 acres had been forfeited, and that when that grant issued there was no title in the state to pass by it to Jackson and Harrison, and that the grant conferred no title on them. Said report found that the 4,610-acre tract had been assessed with taxes for 1867 to 1870, inclusive, and was delinquent for those years; that half of it was assessed with taxes from 1871 to 1880, inclusive, and it was sold in 1875, 1877, and 1879, and that in 1881 it was sold for the taxes of 1879, and purchased by the state at all the sales; that in 1897 the whole tract was sold to the state for taxes of 1896; that this half became irredeemable and vested in the state by reason of the first tax sale in November, 1876, and it was thereafter properly omitted from the taxbooks, because vested in the state by purchase for taxes. The report found that the other half of said 4,610 acres was omitted from the taxbooks from 1871 to 1896.

The report found that the whole tract was, by said tax purchase by the state of one half, and such nonentry of the other half, vested in the state. It found that the whole tract had vested in the state. The report found that on the 8th of October, 1884, in the proceeding in the name of Auvil, Commissioner of School Land, v. Landsburg, Landsburg had redeemed said 50,000 acres from any forfeiture accruing prior to that date, and had paid the taxes thereon subsequently.

The report found that no taxes had ever been paid on the 4,610-acre tract, and that its owners could not and did not take the benefit of the forfeiture of the 50,000 acres.

The report was excepted to by McCurdy and Thompson and Pritchard. One exception was because the report did not state that the 4,610-acre tract was not assessed with taxes for the years 1865 and 1866. Another was because the report found that half the 4,610 acres was sold in 1875 for the taxes of 1871, 1872, and 1873, as there was no evidence thereof. Other exceptions read as follows: "(5) The commissioner erred in finding that Max Landsburg redeemed the whole of said 50,000-acre survey in 1885." "(7) Commissioner erred in finding that W. M. Ritter was entitled to the whole of the 50,000-acre tract, including the 4,610 acres, and that the state had no right to proceed against it for the benefit of the school fund. (8) The commissioner erred in finding that the claimants of the Jackson and Harrison grant were not entitled to redeem the land embraced in said grant, and in finding that their title was not superior to that of any other claimant. (9) Because the commissioner failed to state that he has certified up with the report all the evidence before him upon which the report is based." The court made a decree dismissing the bill of the state, and refusing leave to McCurdy and Thompson and Pritchard to redeem the tract of 4,610 acres, and they appealed to this court.

As to the exception to the report for failing to state that the 4,610 acres was taxed for 1865 and 1866, it seems to be well taken; but it is immaterial, because payment of two years' taxes would not save it from default afterwards, or transfer the forfeited Morris title to the Jackson-Harrison title. If paid for those two years, it would only be one year's payment after 1865, whereas the Constitution requires five successive years' payment after that year. And there is no evidence of any payment for either year.

As to the exception that the report found half of the 4,610 acres was sold in 1875: An abstract certified by the clerk of the county court proves the fact.

As to the exception because the report found that Ritter had title to the whole 50,000 acres, and that Ritter was entitled to it, including the 4,610 acres, and that the state had no right to proceed against it for the benefit of the school fund: It is said that Ritter produced no grant from Virginia to Morris, and produced no title papers to show title in Ritter to the 50,000 acres, part of the Morris grant, and that, for want of documentary evidence, the finding that Ritter was entitled to the 50,000 acres is erroneous. This, of course, is an important matter in the case. Ritter's counsel seek to meet this objection by saying that Ritter's petition, read as an answer, states the existence of the documents, and that its statement is taken as true without proof, there being no replication to it, and cite Snyder v. Martin, 17 W. Va. 276, 41 Am. Rep. 670. An answer is taken for true against a plaintiff in the absence of a replication, but the answer of one defendant is not thus taken for true against another defendant. Hogg, Eq. Proced. § 447. But how do we know that there was not such evidence before the commissioner? The presumption holds that there was. Richter v. Riley, 42 W. Va. 633, 26 S. E. 357. Counsel for Ritter meet this point by saying that no exception to the commissioner's report was made on this score, but that the matter is brought up in this court for the first time, and that, if this court heeds it, it will work a surprise upon Ritter, which ought not to be tolerated, because, if it had been presented by the proper exception in the lower court, the objection would have been met by the production of the documents. I think this argument so far legitimate as to justify this court in scrutinizing the exceptions closely to see whether, when properly construed, they gave fair warning to Ritter and the court of the want of such documentary evidence. Stewart v. Stewart, 40 W. Va. 65, 20 S. E. 862, tells us that exceptions are of the nature of special demurrer, and the party complaining of the report must point out the errors by his exception with reasonable certainty, so as to direct the mind of the court to them. Look at exceptions 5, 6, 7. Construe them in connection with the fact that the appellants contend that in this case Landsburg in 1884 did not redeem the whole 50,000 acres, but only a part thereof, basing this theory on the fact that he paid only the residue of taxes on it after deducting taxes paid by junior claimants, and that this amounted to a redemption of only part. The answer of Thompson shows this. Look at the repeated use of the word "whole" in said exceptions, and we are compelled to think that those exceptions were not based on the want of documents to show Ritter's title, and did not call for them, and did not have them in mind, and that the exceptions did not fairly call the attention of anybody to the want of them. They did not contest the evidence to prove Ritter's title, but only that he had redeemed only part of the tract. Therefore, as to this objection, said exceptions are abortive. Richter v. Riley, 42 W. Va. 633, 26 S. E. 357. But let us say that those exceptions did call the title evidence in question. We hold that the report finding title in Ritter is justified by the record. The record of the proceedings in the Auvil case established that a grant did issue to Morris, and that that title had come to Landsburg, and was in him in 1884, at the date of his redemption, and that he became invested with that title both in the character of re-emer and purchaser. I do not forget that appellants were not parties to that proceeding. I know that it is a rule very fixed at "an adjudication of a fact in one case not evidence of the fact in another case against persons not parties to the former or privity with them." Chevallie v. Twiggs, 5 V. Va. 476. "No party can be estopped or any way prejudiced by any judgment or decree if the record shows on its face that had no opportunity to be heard in opposition to the entry or decree." McCoy v. McCoy, 29 W. Va. 794, 2 S. E. 809. Under that we may be asked how we can say that against those claimants of the 4,610 acres the record proves that there was a Mortgage, and that title under it went down to Landsburg. I answer that the cases set that a proceeding to sell forfeited lands, in which the land is condemned to sale for forfeiture, is prima facie evidence of the fact of forfeiture. Strader v. Goff, 6 W. Va. 214; Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. 214; Hitchcox v. Rawson, 14 Grat. 535 (opinion); Smith v. Chapman, 10 Grat. 446. They show that such record cannot be collaterally attacked. Right or wrong, those cases give such proceedings such effect. I know no reason why the record would not be evidence of redemption even as to strangers to it. It will be said, however, that those cases only establish prima facie the fact of forfeiture, and that they do not justify the finding from such a record that the Mortgage existed, and that documents pass the title down the line from Morris to Landsburg. I reply that, as the record establishes the fact of forfeiture, we must inevitably say that something was forfeited, and, looking to the record, we find what that was, namely, a tract granted by patent to Morris. That is the matter stated in the petition of the Commissioner of school land, and otherwise recited in the record, and that is the substance on which the decree operates, and to which it relates. And that decree found and adjudged that conveyances had carried the title to Landsburg, since it declared expressly that Landsburg owned the land derivatively from Morris by title superior to all others. Documents exhibited in this case show that part of the 50,000 acres was conveyed from Landsburg to McCormick, and that the whole tract was sold for taxes in 1899 to McCormick, and conveyed to him by tax deed, and that McCormick conveyed the land to Ritter. The tax sale was in the year of Landsburg. By chapter 31, § 29, of the Acts of 1899, that tax deed is made evidence against everybody that the material facts therein recited are true, and that the taxes assessed passed to the purchaser. Landsburg is stated in that deed to have been assessed with taxes, and this deed conveyed his title. So Ritter was properly regarded as invested with the Morris title, so far as the documentary evidence is concerned.

What title do the decrees above mentioned made in the Auvil case confer on Landsburg? They gave back to him, by force of the redemption, the Morris title to the 50,000 acres; but at that time the Jackson-Harrison tract of 4,610 acres had become forfeited by reason of sales to the state and omission as above stated. Did the said decree of redemption confer upon Landsburg title to said 4,610 acres? A decree not merely allowed redemption to Landsburg of the Morris title, and released the land under that title from all prior forfeiture, but it also allowed him to hold the character of purchaser of said 50,000 acres, as if he had purchased under the decree. I shall not say that a mere redemption under Code 1887, c. 105, § 14, would go further than simply to restore to the owner redeeming land his own title, and it may be that that feature of the decree according to Landsburg the character of a purchaser would not have any operation. True, it may be said, under Smith v. Chapman, 10 Grat. 446, that that would be error only, not liable to attack collaterally, and there is some force in this position; still, if there was no law to warrant such a provision, I would hesitate to say that it would bind the claimants of the 4,610 acres. If Landsburg held the character not only of a redeemer, but of a purchaser, he would get not merely the Morris title by redemption, but also any other title by forfeiture or otherwise vested in the state, including the Jackson-Harrison title, by the letter of section 15 of said chapter 105, Code (Acts 1891, p. 289, c. 94). Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. 214. The proceeding to sell forfeited land is statutory, and nothing can be done not warranted by the statute, and I repeat that I would doubt the intrinsic force of the provision in said decree alluded to to give Landsburg the character of a purchaser. Twiggs v. Chevallie, 4 W. Va. 463. But the question of the inherent effect of that clause of the decree is not all important, since Code, c. 105, § 19, as found in chapter 94, p. 291, Acts 1891, and edition of 1891 of the Code, says: "And when in proceedings heretofore had under this chapter, for the sale of forfeited lands, the former owner shall be permitted to redeem or purchase the same from the forfeiture thereof by the payment of the taxes, interest, damages and costs, due to the state thereon, and fixed and determined by the decree of the court in which such proceedings were pending, and has actually paid the same, or shall within one year after the passage of this act pay the same as required by such decree, such payment shall be valid and binding on the state, regardless of the irregularity of the proceeding or of any want of jurisdiction in the court to render such decree; and whatever right, title or interest the state may have had in such lands shall, by virtue of such decree and payment, be transferred to and be re-vested in such former owner." Was this provision made for this case expressly? At any rate, it fits the case. It validates that feature of the decree of redemption according to Landsburg the character of a purchaser, carrying with it the effect of the decree to pass to him all state title to that particular land, however derived; and, besides making the decree have that effect, the act itself is a legislative grant of all the state's right in that land to Landsburg. Cecil v. Clark, 44 W. Va. 676, 30 S. E. 216; Wild v. Serpell, 10 Grat. 405 (point 3). This retroactive feature as to redemption is omitted from the section as it reads in chapter 24, p. 66, Acts 1893 (Code 1899, c. 105, § 19), and section 17 gives redemption only the effect of reinvestment of the former title; but the act of 1891 has had its effect, and was likely not unwise legislation, being intended to give a person paying all taxes demanded by the state under one title adverse titles vested in it, to give rest and peace among conflicting titles. So it is the decree of redemption and purchase in that Auvil case and that act of 1891 gave, of their own force, title emanating from the state—made a grant, without calling on Ritter to show a grant to Morris or to connect with the Morris grant. Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. 214, tells us that a purchaser under a decree selling forfeited land, or one tracing right from him, connects with the state. His purchase is a grant from the state. So is the grant made by the act of 1891. Therefore Landsburg had such grant as enabled him to take title under the Jackson-Harrison grant by virtue of the Constitution (article 13, § 3). That section provides for giving the state's title to three classes of persons; the second class being persons claiming under a grant from the state, and paying taxes for five successive years after 1865. When Landsburg redeemed he paid taxes for more than five years. This would give him the Jackson-Harrison title, which was then forfeited. And by payment afterwards Landsburg would get that title, if afterwards forfeited. Being a purchaser, he would get all the state title by forfeiture or otherwise, by the Constitution, and by section 12, c. 105, of the Code, as found in chapter 95, p. 259, Acts 1882, and Code of 1887, in force at the time of Landsburg's redemption, and as that section still is. Thus Landsburg got the Jackson-Harrison title, both by statute and Constitution, under that decree.

As to the contention that the order of redemption excepted junior claims, and that the Jackson-Harrison is a junior claim, and that the redemption does not affect it, it is only necessary to say that that land was not before the court in the proceeding among the junior claims represented by parties to it, and, further, that the order excepted from the effect of the redemption only those junior claims which had paid taxes for five years after 1865, so as to have the benefit of the forfeiture. This could not save the Jackson-Harrison title. It had not paid any taxes. It follows from what is said above that McCurdy and Thompson and Pritchard, claiming under the Jackson-Harrison grant, had no right to redeem.

The statute touching redemption demands that the person asking it shall prove that at the time of the forfeiture of his title "he had a good and valid title, legal and equitable, superior to that of any other claimant," because the intent was to drown the inferior title, and not let it be redeemed, to foment litigation with a superior title, whether in the state by forfeiture or in private ownership. This Jackson-Harrison claim could not answer this demand, because there was the older Morris title in Landsburg. And if it was in the state, not yet redeemed, it would be not dead, but a living, superior title. That the state held the title makes no difference as to an inferior title asking redemption. Moreover, in connection with Landsburg's redemption and purchase, I will add that by chapter 105 of the Code of 1899, § 6, it is provided that, "if at any time during the pendency of such suit, it shall appear to the court that any part of any tract of land in question therein has been sold by the state in any proceeding for the sale of school lands, and the taxes regularly paid thereon since such sale, or is held by any person, under article 13 of the Constitution of this state, the bill, as to such part, shall be dismissed." Landsburg had purchased, paid subsequent taxes, and held the 4,610 acres under the Constitution. The statute would justify the dismissal of this suit without a sale, as the state had once sold this soil. I do not say that it would justify a refusal of redemption by one entitled to redeem.

It is claimed that the redemption in 1884 by Landsburg is void for the reason that the whole 50,000 acres was not redeemed, but only 26,000 acres, and that the part redeemed was not defined by a survey and plat, as required by chapter 105, § 14, of the Code of 1887, and State v. King, 47 W. Va. 437, 35 S. E. 300. This argument rests on the fact that a great number of adverse claimants of parts of the Landsburg 50,000 acres had been summoned into the case; but the court did not try their rights, but dismissed them from the suit, and then ascertained what taxes Landsburg owed on the whole 50,000 acres, adopting the process of charging him by acreage with taxes on so much as was not claimed by adverse claimants, deducting taxes paid by them, and by this process charged him with taxes on 26,000 acres, out of the whole 50,000 acres, with the proviso that the redemption should not impair the title of any claimants protected under the Constitution. Now, this is nothing but a decree of redemption of the whole 50,000 acres, with only a saving clause in favor of claimants made by the statute and Constitution. It is not a redemption with specific exceptions. In letter and intent, the decree is a redemption of the whole tract. If this decree is void, then any decree of redemption of a whole tract, containing such a saving clause, simply restraining the decree from injuring other claimants, like a clause of "without prejudice," is void. It is not error to make that proviso, as it only declares what section 17 of chapter 105, Code 1899, declares. Very different was the King Case, cited above, in which in express words only a part of the tract was redeemed by specification of quantity, and that part in no wise defined. For these reasons, the rule of Stockton v. Morris, 39 W. Va. 432, 19 S. E. 531, cited by counsel, does not apply. That rule is that, where there is an inclusive grant, its owner, suing in ejectment, must prove that the defendant is not on reserved land. It therefore cannot be successfully contended that Ritter must prove just what part was redeemed and what excepted.

It is argued that the redemption is invalid because the sum paid by Landsburg was too little. If there is error in this, how can strangers complain? Not even the state could now complain. In collateral proceedings strangers cannot assail the decree for such error. Hall v. Hall, 12 W. Va. 1; Smith v. Chapman, 10 Grat. 445; Cecil v. Clark, 44 W. Va. 659, 30 S. E. 216. Hall v. Swann, 39 W. Va. 353, 19 S. E. 509, holds that a decree of redemption is final, and works a redemption though the amount paid is too small.

But it is claimed that as Landsburg's 50,000 acres was sold for taxes in 1869 to the state, and was thereafter omitted from the taxbooks, and the tract thus vested in the state and was forfeited, the title to it passed to the benefit of the Jackson-Harrison title, under section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution. Doubtless, if, before Landsburg's redemption and purchase, the Jackson-Harrison title had become invested with Landsburg's title by reason of its forfeiture, Landsburg's redemption would be without effect. For Ritter it is contended, in answer to the claim that Landsburg's title was transferred to the Jackson-Harrison title, that the tax sale in Landsburg's name to the state in 1869 is void, and vested nothing in the state, because the sale list was not returned to the clerk's office within 10 days, and because no note of its return was made in that office, and because the sheriff's affidavit was not signed by him, and because the affidavit was not sworn to. McCallister v. Cottrille, 24 W. Va. 173. As to forfeiture for omission after the purchase by the state, it is answered for Ritter that the law forbade the change of any land after its purchase by the state, and that this would prevent the forfeiture for nonreturn; and for this position counsel for Ritter rely on Sayers v. Burkhardt, 29 C. C. A. 137, 85 Fed. 246. As these matters are being considered in another case before the court, and are not necessary for the decision of this case, though pertinent to it, I pass them without discussion, for the reason that the Jackson-Harrison land clearly did not pay taxes for five years after 1865, so as to claim the benefit of the forfeiture of the 50,000 acres, if forfeited it was. As stated above, the Jackson-Harrison land was charged from 1865 to 1870, inclusive, and returned delinquent for the last four of those years. Half of it was charged to Jackson for 1871 to 1879, inclusive, then omitted until 1896, and delinquent in 1872 to 1879, inclusive. The other half was omitted from 1871 to 1875, inclusive. So it is clear that this land did not pay taxes to enable it to claim the inurement to it of Landsburg's land. It was purchased by the state in 1875 for taxes of 1872, 1873, 1874, and again for years subsequent to 1879. It is incumbent on one seeking to take the benefit of the forfeiture of another's land under any one of the three classes provided for in article 13, § 3, of the Constitution, to establish facts which will bring him within one of those classes. He holds the affirmative. He is claiming title. He claims a grant created by the Constitution, and must prove the facts to give him that grant or transfer. It is claimed that the Jackson-Harrison title took the benefit of the forfeiture of the Landsburg land under the second and third classes specified in the Constitution. Under either class the claimant must prove payment of taxes for five years. It is argued that, as to taxes from 1865 to 1870, no sale appears, and that the continuance of the land on the books from year to year within that period affords a presumption of payment. Why so? The land would continue on the books till sale, though delinquent for any year. It is said that, as it does not appear that the land was sold for taxes for those years, the presumption is that such taxes were paid, because section 6, c. 31, Code, 1868, says: "After such sale as in the succeeding section is mentioned, if any real estate be not sold as therein required, it shall be presumed that such taxes * * * were paid." That presumption is raised merely to charge the sheriff in favor of the state, I think. At any rate, the record contains no list of sales for those years. If it did, and this land was not on it, that presumption would prevail, but in the absence of that list no such presumption holds. It is argued in this case, however, that, because it is a taxpayer's duty to pay his taxes, the law assumes that he has paid them. Such a proposition is repelled in this instance by the delinquency appearing for four of those years. But the law raises no presumption of payment of taxes. "No presumption of payment arises from the duty of the property owner to make it." 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 753. Smith v. Tharp, 17 W. Va. 221, sustains this position. For these reasons, the claim of the Jackson-Harrison title for the inurement to its benefit of the forfeiture of the Landsburg land must be refused. The Jackson-Harrison title never paid any taxes, and was clearly itself forfeited, before Landsburg's redemption and after it. It was for-fetted again and again. Its forfeiture is admitted by appellants.

Again: Say, merely for argument, that the Jackson-Harrison title got the Landsburg title by transfer under the Constitution. The answers admit that half the Jackson-Harrison land was forfeited for omission from 1871 to 1875, and its forfeiture complete at the close of 1875, and the other half was sold to the state for taxes from 1871 to 1878, or some of those years, and forfeited for omission from 1880 to 1895, inclusive. Now, as the Landsburg title paid taxes before and after redemption, would it not get the forfeited Jackson-Harrison title as such purchaser?

The complaint of the appellants is that the court would not allow them to redeem the Jackson-Harrison land; but, as above shown, when they asked the redemption the Jackson-Harrison title had been transferred, because of its forfeiture, to the Morris and Landsburg title, and there was no title in the state for appellants to redeem, as their title was gone. The state had, by Landsburg's redemption, coupled with said statute of 1891, and section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution, made grants of it to the owners of the Landsburg title. "Non dat qui non habet." State v. Collins, 48 W. Va. 64, 35 S. E. 840. Besides that, the very letter of section 17, c. 105, Code 1899, demands that at the time of forfeiture the redeemer have "good and valid title, legal or equitable, superior to that of any other claimant." Even if at that time the Landsburg title was forfeited and vested in the state (it could not be vested in the owner of the Jackson-Harrison title), it was vital and instinct with life; an older and better title in the state, as proprietor; not extinct, though lost to its original owners; to be granted out by the state to some one; and the state would not allow redemption of a title inferior to its title because it would thus be let loose to plague the superior title. The statute quoted above gives redemption only to the superior title.

After redemption, Landsburg paid all taxes except for 1895. For that year's taxes the Landsburg land was sold in 1897 in the name of Cameron, then its owner, and purchased by McCormick; and, if the Jackson-Harrison land was not then vested in the state, it went to McCormick by virtue of his tax purchase, as the Jackson-Harrison land was not on the taxbooks for 1895, and McCormick would get not only the title sold, but any other not on the books.

Great complaint is made by the appellants from the fact that a demand for a jury was not granted by the court, which action is said to be error, by reason of section 18, c. 105, Code 1899, which reads thus: "In every such suit brought under the provision of this chapter, the court shall have full jurisdiction, power and authority to hear, try and determine all questions of title, possession and boundary which may arise therein, as well as any and all conflicting claims whatever to the real estate in question arising therein; and the court, in its discretion, may at any time, regardless of evidence, if any, already taken therein, direct an issue to be made up and tried at its bar as to any question, matter or thing arising therein, which, in the opinion of the court, is proper to be tried by jury. And every such issue shall be proceeded in, and the trial thereto shall be governed by the law and practice applicable to the trial of an issue out of chancery; and the court may grant new trials therein as in other cases tried by a jury." The language of that section is strong to import that a jury right under it is not matter of right but of sound discretion, merely, like an issue out of chancery. The right to an issue out of chancery is different from the jury right in a court of common law. The former is a matter of discretion only—sound discretion—and it requires a clear case of abuse of discretion to reverse the decree for refusal to direct such issue, because it is only to help the chancellor decide on conflicting evidence, where he plainly needs it. Setzer v. Beale, 19 W. Va. 289. But the jury right in common-law procedure is under a guaranty of the Constitution preserving it in certain cases. I understand the jury right accorded by this statute to be the common-law jury right. It is true that it is in a chancery suit, and in matters purely of equity cognizance and jurisdiction the jury right does not exist; and this presents the question of the character of a suit by the state to sell its forfeited lands under chapter 105, Code 1899. Many parties are before the court, with their various titles. Is such a suit in its nature so far an equity suit as to make the jury given by the statute in question a mere discretionary issue out of chancery, or is it a chancery suit born first of this statute, not of purely equitable jurisdiction? It was unknown to equity jurisdiction before the statute. Can we call it a chancery suit to enforce a lien for taxes? No. It is not a lien which the state enforces. After forfeiture she has no lien for taxes, but owns the very land. It is a suit originated by the statute as a process adopted by the state for disposal of such land. Therefore the principle applies that, if a matter involved in the suit is of such nature as by common law would entitle the party to a jury, the Legislature cannot, by merely making it triable in equity, rob the party of his jury right. To make such an act constitutional, that right must be in some way preserved. If, when such matter is first brought within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, the Constitution gives a jury in such matter this rule prevails. Davis v. Settle, 43 W. Va. 17, 26 S. E. 557 (point 6); Cecil v. Clark, 44 W. Va. 659, 30 S. E. 216 (point 2); Black v. Jackson, 177 U. S. 349, 20 Sup. Ct. 648, 44 L. Ed. 801; 6 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 974-976. Any suit by which legal rights are settled upon matters of fact are within this rule, whatever its form. Barlow v. Daniels, 25 W. Va. 515. An inspection of Code 1899, c. 105, §§ 6, 8, 18, will tell us that the procedure in suits under it tries contesting adversary titles to land, to the extent necessary to reach the decree contemplated by the chapter. No instance of litigation can be suggested that is more distinctly of a legal nature, proper for a jury, than trial of competing titles to land. The party is, by the Constitution, entitled to it. When the statute originating suits of this character was enacted, the jury right was already in the Constitution. It will not do to say that, when equity has jurisdiction for one purpose, it will try all matters to give full relief. It will, if it have jurisdiction of a matter of purely equity cognizance; but this is not such a suit. It is a suit born of the statute—a new function given to an equity court, involving trial of land titles. I think, in passing, that this jury right is satisfied by an issue out of chancery, and that a proper practice would be to direct such an issue and proceed in it as in other cases. The statute says so. We therefore hold that the jury right under this statute is mandatory, because, if we do not so construe the statute, it would likely be unconstitutional. We must so construe it as to harmonize it with the Constitution. But this jury right is not an arbitrary one. It does not apply where there is no matter proper for a jury, no issue of fact. We must here remember the primary rule discriminating the functions of court and jury, which tests the jury right, expressed by the maxim, "Ad questionem facti non respondent iudices; ad questionem legis non respondent juratores" (to a question of fact the judges do not answer; to a question of law the jurors do not answer). There must be an issue, and that of fact, for a jury trial. There is no issue or controversy of fact calling for a jury in this case. The whole case depends on documentary evidence, raising questions of law, not on oral evidence. The answers, in a sense, contest the Morris grant, and that Ritter was connected with it. That depends on written evidence. The answer averred the sale of the Morris title to the state for taxes in 1869, and omission thereafter. Ritter's petition did not deny this. It was not an issue in the case. If it had been an issue, it was triable by documents. The answer of Thompson and Pritchard does not deny Landsburg's redemption, but asserts that it was of only a part of the 50,000 acres. This raised no issue of fact on oral evidence, but depended on a record—a matter for the court. The answers do aver that the Jackson-Harrison land was assessed from 1865 to 1870, inclusive, with taxes, and that they were paid. This was in controversy and proper for a jury, but it is settled by documents. Suppose, however, that this is not a good answer as to this point; then I say that an issue as to that matter would have been immaterial. If decided for appellants, it would not have called for a decree for them, but a decree must have gone for Ritter, on the same principle that calls for judgment for the other party, regardless of a verdict for his opponent, under the rule that, when a verdict rests on an immaterial plea, judgment goes non obstante veredicto. The verdict has no effect. Duval v. Malone, 14 Grat. 24; 4 Minor's Inst. 1140. That allegation of the answer, by its own showing, was without force, if true, as it was not one calling for a jury, for the reason that the answer admits that one half the Jackson-Harrison land became forfeited in 1875 for omission, and the other in 1884; so that, even if the taxes from 1865 to 1870 had been paid, the title would have later gone to Landsburg, because of such forfeiture. Is possession relied on for any purpose under the Jackson-Harrison title? The appellants make no pretense of possession for longer than nine years, just before the suit. What could that avail? It would not give title under the first class, taking forfeited title under section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution, requiring ten years' possession and payment of five years' taxes, nor under the third class, requiring possession for five years and payment of taxes for five years. That title paid no taxes. Possession is immaterial in this case. It was not in controversy in the case. It did not continue long enough, even as claimed by the appellants, to give good title by the statute of limitations against the state or the owners of the Morris title, and, if it had so continued, the right acquired by possession would be lost because of omission from the taxbooks. A title acquired by possession, like any other, may be lost by omission from the taxbooks and forfeited. Parkersburg Co. v. Schultz, 43 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. 255. Thus possession could not call for the jury.

Estoppel: The question whether that record, which I have called the "record of redemption," in the Auvil proceeding constituted an estoppel against the state, has been much discussed in the case. I have already tried to show that that record is prima facie evidence to show that there was a Morris grant, and that title under it was vested in Landsburg, and that it was forfeited, and that it was redeemed by Landsburg, and, I will add, purchased by him, for reasons above given. As to these points no question of estoppel arises. The record is evidence of those things. But the question does arise whether the state of West Virginia is estopped by that record from again selling that land covered by that redemption. A state may be sometimes estopped by record. Cecil v. Clark, 44 W. Va. 659, 30 S. E. 218. The state could not, in the face of that record made by her own act, deny that there was a Morris survey, and that it was forfeited, and that it was sold, or that in this case it was redeemed; but this is immaterial, as she is not denying these facts. But does that record bar her present suit? Does it bar her from again selling under the Jackson-Harrison title the same land which she allowed to be redeemed in that redemption proceeding? Ordinarily she would not be so barred, because she makes no warranty. Her sale is only quitclaim, or even not that. But in this particular case, although that redemption was at its date only a redemption, giving back to Landsburg only his original title, yet by the said act of 1891, as found in chapter 94, p. 289, Acts 1891, and Code 1891, c. 105, § 19, the state made that redemption a purchase, and made it operate to pass "whatever right, title or interest the state may have had in such lands." And in section 6, c. 105, Code 1899, it is provided that, if it appear in a suit to sell forfeited lands that part of the land in question has been before sold by the state as forfeited, the suit, as to the land before sold, shall be dismissed. Now, clearly, these statutes would bar the state from selling this land under the Jackson-Harrison title, and command the dismissal of the suit. And the Jackson-Harrison land was vested in the state at the date of that redemption and purchase by Landsburg, and under chapter 105, § 12, Code 1887, and the principles stated in Coal Co. v. Howell, 36 W. Va. 489, 15 S. E. 214, that redemption and sale made the state sell to Landsburg not only the Morris title, but its ownership in the Jackson-Harrison land.

As to the exception that the commissioner failed to state that he had certified all the evidence on which he acted: It is to be presumed that he did so. Documents and some depositions appear. Shall we reverse because he failed to certify that such evidence was all that was before him, when there is not the least showing that he failed to certify some part of the evidence? If such was the fact, the exceptor should have shown it, and asked a rule upon the commissioner to compel its production.

Therefore we conclude that as to the state the court properly dismissed the bill without a sale, and properly refused a redemption of the Jackson-Harrison land, because Ritter owned it, and there was no title in its former owner to warrant a redemption. Therefore we affirm the decree.

JUNGE et al. v. McKNIGHT.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 17, 1904.)

DEFAULT JUDGMENT—QUIETING TITLE.

1. Code, § 385, provides that judgment by default final may be had at the return term on failure of defendant to answer, proof of service of summons being made, on a verified complaint alleging a contract to pay a sum of money fixed by the terms of the contract, or capable of being ascertained therefrom by computation. Section 386 provides that in all other actions except those mentioned in section 385, when defendant shall fail to answer, and on a like proof judgment by default and inquiry may be had at the return term, an inquiry shall be executed at the next succeeding term. Held, that in an action under Laws 1893, p. 37, c. 6, to determine conflicting claims to real property, the failure of defendant to answer at the return term entitled plaintiff to a judgment by default final in accordance with the facts stated in the complaint, without inquiry or proof of such facts.

Clark, C. J., and Douglas, J., dissenting.

On Rehearing. Former opinion (47 S. E. 452) reversed; and superior court affirmed.

CONNOR, J. This cause is before us upon a petition to rehear. After a full and anxious consideration, we are of the opinion that the petition should be allowed, and the judgment of the superior court affirmed; thus reversing the decision of this court. 135 N. C. 105, 47 S. E. 452. We are not inadvertent to the well-settled rule of this court recognized and adhered to in a number of cases which will be found collected in Clark's Code, p. 943, rule 53. We are of the opinion that in respect to a question of practice, especially where, in a matter of which we are compelled to take notice, the almost uniform custom has been followed otherwise than as held by us, we should not hesitate, when convinced of error, to reverse our judgment. Many titles are dependent upon the validity of judgments rendered as the one before us. The reason and authorities set forth and cited in the several opinions filed at the first hearing render it unnecessary to discuss the question at any length. It will be noted that, as was then said, the plaintiff must be careful to draw his judgment when by default final, according to the right arising upon the case stated by the complaint, because "the defendant is concluded by the decree so far at least as it is supported by the allegations of the bill." If the decree or judgment do not conform to this well-settled principle, if it give relief in excess of, or of a different character from, that to which the plaintiff is entitled upon the allegations of fact in the complaint, the court will promptly set it aside upon application. The practice prevailing in courts of equity, to which in some measure the Code system in this respect may be assimilated, is thus stated by Mr. Beach: "The proceeding which is termed 'taking a bill pro confesso' is the method adopted by the court for rendering its process effectual when the defendant fails to appear and answer by treating the defendant's contumacy as an admission of the complainant's case, and by making an order that the facts of the bill shall be considered as true, and decreeing against the defendant according to the equity arising upon the case stated by the complainant." Mod. Eq. Pr. 191; Morisey v. Swinson, 104 N. C. 555, 10 S. E. 754; Thomson v. Wooster, 114 U. S. 104, 5 Sup. Ct. 788, 29 L. Ed. 105. It thus becomes important that the pleader, when he wishes to take a judgment by default final, set forth clearly the facts upon the admission of which by failure to answer he bases his right to relief, so that the court may, upon an inspection of his complaint, adjudge his right to correspond with such facts. It also becomes the duty of the judge in such case to cause to be read or to inspect the complaint before signing judgment, so that the right adjudged may be such as, upon the facts stated, the plaintiff is entitled to. In courts of equity, which are always open for the hearing of causes and rendering of decrees upon "rule days," it is usual to take the decree pro confesso, and give the defendant an opportunity at the next rule day to show cause against the decree tendered by the plaintiff, when he will be heard for that purpose only, unless he move to set aside the decree pro confesso. In our system of holding the courts only at stated terms, with no power in the judge to sign judgments out of term except by consent, it is not practicable to follow the equity rules. It often happens that important judgments involving large property interests are signed at the last moment of the court. The most careful judges find themselves embarrassed by this condition. It might be well to adopt a rule requiring all judgments which are to be taken by default during the term to be presented with the verified complaint not later than Thursday of the term. This, of course, is only suggestive.

The petition to rehear must be allowed, and the judgment below affirmed.

MONTGOMERY, J. (concurring). This case is before us upon the petition of the plaintiff (appellant) for a rehearing. It was first heard at the spring term, 1904, and the opinion of the court is reported in 135 N. C. 105, 47 S. E. 452. The action was commenced for the purpose of determining an adverse claim set up by defendant to certain real estate of the plaintiff, under the provisions of chapter 6, p. 37, of the Laws of 1893. The defendant filed no answer, and, upon the complaint having been fully verified, a judgment by default final in favor of the plaintiff was rendered. Upon appeal to this court the judgment was reversed. There was a divided court, however, two of the judges having dissented. The justice who writes this concurring opinion wrote the opinion in the case when it was here before at the spring term, 1904. Having changed his opinion as to the question involved, and expressed his views in a concurring opinion filed by him in the case of Eason v. Dortch (at this term) 48 S. E. 741, the dissenting opinion of the court in the case as originally heard becomes the opinion of the court. It is needless to reiterate what was said in the dissenting opinion in the case and what was said by the writer of this opinion in Eason v. Dortch, supra, as those opinions can be readily found and examined. Two further matters, however, I wish to add which seem to me to be pertinent:

First. It is not provided in section 386 of the Code that, when the defendant shall fail to answer, judgment by default may be had at the return term, but that judgment by default and inquiry may be had, and the inquiry executed at the next succeeding term. A judgment by default is one thing; a judgment by default and inquiry consists of two things. There are two kinds of judgments by default; one final, the other interlocutory. In actions sounding in damages the interlocutory judgment which is rendered for want of an answer is an admission or confession of the cause of action, and there follows a writ of inquiry by means of which the damages are to be assessed. There is, it is true, an expression at the end of the opinion in the case of Osborn v. Leach, 133 N. C. 432, 45 S. E. 783, that may seem to be inconsistent with the first clause of that proposition, but all the authorities in this state (and they are numerous) are to the effect that a judgment by default and inquiry admits the cause of action, and the plaintiff is only to prove his damages. In Banks v. Mfg. Co., 108 N. C. 282, 12 S. E. 741, the action was for damages on account of an alleged malicious prosecution. No answer having been made, a judgment by default and inquiry was had, and this court held that the court below properly refused to submit an issue offered by the defendant as to whether defendant did prosecute the plaintiff maliciously and without proper cause. The court said: "The issue tendered by the defendant was not raised, as there was no answer, and the matter was settled by the judgment by default." The judge submitted one issue only: "What damages, if any, has plaintiff sustained?" and this court approved of that course, saying, "The only inquiry was as to the quantum of damages." In Parker v. House, 66 N. C. 374, the action was against a constable and his bond for a failure to use due diligence in collecting claims put into his hands as an officer. This court said: "The default of the defendant in failing to answer admits the execution of the bond sued on, and that the plaintiffs have good cause of action, and the only question left for determination is the amount of damages." In Cowles v. Cowles, 121 N. C. 277, 28 S. E. 477, the court said: "Upon a judgment by default and inquiry the legal liability is fixed by the default, and the inquiry is only to ascertain the amount." In McLeod v. Nimocks, 122 N. C. 437, 29 S. E. 577, the action was for the recovery of damages for the conversion and embezzlement of the proceeds of cotton, and upon the defendant's failure to answer there was a judgment that the defendant, while the relationship of principal and agent existed between the parties, unlawfully, willfully, and fraudulently embezzled and converted to his own use 141 bales of cotton, and that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the value of the cotton. The cause was continued until the next term of the court that an issue might be submitted and tried by a jury as to the value of the cotton. The defendant, in his appeal from the judgment, did not except to the inquiry as to the value of the cotton, but he excepted to that part of the judgment on the question of conversion and embezzlement, as not being authorized by the Code, § 386. This court said: "We think his contention not well founded. The action sounded in damages. The tortious conduct of the defendant was set forth in the complaint as the basis for demanding the damages. The judgment by default and inquiry—the defendant having said nothing in answer to the plaintiff's complaint—was conclusive that the plaintiff had a cause of action against the defendant of the nature declared in the complaint, and would have been entitled to nominal damages without any proof. That cause of action was admitted by defendant's failure to answer." Numerous authorities were cited in support. The court further said: "So, in the present case, the defendant, by his failure to answer, admitted the cause of action as set out in the complaint, and the judgment was a proper one." Those decisions are not affected by the cases of Parker v. Smith, 64 N. C. 291, and Lee v. Knapp, 90 N. C. 171, where the actions were in assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, and the court held that the plaintiff had to prove on the inquiry both the delivery of the goods and their value. In both cases it is expressly stated that the specific articles of merchandise were not set forth in the complaint. In Witt v. Long, 93 N. C. 388, where the action was in assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, and the specific articles were set out in the complaint in the shape of an open account, it was held that, the defendant not having stipulated to pay the price charged for the goods, that matter of their value was to be settled by a writ of inquiry. The cause of action then being confessed or admitted in interlocutory judgments by default, there follows a writ of inquiry by means of which the damages are to be assessed. The writ of inquiry is issued in no cases except in actions sounding in damages, and only for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the plaintiff's damages. A writ of inquiry in common-law practice is defined in Black's Law Dictionary to be a writ "which issues after the plaintiff in an action has obtained a judgment by default on an unliquidated claim, directing the sheriff, with the aid of a jury, to inquire into the amount of the plaintiff's demand, and assess his damages." Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, defines a writ of inquiry as one "sued out by a plaintiff in a case where the defendant has let the proceedings go by default, and an interlocutory judgment has been given for damages generally, where the damages do not admit of calculation. It issues to the sheriff of the county in which the venue is laid, and commands him to inquire, by a jury of 12 men, concerning the amount of damages." The same definition, in very much the same language, of a writ of inquiry, is given in the law dictionaries of Rapalje and Lawrence, Abbott, Anderson, and Burrill. "If the action sounds in damages (according to the technical phrase)—that is, be brought not for specific recovery of land, goods, or sums of money (as is the case in real or mixed actions or the personal actions of debt and detinue), but for damages only, as in covenant, trespass, etc.—and if the issue be an issue in law, or any issue in fact not tried by jury, then the judgment is only that the plaintiff ought to recover his damages without specifying their amount, for, as there has been no trial by jury in the case, the amount of damages is not yet ascertained. The judgment is then said to be interlocutory. On such interlocutory judgment the court does not, in general, itself undertake the office of assessing the damages, but issues a writ of inquiry directed to the sheriff of the county where the facts are alleged by the pleadings to have occurred, commanding him to inquire into the amount of damages sustained by the oath of 12 good and lawful men of his county, and to return such inquisition, when made, to the court. Upon the return of the inquisition the plaintiff is entitled to another judgment, viz., that he recover the amount of the damages so assessed; and this is called 'final judgment.'" Stephen on Pleading, 105. Of course, the damages are assessed under the Code by the jury in the presence of and under the direction of the judge. I conclude, therefore, that judgment by default and inquiry, in section 386 of the Code, has reference only to actions sounding in damages.

The second matter I wish to mention is the argument to be drawn from the prohibition of the recovery of costs by the plaintiff in such actions as the present one, when the defendant suffers judgment to be taken against him without answer. It seems to us that it was the intention of the lawmakers to apply that prohibition only up to and including the appearance or return term. It could hardly have been their intention to declare that in case of a failure of the defendant to answer, then an interlocutory judgment should be entered against him, and at the succeeding term of the court have the whole question of title and alleged aspersion of title gone into, with the entire costs saddled upon the plaintiff even if he should be successful. It seems to me to be clear that a judgment final was intended to be recovered by the plaintiff in actions of this nature by the statute which gives the right of action. Acts 1893, p. 37, c. 6.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). The sole point in this case is whether a judgment by default final could be entered. There is nothing in the record which calls in question the effect of a judgment by default and inquiry. The majority of the court do not concur in a review of any part of the unanimous decision lately rendered in Osborn v. Leach, 133 N. C. 432, 45 S. E. 783, since cited and approved in same case, 135 N. C. 628, 47 S. E. 811, which makes it therefore unnecessary to discuss it. I concur with Mr. Justice DOUGLAS' dissent upon the question presented by the record, and refer to the views set forth in my concurring opinion on the former hearing of this case. 135 N. C. 107, 47 S. E. 452.

DOUGLAS, J. (dissenting). This case was heard at the last term of this court, and fully considered. In addition to the opinion of the court, two opinions, one concurring and one dissenting, were carefully and ably written. Not a single point was overlooked that seems to me to have any material bearing upon the case. Therefore, under the repeated decisions of this court, the petition to rehear should be denied. In Watson v. Dodd, 72 N. C. 240, Chief Justice Pearson, speaking for the court, says: "The weightiest considerations make it the duty of the courts to adhere to their decisions. No case ought to be reversed upon petition to rehear, unless it was decided hastily, or some material point was overlooked, or some direct authority was not called to the attention of the court." Does the case at bar come within any of those exceptions? Certainly not, as far as any one has undertaken to advise us. This language of Chief Justice Pearson was quoted with approval in Weisel v. Cobb, 122 N. C. 67, 30 S. E. 312, with the citation of 18 additional cases. The entire headnotes to Weisel's Case are as follows: "(1) Rehearings of decisions of cases of this court are granted only in exceptional cases, and, when granted, every presumption is in favor of the judgment already rendered. (2) Where neither the record nor the briefs on the rehearing of a case disclose anything that was not apparently considered on the first hearing, the former judgment will not be disturbed." That case was decided by a unanimous court, and has been cited in Capehart v. Burrus, 124 N. C. 48, 32 S. E. 378, and Coley v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 407, 40 S. E. 195, 57 L. R. A. 817. It was also the sole authority cited for the per curiam denial by the court of the petition to rehear in McNeill v. Railroad (at this term) 49 S. E. 1038. Of course, where the petition comes within the spirit of the rule, it should be granted; but some presumption of law must adhere to the decisions of this court. Aside from this question, I see no reason why the decision should now be changed. I still adhere to my concurrence in the concurring opinion of Clark, C. J., filed at last term (47 S. E. 452), and which I presume will now become a dissenting opinion. If Stephen were still the recognized standard of pleading in this state, and we were still dealing with covenant, trespass, trover, case, assumpsit, debt, or detinue, my opinion might possibly be different; but as our practice is governed by the Code, we must enforce its provisions. In it the cases are specifically stated in which judgment by default final can be rendered, and it is expressly provided that "in all other actions * * * judgment by default and inquiry may be had at the return term, and inquiry shall be executed at the next succeeding term." The Code, §§ 385, 386. Chapter 6, p. 37, of the Laws of 1898, does not profess to make any change in the Code, and has no relation to the case at bar. The expression, "suffer judgment to be taken against him without answer," could apply just as well to judgments by default and inquiry as to those by default final.

The opinion of the court frankly admits the danger attending the rendering of judgments by default final at the return term, and by its essential reasoning emphasizes the wisdom of the lawmakers in restricting defaults final to a very small class of cases, and providing that "in all other actions" the inquiry shall be held at the succeeding term. It cannot be contended that the opinion of the court follows the letter of the statute. I cannot admit that it follows the spirit of the statute when it construes into it provisions which, in its own opinion, are essentially dangerous. It is true we should all correct our errors when we are convinced that we are wrong, but I am not convinced, and must stand upon the letter of the law and my convictions of its essential spirit.

PARTITION—DEFENSES—WANT OF TITLE—DISMISSAL.

1. Where, in an action for partition, one defendant sets up title in himself, and the issue of title was submitted to a jury, and they found title in the defendant, and the court refused to disturb the verdict, there was no equitable issue remaining to be determined, the verdict establishing that plaintiff had no equity.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County; Purdy, Judge.

Action by Benjamin Kimbrell and others against Ophelia Page and others. From circuit order dismissing complaint, plaintiff and defendant F. C. Cummings and Robert Kimbrell appeal. Affirmed.

Jas. F. Izlar, for appellants. Messrs. Hendersons, for respondents.

JONES, J. In this action for partition of real estate in Aiken county the defendant Ophelia L. Page, and other defendants claiming under her, in possession, resisted, setting up title paramount in themselves. The "case" states: "At the October, 1903, term of this court, the case appeared upon calendars 1 and 2, and in the regular trial of the jury cases before his honor Judge Purdy this case was tried on calendar 1, before a jury, upon the issue of title raised by the pleadings upon the evidence submitted, the arguments by counsel and the charge of the judge; and the jury rendered the following verdict: 'We find for the defendant Ophelia L. Page and those claiming in like interest with her.' Upon the rendition of this verdict by the jury, the attorneys of the said Ophelia L. Page and those of the defendants interested with her moved to have the case called up on calendar No. 2, and there disposed of by dismissing the complaint. This was objected to by the attorneys representing the plaintiffs and those of the defendants having a like interest with them, who stated that they did not consider that the verdict of the jury disposed of the case, and that they had a right to have the matter tried and disposed of on the equity side of the court. Thereupon the plaintiffs' attorneys proceeded to make a motion for a new trial. After the argument of the motion for a new trial the court took the papers and reserved its decision; and the case was not called on calendar No. 2, and the equitable issues involved in the partition suit were not heard and determined by the court at said term. The attorneys for the plaintiffs and those of the defendants having a like interest with them then left the courthouse to await the decision of the said court on the motion for a new trial on the issue submitted to the jury. After the courts for the Second Circuit had been concluded, and the presiding judge, R. O. Purdy, had left said circuit, to wit, on the 24th day of December, 1903, he filed with the clerk of the court of common pleas for the county of Aiken, aforesaid, the following order on the motion for a new trial made as aforesaid: "The jury having tried the issue of title, and having found a verdict for the defendants for the land in dispute, and a motion for a new trial having been made and the same having been heard by me, it is ordered that the motion for a new trial be, and the same is hereby, refused. It is further ordered and adjudged that the complaint be, and the same is, dismissed, with costs." Order dated December 22, 1903, South Carolina, Aiken county.

The exceptions, three in number, raise practically the question whether the court erred in dismissing the complaint under the circumstances stated. We think there was no error. The issue of title having been submitted to the jury, and they having found title in the respondents, and the court having refused to disturb the verdict, there was really no equitable issue remaining to be determined; the verdict conclusively establishing that plaintiffs had no equity. Where some equitable issue would still remain for determination after a verdict on the question of title, the proper practice would be to hear and determine such independent issue on the equity calendar; but where, as in this case, the verdict standing is absolutely conclusive against plaintiffs' alleged equity, nothing remains to be done except a formal dismissal of the complaint, which has been done. To remand the case merely for the purpose of requiring the court to do what inevitably must be done, and which has already been done, would, indeed, be to "roll an empty barrel."

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STRICKLAND v. CAPITAL CITY MILLS.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 24, 1904.)

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PLEADING—INSTRUCTIONS—NEW TRIAL.

1. Though, in an action for personal injuries, the evidence shows plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence, defendant is not entitled to a verdict where he does not plead contributory negligence.

2. Where no affirmative defense is set up in an answer, it is error to charge that defendant must establish his defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

3. A new trial is properly refused where there is any evidence to support the judgment and there is no error at law.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richmond County.

Action by Henry Strickland against the Capital City Mills. From judgment of circuit court, defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. W. Shand, for appellant. Frank G. Tompkins, for respondent.

JONES, J. The plaintiff (respondent) brought this action to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been received by him while at work in defendant's (appellant's) mill. It was alleged that plaintiff was employed to work in the card room, with which he was familiar, but was transferred to work in the picker room, with which he was entirely unfamiliar; that he was not warned of the danger, and was ignorant thereof, and incapable of understanding the danger to which the work exposed him; that the machinery was unsafe without adequate guards; and that through these acts of negligence plaintiff's arm was caught in the machinery and lacerated, to his damage $3,000. Besides a general denial, defendant answered in this language: "That if plaintiff received any injury, as alleged in the complaint, it was caused by his own carelessness and negligence, and not by any negligence on the part of the defendant." The jury rendered a verdict for $1,500, and from the judgment thereon comes this appeal on exceptions which we now notice in their order:

"First exception: In charging the jury: 'I charge you, under these pleadings, that if you believe that the master, the defendant in this case, was negligent, and if you believe that the plaintiff was also negligent, both negligent—that both were negligent—then your verdict should be not for the defendant, but for the plaintiff, for the reason that the defendant in this case has not pleaded what is known as contributory negligence." It is conceded by appellant that this exception must be overruled, under the authority of Scott v. Railway, 67 S. C. 140, 45 S. E. 129.

"Second exception: That his honor erred in charging the jury: 'If employé is a person of manifest incapacity to understand the danger to which his work exposes him, the fact the machinery was left unguarded is competent upon the issue of the master's negligence. You see, it does not mean it controls you, but is a fact for you to take into consideration along with other facts of the case.'" This exception is too general, as it fails to point out the specific error intended to be assigned. We do not know, except as a matter of speculation, which we are not required to make—whether the error claimed was in submitting to the jury any question as to the "manifest incapacity," or was in charging in respect to a matter of fact.

"Third exception: That his honor erred in charging the jury: 'It is also the duty of the defendant to establish the defense by the preponderance of the testimony, and, if he has established the defense by the preponderance of the testimony—that is to say, 'I was not negligent, but this man was injured by reason of his own carelessness and his own negligence'—then you should write your verdict for the defendant.' Thereby improperly putting upon defendant the burden of proving not only that plaintiff was negligent, but also that the defendant was not negligent." This exception is well taken, and must be sustained. The defendant's answer was nothing more, in legal effect, than a general denial. It set up no affirmative defense which defendant was required to establish by a preponderance of the evidence. Wilson v. C. & S. Ry. Co., 51 S. C. 79, 28 S. E. 91. It is true, the language complained of was immediately preceded by these words: "Now, gentlemen, it is the business of the plaintiff to make out his case by the preponderance of the testimony, to satisfy you of the allegations of the complaint by such testimony as you believe; not necessarily by the number of witnesses, but by that testimony which carries conviction to your minds." But the whole charge in this connection was manifestly such as to lead the jury to suppose that defendant was required to establish its defense by the preponderance of the evidence. The case of State v. McDaniel, 68 S. C. 318, 47 S. E. 384, is illustrative of the error of improperly shifting the burden of proof.

The fourth exception complains of error in refusing the motion for a new trial, appellant alleging that the refusal was based upon erroneous legal grounds. Considering all that the court said in refusing the motion for a new trial, we are satisfied that his refusal was based upon his views that there was testimony to support the verdict, and in such case the refusal of new trial is not reviewable.

For the error pointed out in considering the third exception, the judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

(70 S. C. 225)

DIVINE v. MILLER et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 24, 1904.)

LIMITATIONS—PAYMENTS—ADMINISTRATOR—RENEWAL OF NOTE.

1. Where a creditor collects proceeds of collateral after the death of the debtor, in pursuance of his instructions, payment of the same on the note of the debtor does not arrest limitations.

2. An administrator by his promise in writing may renew note of intestate before it is barred so as to bind the personalty, but the real estate can only be affected by the promise of an heir to the extent of his interest.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; Watts, Judge.

Action by Jno. F. Divine against Charles D. Miller and Louisa Miller, as administrators of estate of E. Miller, and other heirs at law of E. Miller. From circuit decree, defendants appeal. Modified.

Clark, Elliott & Clark, for appellants. Barron & Ray, for respondent.

WOODS, J. On August 11, 1894, Dr. E. Miller gave to John F. Divine his promissory note for $1,876.02, payable one day after date. Miller died intestate on February 17, 1897, and thereafter, on September 16, 1901, the plaintiff filed his complaint against the administrators of Miller's estate and his heirs at law; setting out his own note; alleging that there were other debts outstanding against the estate, and that the entire personal estate had been assigned to the widow as a homestead; and asking that the assets be marshaled, the claims established, and the real estate sold for their satisfaction. The defendants in their answer admit that there is no personal estate in the hands of the administrators, and set up as a defense the statute of limitations. The circuit judge held that this defense could not avail, because of a payment made on the note, and the written promises made by C. D. Miller, one of the administrators, before the expiration of the statutory period. The appeal turns on the correctness of this ruling.

The payment relied on was made under these circumstances: Dr. E. Miller, the intestate, assigned to the plaintiff a bond and mortgage of Mrs. Beulah M. Watson as collateral to his note. Believing that Watson might set up defenses against him which would not avail against Divine, the assignee, Miller, requested Divine to foreclose in his name the Watson mortgage, and apply the proceeds on his own note as a payment. After full conference with Miller, J. T. Barron, Esq., Divine's attorney, commenced the foreclosure litigation, and conducted it against Mrs. Watson, under the direction of Miller, up to the time of his death. After the death of E. Miller, C. D. Miller, one of the administrators of his estate, who was also his son, corresponded with Mr. Barron on the subject, and in his letters promised in the most explicit manner that the estate would pay the balance of the debt to Divine after the application of the proceeds of the sale of the Watson land. This was in 1898, less than six years from the maturity of the Miller note.

If the suit on the Watson collateral mortgage had continued under Dr. E. Miller's direction to its termination, and the proceeds of the sale had been applied to his note under his express instructions, then the payment would have been his payment, and would have arrested the currency of the statute. Hopper v. Hopper, 61 S. C. 124, 39 S. E. 366. Under the arrangement with Miller, Divine was not merely the holder of a collateral, but he was the agent of Miller, acting under his express direction in the conduct of the suit and the collection of the money. But Dr. Miller having died before the sale of the Watson land, from which the payment was realized, the payment cannot be attributed to him as his act. His death did not affect Divine's interest in the collateral and his right to collect it, but it ended the special agency and the control of Miller over the litigation and the proceeds of the sale. To be effective in arresting the statute, the payment must have been made in the name of Miller, and by his agent, as if he himself were making it. After his death this was impossible. Johnson v. Johnson, 27 S. C. 309, 8 S. E. 606, 13 Am. St. Rep. 636; Hunt v. Rousmanier's Administrators, 8 Wheat. 205, 5 L. Ed. 589.

The promises made by the administrator, C. D. Miller, before the bar of the statute was complete, are sufficient to defeat the plea of the statute interposed by him. Reigne v. Executor of Desportes, Dud. 118; Johnson v. Ballard, 11 Rich. Law, 178. But such a promise made as administrator does not bind the heir, or affect his right to the protection of the statute as to real estate descended to him. Gibson v. Lowndes, 28 S. C. 301, 5 S. E. 727. On the other hand, a promise made by the heir alone, to which the administrator is not a party, will not bind the estate. Bolt v. Dawkins, 16 S. C. 211. In this case, therefore, the promise of Charles D. Miller, the administrator, could not bind the heirs other than himself, so as to affect their interest in the real estate. For while his letters indicate that he regarded himself as representing the interests and wishes of the family, there is no proof of his authority to act for the others as to the real property. But in making promises to pay, and in all his efforts to secure indulgence, as the letters clearly show, he treated with the plaintiff in the dual capacity of administrator and heir. By these promises as administrator he renewed the debt against the estate as to the personality, and as heir against the real estate, to the extent of the interest he inherited, and the statute of limitations cannot avail him. When the facts of the case of Gibson v. Lowndes, supra, are considered, it will not be found to conflict with this view. It is true, the payments in that case were alleged to have been made by Mrs. Lowndes, who was a devisee, and also named in the will as executrix; but she had not qualified as executrix, and, therefore was not the personal representative of the testator. In this case when the promises were made the debt was not barred. C. D. Miller was an heir, and also administrator; and, as we have seen, when he promised to see the debt paid he was acting in both capacities. It will hardly be contended that a debt cannot be renewed at all by a new promise, so as to defeat the plea of the statute of limitations interposed to protect the real estate of the intestate. Surely, if it can be done at all, it can be done by one who is both heir and administrator. The real estate of the intestate, E. Miller, is therefore liable for the plaintiff's debt to the extent of the interest of C. D. Miller, but no further.

As the action is on behalf of the plaintiff and "all other creditors of E. Miller who may come in and seek relief by, and contribute to the expenses of, this action," and no other creditors have proved their demands, we express no opinions as to their rights.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be modified as herein indicated.

HARVEY v. COMMONWEALTH.

me Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 12, 1905.)

—CONVICTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Is a prosecution for rape, evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Charlotte County.

Harvey was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed.

C. Franklin and W. C. Carrington, for appellant. Wm. Anderson, Atty. Gen., for Commonwealth.

PRISON, J. In November, 1904, the prisoner in error was indicted, tried, and convicted of the crime of rape, and now asks the court to review the judgment of the circuit court of Charlotte county, sentencing him in accordance with the verdict of the jury to the penal servitude for five years.

In the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to notice the fourth and last assignment of error, which is to the action of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury as contrary to the law and evidence.

The record shows that the prisoner was a married man, about 70 years of age, and the prosecutrix was a widow woman, who was the mother of two children. The statement of the prosecutrix is that on the 1st day of October, 1903, the prisoner called at her home in his buggy, and told her that he had a note from her attorney at Pamplin, saying that he desired to see her on the next day; that she got in the buggy with him, and that he drove her to Pamplins and got out at the home of her friend, Mrs. Wm. Hunter, where she spent the night; that the next day the prisoner called for her, and drove home together; that on the way just as they were reaching "Cub Creek" he made an improper proposition to which she rejected, and started to jump out of the buggy, when he caught her by the arm, drove into the creek, and there with his knife, saying that if she did not get out to him he would cut her throat; that thereupon put her feet upon the spatter board of the buggy, laid her back on the back of the buggy, and accomplished his purpose; that he made no outcry at the time for fear she would kill her; that none of her clothing was injured, and no marks of violence upon her person; that it was about half past 11 o'clock, and they did not stay in the creek for a very short time.

The evidence of the prosecutrix shows that the place where the road crosses Cub creek is a public place. The uncontradicted testimony of others is that it is one of the most dangerous places on the road; that there are mail boxes within 50 or 75 yards of the place, and that it was about the time of day when a mail carrier was due there; that there is a gristmill, sawmill, and a number of homes in the vicinity, at distances ranging from a half to one mile; that there are several other roads that come into the Pamplins road at that point, making the latter a very much traveled thoroughfare; and that the land around is clear, except a small piece on one side of the creek below the road.

That a married man 70 years of age could have committed the crime alleged upon a mature woman, under the circumstances narrated, about noon, in a buggy in the public road at a point unusually exposed, where they might have been seen at any instant, challenges human belief. The prosecutrix further testifies that they proceeded on their way until they reached the home of Mr. Hunter, whom the prisoner desired to see about seed wheat; they were at Mr. Hunter's in less than a half hour after leaving the creek; that just before reaching the house the prisoner said, "If you tell Mr. Hunter about my treatment, I will kill you, and put you behind a log;" that she asked him to let her go in the house for a drink of water, and he refused; that the prisoner got out, and went to the gate; that Mr. Hunter came to the buggy, and shook hands with her, and asked them in to dinner, but they did not go. The uncontradicted testimony of Mr. Hunter is that he went to the buggy, and shook hands with her, and invited her to get out and take dinner, but she declined; that he noticed nothing at all unusual about her, and saw no signs of excitement about her.

It is unnatural and difficult to believe that an innocent and helpless woman could, in less than a half hour after such an experience as is here described, be, in the presence of another, calm, and without the slightest evidence of distress or excitement of any kind. It is also hard to imagine any one so destitute of prudence as to take the victim of such a diabolical crime immediately into the presence of another man, to whom she could and ought to have at once appealed for protection. It is equally incredible that a virtuous woman, upon whom such an outrage had been perpetrated, within less than a half hour could be in the presence of a strong man, and not appeal to that man to shield her from the demon who was threatening her life.

The further testimony of the prosecutrix is that they drove on, without incident, to her home, where she was turned over to her father and sisters, with whom she lived, with the home of her brother and his wife in sight, and that of her brother-in-law close by. In the midst of this array of friends, not one of whom saw anything to suggest that she had been ill-treated, she remained, and not until after the 21st day of the following June, when she gave birth to a child, did she intimate to a human being that the outrage now charged had been perpetrated: giving as her reason for this suspicious—this amazing—silence that the prisoner had said that, if she told, he would kill her on the spot.

and that she was ashamed to tell any one about it.

The prosecutrix was surrounded by friends amply able to protect her. She was not in the power of or in any way under the control or dominion of the prisoner. Her own evidence shows this, for she says that in the spring following the alleged outrage the prisoner came to her home when she was there alone, and that she said to him, "Look here, and see the fix you have put me in." He told me to lay the child to some one else, and he would give me as much money as I wanted. I replied that 'I was not that sort of a woman; I have nothing but my character.'" This interview does not suggest fear, but a decided independence, of the prisoner. Further, the inquiry naturally arises, why did all of her alleged fear vanish as soon as she could no longer conceal her shame, divulging, for the first time, as she says, this heinous crime to her doctor shortly after the birth of her child?

Notwithstanding the revolting circumstances attending the crime here charged, and the natural indignation and condemnation that it excites, still it is necessary to inquire and consider, under the law, whether that charge is sustained by the proofs. In such a case the inducements to falsehood are powerful. The account given by the prosecutrix bears the impress of falsehood on its face, and we are constrained to believe that the natural horror of this particular crime diverted the attention of the jury from a proper consideration of the evidence.

Viewing the case, as we have done, from the standpoint of a demurrer to the evidence, we find the proof wholly wanting to sustain the verdict, and upon that ground the judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, to be had in conformity with the views herein expressed.

CITY OF RICHMOND v. GAY'S ADM'X.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 12, 1905.)

GAS—DEFECTIVE PIPES—ACTION FOR WRONGFUL DEATH—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—DEFENSES.

1. A declaration in an action against a city for wrongful death caused by gas escaping from one of defendant's mains to decedent's house, which otherwise states a cause of action, is not defective because it does not state what particular main was defective.

2. In an action against a city for wrongful death resulting from gas escaping from some of defendant's gas pipes, where there was evidence that gas had previously escaped into other parts of the house in which decedent lived, and defendant had made some effort to remedy the defect, whether, having knowledge of these facts and of the fact that illuminating gas is dangerous to life, decedent was guilty of want of ordinary care in remaining in the house, or in not taking other precautions for her safety, was a question for the jury.

3. It is no defense to an action against a city for wrongful death from gas escaping from a main that the gas escaped from the main into an abandoned sewer, and from the sewer to decedent's house through a private pipe, instead of from a leak in the main to the house, as alleged.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by the administratrix of Fetnah D. Gay, deceased, against the city of Richmond. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. R. Pollard, for plaintiff in error. R. L. Montague, P. A. Smith, and Meredith & Cocke, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This action was instituted against the city of Richmond by the personal representative of Mrs. Fetnah D. Gay, deceased, to recover damages for the asphyxiation and death therefrom of the plaintiff's intestate, caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant city in permitting illuminating gas (which it manufactured and furnished to its residents for gain) to escape from its gas mains into the room in which Mrs. Gay was sleeping. Upon the trial of the cause there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and to that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The first error assigned is the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration.

The first ground of demurrer, which was to the declaration and each count thereof, was "that the statute under which the action was brought (sections 2902, 2903, Code 1887 [Ann. Code 1904, pp. 1526, 1527]) for the wrongful act, neglect, or default of any person or corporation has no application to an action against a municipal corporation by the personal representative of one who died from a cause superinduced by neglect to take sanitary precautions on the part of the public authorities in the construction or maintenance of its gas mains, as alleged in the declaration." That ground of demurrer is abandoned here by the counsel of the city in his oral argument.

The other ground of demurrer was that the third count to the declaration did not "allege with sufficient certainty what particular mains of the city of Richmond the defendant had failed to examine for the purpose of ascertaining whether such mains were in an improper and unsafe condition."

The Franklin House, in which the plaintiff's intestate was asphyxiated, was situated on Franklin street, and was very near Governor street of the defendant city. In the first count in the declaration it is charged that the gas escaped from the main in Franklin street. In the second count it is charged that it escaped from the main in Governor street. The plaintiff could not know with certainty from what mains the gas escaped, as they were laid underground, and she had no right to disturb the streets so that she could inspect them and ascertain where the leak was. That was a fact peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant. Having charged in the first and second counts of the declaration that the gas had escaped from certain mains—those nearest to the Franklin House—the plaintiff, no doubt out of abundant caution, not knowing precisely what the evidence would be, added the third count. While it is general, it states sufficient facts to enable the court to say on demurrer that, if the facts stated are proved, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and therefore states a good cause of action. Hortenstein v. Virginia-Carolina Ry. Co., 102 Va. 914, 47 S. E. 896. For if the defendant did negligently allow the gas to escape from any of its mains, and injury resulted to the plaintiff's intestate therefrom, without fault on her part, it was liable in damages therefor.

The action of the court in refusing to give instruction "d" asked for by the defendant city is assigned as error. By that instruction the court was asked to tell the jury that, if Mrs. Gay knew, or ought to have known, prior to the accident, that illuminating gas was escaping into the house occupied by her, and that such gas was dangerous to life, it was her duty to have withdrawn from the premises, or to have taken other precautions for her safety, and her failure to do so was contributory negligence as a matter of law.

The evidence shows that gas had been escaping from time to time into the printing office on the first floor of the Franklin House, and also into some of the rooms on the other floors, for some three weeks prior to the asphyxiation of Mrs. Gay, and that the city authorities had been notified of that fact, and that they had made some efforts, though not very promptly nor energetically, to remedy the trouble, but had not succeeded in doing so. There was evidence tending to show that no gas had escaped into the room occupied by Mrs. Gay; that on the night she was asphyxiated her daughter visited her room twice after her mother had retired—once as late as midnight—and that upon neither occasion was gas escaping into the room. Whether or not, with knowledge of these facts and of the further fact that illuminating gas was dangerous to life, Mrs. Gay was guilty of a manifest want of ordinary care and prudence in remaining in the house, or in not taking other precautions for her safety, was clearly a matter for the jury (2 Shear. & Red. on Neg. § 696; Holly v. Boston, etc., Co., 8 Gray, 123, 132, 133, 69 Am. Dec. 233), and the court properly refused to give the instruction under consideration. The question of contributory negligence was fairly submitted to the jury by the defendant's instruction "c."

The next and remaining error assigned in the petition is to the action of the court in refusing to give instruction "g" asked for by the city. "That instruction was intended," as the city insists, "to lay down the proposition that, if the evidence showed that the abandoned sewer in Franklin street was not a city sewer, and that gas escaped into it, and from it, through a private connecting pipe, into the building, then the city was not responsible for its alleged failure properly to maintain its gas mains, for the reason that its failure was not the proximate cause of the injury complained of."

The fact that the escaping gas reached Mrs. Gay's chamber in the manner indicated in the instruction, instead of directly from the city's gas mains, does not render its negligence any the less the proximate cause of her death, unless there was some cause intervening between the defendant's negligence and her death. And in order to excuse the defendant's negligence, this intervening cause must be either a superseding or responsible cause. To be a superseding cause, whether intelligent or not, it must so entirely supersede the operation of the defendant's negligence that it alone, without the defendant's contributing negligence thereto in the slightest degree, produces the injury. To be a responsible cause, it must be the culpable act of a human being, who is legally responsible for his act. Shear. & Red. on Neg. § 32; Standard Oil Co. v. Wakefield's Adm'r, 102 Va. 824, 832, 47 S. E. 830.

There was clearly no such intervening cause in this case, and the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

Neither were the facts hypothetically stated in the instruction evidence of contributory negligence. Mrs. Gay was in no wise responsible for the condition of the old sewer, and, if she had been, she could not anticipate that the city would allow its illuminating gas to escape from its gas mains into the sewers of the city, whether they belonged to the city or to private individuals.

This question of contributory negligence was relied on in Kibele v. City of Philadelphia, 105 Pa. 41, in a somewhat similar case. In dealing with that question the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania used the following language: "A good deal has been said in the argument of this case about the defectiveness and untrapped condition of the plaintiff's sewer, and an endeavor has been made through it to charge him with contributory negligence. But this matter has nothing at all to do with the case. If he had a bad or imperfect branch sewer, he must run the risk of the deleterious effects of sewer gas, for that must be expected in a common sewer; but he had no right to expect that it would become a conduit for illuminating gas. As well might he expect that it would be made a storehouse for gunpowder."

The instruction was properly refused.

We are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment complained of, and that it should be affirmed.

SAVAGE v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 12, 1905.)

RAILROADS—INJURY TO ONE WALKING ON TRACK—DUTY TO LOOK AND LISTEN—DISCOVERED PERIL—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

1. One walking on a railroad track is bound to listen and keep a lookout in each direction for approaching trains.

2. A locomotive engineer who sees a person walking on the track is required to stop the train only after seeing that the pedestrian is taking no measures for his own protection.

3. In an action against a railroad company for injuries from being struck by a locomotive while plaintiff was walking on the track, evidence held to show plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by John Savage against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wyndham R. Meredith, for appellant. Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson, for appellee.

KEITH, P. The accident which is the subject of this suit occurred upon that portion of the main line of the Southern Railway Company between Richmond and West Point, Va., which passes through the yards of the Trigg Shipbuilding Company, in the city of Richmond. At the point of the accident the railway company was not the owner in fee of its roadbed, but occupied it and operated its road under a perpetual license derived from the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. Its right of way was over a strip of land about 40 feet in width, wide enough for three tracks, but upon which only one track had been constructed. It permitted the Trigg Company to cover this space with racks and cribs for storing iron plates, rods, and other wares used in its business, leaving a space between the rail and the racks on either side of about 5 or 6 feet.

On the 13th of March, 1902, John Savage, a young colored man in the employment of the Trigg Company, was run over by a shifting engine which was moving over this track in an easterly direction, and suffered injuries which rendered it necessary to amputate both of his legs. He brought suit, evidence was introduced before the jury, a demurrer to the evidence was interposed by the defendant, a verdict was rendered in his favor for $8,000, judgment given for the defendant, and the case is here upon a writ of error.

The only question which we shall consider is whether the evidence was sufficient to require the court to leave the case with the jury.

The testimony tended to prove the following facts: That Savage was on that day, for the first time, in the employment of the Trigg Company. That he was unacquainted with the locality, and knew nothing of the number of trains, or with respect to their operation, over this line of railway. That he was under the impression that it was a switch track and not a main line. That the material used by the Trigg Shipyard in and about its business was stored in racks which occupied the right of way of the railroad to within 5 or 5½ feet of the rail on either side. That at noon on the day of the accident Savage took his seat upon a platform near the railroad to eat his luncheon. That, having eaten, he went to a small house near the track, where he had left his overalls, took a cigarette out of the pocket of his overall jacket, returned to the railroad, and started down the track to the east. That before going upon the track he looked and listened, but saw no train. That, going upon the track in an easterly direction, he had walked but a short distance—some of his witnesses say only about 8 or 10 feet—when he was struck by the tender attached to an engine of the Southern Railway. A short distance west of the point at which he stepped upon the railroad track there is a slight curve, which, together with the obstructions upon the right of way, hindered in some degree a view of the track in that direction. That an engine of the defendant company, moving, with its tender in front, at a rate of about 20 miles an hour, struck him and inflicted the injuries for which he sues. There is much conflict of testimony as to whether or not the bell was rung and the whistle sounded. The negative testimony is that no warning, either by bell or whistle, was given. The positive testimony of the employees upon the train is that the bell was being rung; that it operated automatically, and the machinery for ringing the bell was set in motion when the engine started. It further appears that as many, perhaps, as 1,800 hands were employed at the Trigg Shipyard, and that, with the knowledge of the railroad company, they were in the habit of using the railroad track through the shipyard as a pass-way.

Conceding that, under these circumstances, the defendant was guilty of negligence, it remains for us to inquire whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

We have said that the tracks of a railroad are of themselves a warning of danger, and that a person going upon the tracks is bound to listen and keep a lookout in each direction for approaching trains. C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Rogers, Adm'x, 100 Va. 324, 41 S. E. 732; Humphreys' Adm'x v. Valley R. Co., 100 Va. 749, 42 S. E. 882.

It is difficult to get a clear-cut conception of the situation at the moment when the train came into contact with Savage; but, taking his own statement of the circumstances attending the accident, and it appears that he looked up and down the track before getting upon it, and then neither looked nor listened afterwards. He could not be

Tyler, Rec'r, v. Sites, 90 Va. 539, E. 174.

Rangeley v. Southern Ry. Co., 95 Va. 30 S. TAX SALE—RIGHT TO DEED—NOTICE TO PERSON ENTITLED TO REDEEM.

1. Under Acts 1901-02, p. 779, c. 658 [Ann. Code 1904, p. 320], re-enacting Code 1887, § 655, providing that after the two years from sale of land for taxes allowed for redemption, the purchaser of the land not redeemed shall obtain from the clerk of court a deed, and amending it by providing that a deed shall not be made to any such purchaser till after he has given to the person in whose name the land stood at the time of the sale, and to certain other persons, four months' notice of his said purchase, and that the person entitled to redeem the land shall have the right to redeem it before expiration of the four months, though such time extend beyond the two years, the notice is not required to be given in a case where the two years for redemption had expired before the amendment came into effect.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Suit by one Harrison against one Thomas. Decree for defendant. Complainant appeals. Affirmed.

S. S. P. Patteson, for appellant. W. H. Werth, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. This case involves the construction of an act of the General Assembly approved April 2, 1902 (Acts 1901-02, p. 779, c. 658 [Ann. Code 1904; p. 320]), amending and re-enacting section 655 of the Code of Virginia of 1887, requiring the purchaser of real estate at a tax sale to give four months' notice of his purchase to the persons enumerated in the statute before he shall be entitled to a deed.

Appellant, who was the former owner of two lots, located in the city of Richmond, which were sold for taxes March 19, 1900, filed a bill in the chancery court of that city against appellee, the purchaser, to set aside the deeds to the property executed April 7, 1902, on the ground that they were void because of the failure of appellee to give the four months' notice of his purchase, prescribed by the amended statute.

The act provides, as did the original section, that "after the expiration of the said two years, the purchaser of any real estate so sold and not redeemed * * * shall obtain from the clerk * * * a deed conveying the same." The amendment declares, "but in no case shall a deed be made to any such purchaser of any such real estate until after such purchaser has given to the person in whose name the real estate stands at the time of said sale * * * four months' notice of his said purchase;" and, also, that "the person entitled to redeem said real estate shall have the right to redeem the same at any time before the expiration of four months, although such time extend beyond the two years first mentioned herein." Acts 1901-02, p. 779, c. 658 [Ann. Code 1904, p. 320].

This court, upon a similar state of facts, recently had occasion to construe this statute in the case of Nuckols v. Waddill, Clerk (no opinion filed), which was a petition by the purchaser of real estate at a tax sale for a mandamus to compel the clerk to execute the deed required by statute. The defense interposed was that the purchaser had not given the prescribed notice, and was therefore not entitled to demand a deed. But the court, after mature deliberation, reached the conclusion that the amended act had no application to a case in which the two years allowed for the redemption of the land had expired before it came into effect.

It will be observed that the amendment in terms applies only to persons entitled to redeem, and appellant was clearly not of that class, since her right to redeem had already ceased by lapse of time. While it is true the statute comprises sales made before as well as those made after its passage, nevertheless, with respect to the former, it only includes those wherein the right to redeem was in force when the new law took effect. If only the last day of the two years remained at that time, the right to the four months' notice accrued, although it would have the effect of extending the right of redemption beyond the original limit of two years. But it was not the purpose of the Legislature to revive a right of redemption already barred, if, indeed, it possessed the constitutional power to do so.

In the leading case of Curtis v. Whitney, 13 Wall. 70, 20 L. Ed. 513, and other cases relied on by appellant, the right of redemption under the prior law was a subsisting right at the date of the amendment, and the court properly held that a mere change of procedure requiring notice, and enabling the former owner the more certainly to exercise his right of redemption, did not impair the obligation of the purchaser's contract. In that case the period of redemption had not expired, at the date of the amendment requiring notice, by more than 13 months. The opinion of Justice Miller is in entire accord with the distinction which this court observes between an existent and a nonexistent right of redemption where the amendment attaches.

If, however, the import of the act under consideration were doubtful, the case would call for the application of the familiar rule that, where a statute is susceptible of two constructions, one of which is plainly within, and the other without, the legislative power, the courts must adopt the former construction. Martin v. South Salem Land Co., 97 Va. 349, 33 S. E. 600.

With respect to the remaining suggestion, that the proceedings are void because appellant's name did not occur in alphabetical order in the treasurer's original report of sales, it is sufficient to remark that the statute does not require the observance of such alphabetical arrangement. Code 1887, § 642 [Ann. Code 1904, p. 314].

Upon the whole case, the court is of opinion that the decree complained of is without error, and it must be affirmed.

RICHMOND PASSENGER & POWER CO. v. STEGER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 12, 1905.)

APPEAL—FINDINGS OF FACT.

1. The finding of the jury as to contributory negligence, depending on questions of fact as to which there is conflicting evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.

Error from Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by one Steger against the Richmond Passenger & Power Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. Taylor, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Wyndham R. Meredith and B. O. James, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This is the second appearance of this case upon our docket. 101 Va. 319, 43 S. E. 612. Now, as formerly, there was a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, which the lower court refused to set aside.

When the case was here before, error was found in the instructions, for which reason the judgment was reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial. The plaintiff in error now concedes that the instructions are free from objection, and assigns as its only ground of error that the verdict is against the evidence and the instructions.

The injuries of the plaintiff for which he has twice recovered damages were caused, as alleged, by the negligent running of one of the defendant's cars upon him when he was crossing the track at the intersection of Third and Broad streets, in the city of Richmond. It is admitted that the defendant company was guilty of negligence in running its car beyond the lawful rate of speed, but it is contended that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, proximately concurring with the negligence of the defendant company, which defeats his right to recover.

This contention cannot be sustained. The case is before us as upon a demurrer to the evidence, and in the light of that rule, conceding that there was some evidence tending to show contributory negligence, a careful examination of the testimony satisfies us that we would not be warranted in holding, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury. In view of all the evidence bearing upon the tion of contributory negligence, we are of opinion that the case involved questions of which were for the exclusive consideration of the jury, and, upon principles too well settled to require citation of authority, their finding cannot be disturbed.

he judgment must therefore be affirmed.

CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO. v. SMITH.

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 12, 1905.)

RRIERS—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—ALIGHTING FROM CARS—WAYS TO STATION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ACTIONS—TRIAL—JURORS—BIAS.

Where members of a jury on their voir stated that they were friends of the plaintiff and that he was their family physician, but such relation would have no influence on their verdict, they were not disqualified on the ground of implied bias.

Plaintiff returned to his home at night. As train approached plaintiff's station, the conductor opened the door of the rear car, in which plaintiff was riding, and called the station, and plaintiff and the other passengers got on the ground, not knowing that they were yards from the depot. The night was dark, plaintiff, after the train left, in walking along the unlighted track toward the depot, fell on an unguarded cattle guard, and was injured. Held, that the railway company was guilty of negligence.

Plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in not going through the cars between him and the station platform before getting off, or in not finding the conductor, who sat at the front end of the train, and requesting to move the train until the rear car reached platform.

Error from Circuit Court, Fluvanna County.

Action by O. M. Smith against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant assigns error. Affirmed.

Leake & Leake, for plaintiff in error. Gray & Gray, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. O. M. Smith instituted an action against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company to recover damages for injuries received by him, resulting from the alleged negligence of the railway company.

Upon the trial of the cause there was a judgment in his favor, and to that judgment a writ of error was awarded.

The first error assigned in the petition is the action of the circuit court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration, and each count thereof. This assignment of error was abandoned in the oral argument, properly so, as each count sets out a good cause of action.

The second assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to sustain the railway company's objection to certain members of the jury who were sworn to try the case.

The objection made to these jurors is that they were friends of the plaintiff, and that he was their family physician.

The bill of exceptions shows that when examined on their voir dire they "stated that they were friends of the plaintiff, and that he was their family physician, but that such relation to the plaintiff would have no influence upon their verdict." A juror is not disqualified from sitting in a case because he is a friend of one of the litigants (Reg. v. Geach, 38 E. C. L. 195), nor where there is great intimacy between their families, unless it appears that such relations will interfere with his impartiality of action (Montague's Case, 10 Grat. 767, 774).

There are certain relations in life from which the law conclusively presumes bias, such as affinity or consanguinity within certain degrees; and when a juror is examined upon his voir dire, and it appears that such relationship exists, that alone is sufficient to exclude him from the jury, although in fact he may be free from all bias. There are other relations existing between juror and litigant from which the law raises no presumption of bias, yet, if upon his examination it appears that the juror is not impartial, the law excludes him. In such a case the trial court must determine the juror's competency from all the facts before it. The juror may state and honestly believe that he is free from all bias, and yet it may appear from his own or from extraneous evidence, or both, that such may not be the fact. The object of the law in all cases is to obtain an intelligent as well as impartial jury. In order to do this, it is neither necessary nor wise to determine the juror's impartiality by extending and applying arbitrary or technical presumptions which may have the effect of excluding the most competent man on the list from the jury. Sustaining challenges for favor on slight grounds, as was said by the General Court in Moran's Case, 9 Leigh, 651, 658, tends to place the administration of justice in the hands of the most ignorant and least discriminating portion of the community, by which the safety of the accused may be endangered, and the proper administration of the laws put to hazard; and we are therefore not disposed to enlarge the grounds of challenge beyond those properly deducible from the cases heretofore decided. We have been cited to no case, nor have we found one in our investigation, which holds that, where the relation of physician and patron exists, the law conclusively presumes such bias that neither is competent to act as juror in a case to which the other is a party. The contrary has been held in the case of attorney and client (Reg. v. Geach, supra), who in many respects occupy similar relations. The examination of the jurors in question—and that was the only evidence before the court—could leave no doubt in the mind of the court as to their competency, and it did not err in accepting them as jurors.

The third assignment of error is to the action of the court in overruling the railway company's demurrer to the evidence.

The facts, as they appear upon the demurrer to the evidence, are substantially as follows: The plaintiff, with his wife, mother, and sister, had on the morning of the accident gone from Columbia, a station on the railway company's line, to Richmond, on an excursion train, consisting of 12 coaches, carrying about 1,000 passengers. The train returned that evening, reaching Columbia behind time and after dark. As the train approached the station, and immediately before it stopped, a brakeman opened the front door of the rear car, in which the plaintiff was riding, called out "Columbia," and passed into the car ahead. As soon as the train stopped, all passengers on that car got off on the side next to the canal. The plaintiff, with his party, alighted with some difficulty, on account of the height of the car steps from the ground, and the bundles they were carrying. They waited until the train pulled out, which was about four minutes from the time it stopped. After the train left, the plaintiff and his party went upon the railway track and started towards the depot, which was some 80 yards distant. Between him and the depot, after getting off the train, about 20 or 25 yards off, and unknown to him, there was a cattle guard, 4 feet deep, into which the plaintiff, who was in advance of his party, fell, and suffered the injury complained of. The night was very dark—so dark that the plaintiff and the ladies who were with him could not see each other after the train left; and he saw no light until after he had fallen and was getting out of the cattle guard, when he saw two men, with lanterns, about 50 yards away between him and the depot. When the plaintiff got off the car, he did not know exactly where it was. None of the railway employes aided him or his party in getting off the car, nor furnished light, nor gave him any information as to the cattle guard, which he would be compelled to pass in going from where he alighted to the depot.

When the train stopped, the plaintiff did not know how far his car was from the station platform, but thought that it was his duty to get off as he did. Upon cross-examination he stated that he knew that, if he had asked the conductor to pull up to the station, he would have been obliged to do so; and the conductor testified that, if requested, he would have done so, but stated that it was his duty to be at the platform when passengers were getting off the train, and that he was standing there, assisting them in getting off. The plaintiff testified that the car ahead of his was crowded, and that he and his party could not have gotten through the crowded cars (some six in number) to the platform before the train pulled out. The station platform was sufficiently long to enable passengers to get on and off the trains of the length usually run upon the road.

It is the duty of a railway company, for the protection of passengers carried or to be carried on its trains, to provide and maintain at its stations reasonably safe and adequate ways for approaching and leaving its trains, and at night to have such ways reasonably lighted a sufficient time before and after the arrival and departure of each train to enable passengers to avoid danger. See 6 Cyc. L. & P. 605-610; Alex. & Fred. R. Co. v. Herndon, 87 Va. 193, 199, 200, 12 S. E. 289; Richmond & Danv. R. Co. v. Morris, 31 Grat. 200; Reed v. Axtell, etc., 84 Va. 231, 4 S. E. 587.

And where passengers are invited, expressly or impliedly, to get off a train at a place other than that at which they usually alight, and there is any special danger attending their approach to the station, it is the duty of the railway company to warn them of such danger, and to aid them in reaching the station in safety; and especially is this true in the nighttime. See same authorities cited above.

The action of the railway company in announcing the approach of its train to the plaintiff's station, in leaving his car door open, and in stopping the train, was clearly an invitation to the plaintiff to alight. It was so understood by him and all the other passengers on that car, as appears from their action in getting off. It was so intended by the railway company, since it gave no other opportunity for them to get off. It knew that passengers, getting off the car in which the plaintiff was, could not reach the station without passing over the cattle guard. Yet it neither warned the plaintiff of this danger, nor lighted up the way, nor gave him any assistance whatever in reaching the station, but moved its train off, leaving him and his party to grope their way to the station in darkness so great that they could not see each other.

It is not often (and to the credit of the railways of the state) that we are called upon to consider a case of such culpable negligence on the part of a railway company to its passengers as this record discloses. The railway company's negligence was clearly the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. It knew that, in reaching the station from where it had invited him to leave its train, he would have to pass over the cattle guard. His falling into it, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, was one of the probable injurious consequences which were to be anticipated from its negligence; and that fact, and not the number of subsequent events or agencies which intervened, is the legal as well as the practical and common-sense test of whether or not its negligence was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. Standard Oil Co. v. Wakefield, etc., 102 Va. 824, 832-834, 47 S. E. 830, and authorities cited.

The contention that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in not going through the cars between him and the station platform before getting off, or in not hunting up the conductor, who was at the front end of the train, and requesting him to move the train until the rear car reached the platform, so that the passengers in it could get off in safety, is without merit. The plaintiff, as we have seen, was invited to get off where he did; and he cannot be held guilty of negligence for doing what he was asked to do, or for failing to do what is not usual, and what ordinary prudence would not have suggested, and what, if it was necessary or proper for him to do for his safety, the railway company ought to have informed him of when it announced his station and stopped its train.

The judgment of the circuit court is, in our opinion, plainly right, and must be affirmed.

MASTER AND SERVANT—RAILROADS—DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—KNOWLEDGE OF DANGEROUS APPLIANCE—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION—CONSTRUCTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action against a railroad company for the death of a "hostler," injured while riding on a tender in a switchyard, evidence held to justify submission to the jury of the question whether deceased was at his post of duty at the time of the injury.

2. Where a railroad company maintained a building in its switchyard at such distance from the track that a person riding on a step at the side of the tenders ordinarily used in the yard could pass in safety, the use of a tender so large that a person riding as usual would be crushed against the building was negligence.

3. In an action for death by wrongful act, an instruction that plaintiff is entitled to a sum equal to the probable earnings of deceased considering his age, business capacity, experience, habits, health, energy, and perseverance, is correct as to the element of damage referred to.

4. Where a constitutional provision of another state is incorporated in the Constitution of this state, the construction placed upon the provision by the courts of such other state before its adoption here must be adopted in this state.

5. Const. § 162 [Va. Code 1904, p. cclix], and Acts 1901-02, p. 335, c. 322 [Va. Code 1904, p. 707, § 1294k], providing that a railroad employe's knowledge of defects in appliances shall not bar a recovery for injuries caused by such defects, does not do away with the defense of contributory negligence, or render knowledge of defects unimportant in determining the question of contributory negligence, but merely renders knowledge alone insufficient to defeat recovery.

6. Under these provisions the servant's knowledge of defects is to be considered in connection with all the other evidence in determining whether the servant used due care, but, as such knowledge will not alone defeat a recovery, an instruction that the defense of contributory negligence is unaffected by the statutes is too broad.

7. Instructions that defendant is entitled to make the defense of contributory negligence, and defining what constitutes contributory negligence, are sufficient to preserve defendant's right to this defense.

8. Where a railroad employe had ridden on the side of tenders past a building so close to the track that there was barely room for his body, he was not guilty of contributory negligence in trying to ride past on the side of a larger tender, unless he knew it was larger.

9. In an action against a railroad company for the death of a roundhouse "hostler" crushed to death between a building near the track and a tender on which he was riding in the usual way, but which was larger than any tender previously used in the yards, evidence held to justify submission to the jury of the issue of defendant's negligence.

Error from Corporation Court of City of Radford.

Action by the administratrix of W. J. Cheatwood against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. A. Phlegar and John R. Johnson, for plaintiff in error. Longley & Jordan, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. The administratrix of W. J. Cheatwood, deceased, brought this action in the corporation court of the city of Radford, alleging that the death of her intestate was due to negligence of the defendant, the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, and recovered a judgment for $6,250, to which the defendant obtained this writ of error.

Viewed as upon a demurrer to the evidence, the case before us is as follows:

Cheatwood, the deceased, was on the 10th day of July, 1903, and had been for at least 12 years prior, in the employ of the plaintiff in error on its yard at Radford as assistant "hostler." Upon the yard, among other things, were a roundhouse, watertank, sandhouse, and coal wharf. The duties of the deceased, among others, were to assist the hostler in taking engines over the yard, getting coal, water, and sand, and running them back to the roundhouse. In doing this he opened and closed the switches, and gave signals to the hostler for starting and stopping at the proper places. There was no rule of the company prescribing the place where he should ride on the engine, and when the engine was moving forward the usual place occupied by him and other employes performing the same duties was on the step on the right-hand side of the pilot at the front of the engine; and, when moving backward, on a step on the same side of the tender at the rear end, which, when moving backward, was in front, and which positions were the most convenient for the assistant hostler, and the usual position occupied by the assistant hostler for the transaction of his business.

A number of years prior to the accident resulting in the death of Cheatwood, a sandhouse was built on the north side of one of the tracks in the yard, and at a distance from the track which was free from danger to employes riding on the outside of the engines and tenders which were then in use; the plaintiff in error then using tenders holding only 4,000 gallons of water. There were four steps on each tender, one at each corner, all alike, and the steps projected from the sides of the tender to about $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches from the sandhouse when passing it. Afterwards, and perhaps a year or more (just when does not appear) before the accident to Cheatwood, plaintiff in error increased the size of its tenders so that they would hold 5,000 gallons of water, which was accomplished by extending the sides of the tenders until they were flush with the inside of the steps, the steps being $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, but the distance of the steps from the center of the track, and consequently from the sandhouse, was not changed. Later plaintiff in error increased the size of some of its tenders so as to hold 6,000 gallons of water, this being accomplished by again extending the sides until they became flush with the outside of the steps, which still remained $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches from the sandhouse, but practically under the tender, as the outside of the tender was flush with the outer edge of the steps. On the rear end of the tender was a cross-beam $8\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, extending the width of the tender. This was reached by a handhold on the corner of the tender, extending from the sill to within 12 or 14 inches of the top of the tender, and by catching this handhold a person could get up on the steps, and from there could step to the cross-beam, and when standing there could hold by this handhold or to the top of the tender, which was about as high as an ordinary man's head.

Prior to the accident to Cheatwood on July 10, 1903, he and others in the same employment repeatedly rode by the sandhouse on the steps of the engines and tenders then in use on the yard, though, in order to do so, they had to stand very close to the side of the tender, there being, if it was a 5,000-gallon tender, but one or two inches between the body and the sandhouse; and this had been without accident to him or any one, and with full knowledge on the part of plaintiff in error that it was the custom of such employes to so ride on the tenders in performing the duties of assistant hostler. Between the 1st and 10th of July, 1903, a 6,000-gallon tender appeared upon the yard at Radford; just at what time does not appear, but it is certain that Cheatwood was not called on to handle it until the night of the 10th, and on that night engine No. 771, having a 6,000-gallon tank (tender) was taken to the coal wharf, with Cheatwood as assistant hostler. Returning from the wharf, with the tender in front, he was riding upon the step of the tender, where he had been in the habit of riding when performing his duties, the step being under the tender, as stated, differing in this respect only from the tenders formerly run over the yard; and this change made it impossible for a man to pass the sandhouse standing on that step, as the side of the tender was only $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches from the sandhouse. As a necessary consequence, Cheatwood was mashed between the tender and the sandhouse, and received injuries from which he died the next day.

At the trial, and after the introduction of all the evidence, the court, at the instance of the defendant in error (plaintiff below), gave six instructions to the jury, all of which were objected to by plaintiff in error except No. 6; and the plaintiff in error (defendant below) asked for five instructions, to each of which defendant in error objected, and Nos. 1 and 2 were refused, and Nos. 3, 4, and 5 amended. The court also, of its own motion, gave two instructions, to the first of which plaintiff in error excepted; and after this ruling plaintiff in error asked for instructions Nos. 6 and 7, to which no objection was made, and they were also given.

Instructions Nos. 1 and 2, asked by defendant in error, are as follows:

"Instruction No. 1.

"If the jury believe from the evidence that W. J. Cheatwood came to his death by being crushed between the tender of an engine and the sandhouse of the N. & W. Railway Co. located dangerously near the coal wharf track of said railway, if they believe from the evidence it was so located, on its yard at East Radford, and at the time of the injury he was riding on said tender in the course of his employment at his post of duty, and was injured without fault on his part, they must find for the plaintiff, and assess her damages accordingly, although they may believe from the evidence that plaintiff knew of the location of said sandhouse with reference to said track.

"Instruction No. 2.

"The jury are further instructed that it was the duty of the defendant company to use reasonable care to furnish to plaintiff's intestate a reasonably safe place in which to work, and reasonably safe appliances, machinery, ways, and structures; and the knowledge by said intestate, W. J. Cheatwood, of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, appliances, or structures, shall be no defense to an action for an injury caused thereby—such as an injury resulting from a sandhouse being located too near to its railway track when running engines and tenders of the size of engine and tender No. 771, should the jury believe from the evidence that the said sandhouse was located too near the said track, and was for that reason unsafe."

The chief objection urged to No. 1 is that there was no evidence on which to found the second proposition contained therein, to wit, that Cheatwood at the time of his injury was at his post of duty.

We do not think that this is a valid objection to the instruction, as there was abundant evidence, as we shall see when we come review it, tending to show that Cheatwood was at his post of duty, and certainly enough to submit the question to the jury, which is in fact the purport and effect of the instruction. The term in the instruction, "dangerously near the track," was to be considered in the light of the evidence; and, while there was in fact no defect in the construction of the tender or sandhouse, the question submitted to the jury was whether or not the situation had been made dangerous by the enlargement of the tender upon which Cheatwood was riding, known to plaintiff in error, but not to Cheatwood, and when the instruction was read in connection with the other instructions, it was not open to the objections which plaintiff in error makes to it.

It is conceded that the first part of instruction No. 2 correctly defines a master's duty in furnishing appliances and structures. It then states that the servant's knowledge of the defects is no defense to an action for injuries caused thereby, and it is as clearly the purpose of the instruction to tell the jury that it was negligence to run an engine as No. 771 by the sandhouse if they believed from the evidence that the sandhouse was located too near the track, and was for that reason unsafe. Here again the instruction was to be interpreted in the light of the evidence, which tended to show the negligence of plaintiff in error in placing on its yard, to be handled by its employes, an engine of so much larger size than that which Cheatwood and other employes had been in the habit of handling that it rendered the situation unsafe, while without this knowledge of the size of the tender which Cheatwood was called upon to handle on the night of the 10th of July the sandhouse was not dangerously near the track. The evidence was as all-sufficient to justify the giving of the instruction.

The court is further of opinion that there was no error in the giving of the third and fourth instructions asked for by defendant in error, which are as follows:

"Instruction No. 3.

"If the jury believe from the evidence that plaintiff's intestate, in the proper discharge of his duty, was accustomed to ride engines and tenders through the space between the sandhouse and track in question with safety, and that the defendant company, without notice to him, caused him to ride, on the night he was injured, an engine with a tender broader than engines and tenders he had been accustomed to handle, and which increased the danger, and thereby made it unsafe to ride said engine by said sandhouse on him when so riding, and that this was the proximate cause of his death, without fault upon his part, then the jury must find and assess damages for the plaintiff.

"Instruction No. 4.

"If the jury believe from the evidence that for years the switching or assistant hostler, Cheatwood, of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, all the years at Radford, had been safely riding engines and tenders by this sandhouse, moving and headed in the same direction as was the engine and tender on the night of July 10, 1903, W. J. Cheatwood received the injuries which caused his death, and believe from the evidence that said Cheatwood had had no instructions not to ride on the step of the tender when passing said sandhouse, and that he had no instructions where to ride, and that there was no rule of the company applicable to his position in the performance of his duties, and that standing in that position he could most conveniently and with greatest dispatch for said railroad company perform the duties pertaining to his position; and further believe from the evidence that he was at his proper place for the performance of his duties; and without notice to said Cheatwood said company widened some of its tenders so that a man standing in the position on said step at the side of said tender, where said Cheatwood had been accustomed to stand, could not pass said sandhouse without being injured or killed; and that in the due and proper performance of his duties, using ordinary care therein, he attempted to ride said tender by said sandhouse on the night in question, and in doing so received the injuries which caused his death—then they must find for the plaintiff, although they may believe from the evidence he had knowledge of the distance and location of said sandhouse with reference to said track."

Instruction No. 5 given for the defendant in error is as follows:

"Instruction No. 5.

"The jury are instructed that, if they find damages for the plaintiff, in ascertaining such damages they should find the same with reference—First. To the pecuniary loss sustained by Sallie Cheatwood, his wife, and the three children of W. J. Cheatwood by the death of said Cheatwood, fixing the same at such sum as would be equal to the probable earnings of the said Cheatwood, taking into consideration the age, business capacity, experience, habits, health, energy and perseverance of the deceased, during what would probably have been his lifetime if he had not been killed. Second. In ascertaining the probability of life the jury have the right to determine the same with reference to recognized scientific tables relating to the expectation of human life. Third. By adding thereto compensation for the loss of his care, attention, and society to his wife and children. Fourth. By adding such further sum as they may deem fair and just by way of solace and comfort to said wife and children for the sorrow, suffering, and mental anguish occasioned to them by his death."

The instruction is in a form which has been repeatedly passed upon by this court, as is conceded by plaintiff in error, and the objection made to it is that it told the jury that they should give the probable earnings of the deceased during what would have probably been his lifetime but for the accident, and states as the rule that they should find, as the capital to be invested, all that a man would probably earn in a lifetime, without deducting for his expenditures, and with only guesswork as to his health. The instruction is practically the same as an instruction approved by this court in B. & O. R. Co. v. Weightman's Adm'r, 29 Grat. 431, 26 Am. Rep. 384, and again sanctioned in B. & O. R. Co. v. Noel, 32 Grat. 394, and Portsmouth St. R. Co. v. Peed's Adm'r, 102 Va. 602, 47 S. E. 850; and in addition to this sanction of the instruction we do not feel warranted in holding that it was not a proper instruction when it is not claimed in this case that the verdict found by the jury is excessive.

This brings us to a consideration of the instructions of plaintiff in error refused by the trial court, or modified, and given as modified.

Instruction No. 1 involves a construction of section 162 of the Constitution of Virginia [Va. Code 1904, p. cclix] and the act of Assembly approved March 27, 1902 (Acts 1901-02, p. 335, c. 322 [Va. Code 1904, p. 707, § 1294k]), which provide that "knowledge by any railroad employee injured of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, appliances or structures shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby." Instruction No. 1 was to the effect that nothing contained in this constitutional provision or in the act of Assembly prevented plaintiff in error from making the defense of contributory negligence in the same manner and to the same effect as it could have done if such section and act had not been adopted; and, if Cheatwood's death was caused by his own neglect, they must find for the defendant.

This provision of the Constitution was taken verbatim from the Constitution of the state of Mississippi, and when adopted by our late constitutional convention it had been construed by the Supreme Court of Mississippi in the case of Buckner v. R. & D. R. R. Co., 72 Miss. 873, 18 South. 449, in which case a servant was injured by defective machinery and his contributory negligence. It was in that case claimed that the Constitution of Mississippi abrogated the defense of contributory negligence, but the court held otherwise, and, after quoting the constitutional provision, said: "The effect of this is not to destroy the defense of contributory negligence by a railroad company, but merely to abrogate the previously existing rule that knowledge by an employé of the defective or unsafe character or condition of the machinery, ways, or appliances shall not, of itself, bar a recovery. The law was that knowledge by an employé of defective appliances which he voluntarily used precluded his recovery for an injury thus received. The Constitution destroys that rule, and the mere fact that the employé knew of the defect is not a bar to recovery; but knowledge by an employé of defects is still an element or factor, and a very important one, in determining whether, with the knowledge he had, he used that degree of caution required in his situation with reference to the appliances causing his injury. The Constitution did not have the effect to free employées of railroad companies from the exercise of ordinary caution and prudence. It does not license recklessness or carelessness by them, and give them a claim to compensation for injuries thus suffered. They, like others not employées, must not be guilty of contributory negligence, if they would secure a right of action for injuries."

Under the rule laid down by this court in N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Old Dominion Baggage Co., 99 Va. 111, 37 S. E. 784, 50 L. R. A. 722, the construction placed on that clause in our Constitution by the Mississippi court must be adopted by this court.

Practically the same words occur in the Constitution of South Carolina, which were construed by the Supreme Court of that state in Bodie v. C. & W. O. Ry. Co., 39 S. E. 715, and Carson v. Southern Ry. Co., 46 S. E. 525. In the first named of these cases, the court expressly recognized that contributory negligence was a good defense notwithstanding the constitutional provision; and as to the second case it is sufficient to say that it can have no bearing here, as it was not rendered until after the adoption of our present Constitution.

We are of opinion that, independently of the rule laid down in N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Old Dom. Baggage Co., supra, the construction put upon the language of the constitutional provision under consideration by the Supreme Court of Mississippi is a correct construction.

But we are further of opinion that the instruction No. 1 asked for by plaintiff in error was properly refused. In addition to the fact that there were other instructions given which clearly stated to the jury that the plaintiff in error had the right to rely upon the defense of contributory negligence, instruction No. 1, refused, was too broad, and was therefore calculated to confuse and mislead the jury.

While the right to make the defense of contributory negligence is not abrogated by the constitutional provision and the statute under consideration, the defense cannot rest alone upon the knowledge of an injured employé of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, appliances, or structures which may have been instrumental in causing the injury for which he sues, but such knowledge is rightly to be considered by the jury along with all the evidence in the case in determining whether the employee injured used that caution required in the situation he was placed in when the injury was received. Before the adoption of the constitutional provision and the statute, knowledge by any employee of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, appliances, or structures which were instrumental in causing the injury sued for, upon the doctrine of assumed risk based on knowledge, actual or imputed, arising from the contract between the parties, the law implied that the servant assumed the risk of all danger of which he had knowledge, or by the use of proper diligence would have had knowledge, and therefore did not permit a recovery for an injury arising from defective machinery, ways, appliances, etc., where the defect was known to him. But not so now. The difference between assumed risk, actual or imputed, and contributory negligence arising from matters ex delicto, and consisting of wrongdoing, has been aptly expressed as "using a known defective appliance carefully and using a good appliance carelessly." An interesting and an exhaustive discussion of the cases on this subject, both where the distinction was made and where it was lost sight of, may be found in the case of St. Louis Cordage Co. v. Miller, 126 Fed. 495, 61 C. C. A. 477, 63 L. R. A. 551, and they are also fully discussed in Bodie v. R. R., supra. So, as we have said, an instruction which tells the jury that the defense of contributory negligence could be made in the same manner and with the same effect as if the constitutional provision and act under consideration had never been adopted, which is, in effect, to say that the defense is unaffected, is too broad, and therefore well calculated to confuse and mislead the jury.

In the case at bar the court, at the instance of the plaintiff in error, by instructions Nos. 6 and 7, told the jury that plaintiff in error had the right to make the defense of contributory negligence, although they might believe from the evidence that the location and construction of the sandhouse and tender rendered the place defective and dangerous, and that a party is guilty of contributory negligence when he does something he ought not to have done, or omits to take some precaution which he ought to have taken under the circumstances. These instructions fully preserved to plaintiff in error the right to make the defense of contributory negligence.

Plaintiff in error's instruction No. 2, refused, was as follows:

"The defendant company was not bound to move the structures on the side of its tracks merely because it widened its engines or tenders, so long as there was space for them to pass in safety, and reasonable means existed or were provided for its employees to pass such structures in safety while performing their duties, although it may have been more inconvenient for them to use such means as they did use before the widening of the engines or tenders."

The fatal objection to this instruction is that in directing the jury to consider whether the plaintiff in error had provided other safe places where Cheatwood might have in safety ridden upon the engine on the occasion of the accident to him, it ignored all consideration of the question whether such other safe places were known to Cheatwood. Cheatwood could not be held guilty of knowingly riding in an unsafe place instead of in a safe place provided for him by his employer, unless conscious at the time of the danger of the position he was taking and of the safe position provided for him; and where that is the situation the rule of law laid down in 2 Thomp. on Neg. 1059, C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Sparrow's Adm'r, 98 Va. 644, 37 S. E. 202, Street's Adm'r v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 101 Va. 746, 45 S. E. 284, that where there are two ways to do a thing, one dangerous and the other safe, both open to the servant, it is his duty to use the safe way, although it is not as convenient as the other way—and which rule is invoked by plaintiff in error—has no application.

Plaintiff in error's instructions Nos. 3 and 4, as presented, told the jury that the fact (if it was proved) that Cheatwood had ridden safely on the steps of tenders through a space so narrow they could barely pass through, and of which he had been warned because of the danger, did not justify him in assuming that he could do so on another tender, which was larger, and of different construction; but they fail to preserve for the consideration of the jury the question whether or not Cheatwood knew that the tender in question was larger and different, or could, by ordinary care, have known it. This fatal defect in the instructions was obviated by the amendments thereto made by the court, which were entirely proper.

These instructions Nos. 3 and 4, as amended by the court (the amendments appearing in italics) are as follows:

"No. 3.

"The jury are instructed, if they believe from the evidence that William Cheatwood had ridden safely by the sandhouse while standing on the steps of the tenders of smaller size and different construction from the one on which he was riding when injured, and believe that on the smaller tenders there was barely sufficient room for him to pass by being careful to stand close to the side of the tender and that he had been warned that it was dangerous for him to do so, the fact that he had so ridden did not justify or excuse him for undertaking to ride by the sandhouse on the step of a larger tender of different construction, if he knew that it was larger; and if they believe that he attempted to do so and was killed in such attempt they must find for the defendant."

"No. 4.

"A person who has been accustomed to ride through a narrow place when there is just enough room for him to get through on tenders or engines which he was accustomed to cannot attempt to ride through the same space upon a new and different engine or tender of different construction, on the supposition that it is no wider than those he has been using, and throw the loss on his employer in case he is injured by reason of its being wider, unless he knew it was wider and different, or by reasonable and ordinary care might have known of it; and if the jury believe that William Cheatwood made such attempt, and was killed while doing so, they must find for the defendant; and this rule is not changed although they may believe that he did so because he was not thinking what he was doing."

The court also very properly amended plaintiff in error's instruction No. 5 in the same respect, and this instruction, as amended, is as follows:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that there were places on the engine or tender provided for that purpose, known to him, where William Cheatwood could have stood and performed his duties in safety, and believe that he had been warned against riding on the tender next to the sandhouse because it was dangerous to do so, and that he was killed while attempting to ride by the sandhouse on a tender, they must find for the defendant, although the position taken by him was the most convenient one."

The instructions given by the court, ex mero motu, are as follows:

Court's Instruction No. 1.

"The court instructs the jury that knowledge by any railroad employé injured of any defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, appliances, or structures shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby; and if the jury believe from the evidence that Cheatwood was so injured by reason of the unsafe condition or character of defendant company's appliances and structures, viz., that the sandhouse in question was situated dangerously near the track, and was thereby rendered unsafe to the plaintiff in the performance of his duties as assistant hostler, and if they believe that deceased, Cheatwood, was attending to his accustomed duties, using ordinary care therein, at the time he received the injury which caused his death, they must find for the plaintiff, notwithstanding they may believe from the evidence that he had knowledge of said unsafe condition or character of the sandhouse."

Court's Instruction No. 2.

"The court instructs the jury that these instructions are to be read together, and construed in the light of each other."

The instructions in the case have been set out above, and the court is of opinion that they fully and fairly presented the legal propositions contended for by the counsel on each side.

This brings us to the consideration of the remaining assignment of error, which is the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict and award a new trial on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence.

The defendant in error rested her claim for a recovery of damages upon the grounds (1) that Cheatwood was without fault; (2) that he was at his post of duty, in the only position he could assume to properly and expeditiously perform his duties; (3) that the master knew the place he occupied; (4) that he had safely occupied it for 12 years; (5) that the position on the step of a tender was absolutely safe until the 6,000-gallon tenders were put on; and (6) that he had no notice of the danger or of the change in the size of the tenders.

On the other hand, it was contended by plaintiff in error: (1) that there was no defect or unsafe condition in its tender, sandhouse, or track; that each and all, severally and collectively, were reasonably safe for the performance of all requirements of Cheatwood, if he had made a reasonably and ordinarily careful use of them. (2) That neither his instructions nor duty required him to ride on the step where he was killed, as the selection of the step as his riding place was his own choice. (3) That he had been warned not to occupy that position because it was dangerous; that the warning showed that it was unnecessary to be on the step at that place; and that, independently of the warning, his observation must have shown him the danger. And (4) that, with knowledge of the danger in riding on tenders he was accustomed to, he increased the risk by riding a tender of different construction, without attempting to ascertain whether or not it increased the danger, and was killed because the danger of doing so was materially increased.

With the very full statement of the case made at the outset of this opinion, it is unnecessary to go very fully into a review of the evidence. It unmistakably appears—and by this the negligence of the plaintiff in error is fully established—that the company had no rule specifying where the assistant hostler should ride on its engines when performing the duties performed by Cheatwood on the occasion of his injuries; that it was known to plaintiff in error that Cheatwood and others doing a like service were riding on the engines in use on its yard at Radford in the manner and at the places stated above; that in riding upon the engines in use prior to the day of this accident there was barely room for the assistant hostler to ride upon the step of a tender in safety by the sandhouse situated near the track; that with full knowledge of these facts a 6,000-gallon tender was brought upon the yard in the nighttime, and Cheatwood was called upon to handle it as he had handled other engines, without any notice whatever to him of the change in the size of the tender, and without any opportunity on his part to have known this fact. The engineer who was running the engine to which this 6,000-gallon tank was annexed testifies that he did not know that he had a larger tank until after Cheatwood had been injured; that it would have required a very close inspection to have discovered the change which had been made; and, in effect, it was impossible for Cheatwood, in the nighttime, and under the circumstances, to have known of the increase in the size of the tender and the necessarily increased danger brought to him by the change of tenders. Upon the question whether or not Cheatwood was at his post of duty, the evidence, briefly stated, is as follows: That it was his duty to adjust the switches for the hostler, the hostler being the man in charge of the engine; that he was at the place most convenient for him and the engineer; that he was, at the time of the accident, at the post that he and other assistant hostlers had been assuming to perform their duties, which was on the steps at both ends—on the head when going west, and on the tank or tender coming east, backing; that Cheatwood had for 12 years been performing this duty, passing by the sandhouse upon the engines or tenders for 12 years without injury; that the post he occupied was where he could best discharge the duty immediately in hand, with due regard to his own safety and the business of the company. Three witnesses, experienced in the work on the yard at Radford, all of them employes of the plaintiff in error, and one of them (McGee) who was running the engine No. 771 on the occasion of this accident, testify that the duties performed by Cheatwood could best be done when backing with the tender in front, by standing on the step of the tender on the side of the engineer. In answer to the question, "Was there another place on this tender provided for him to ride, that you know of?" one of the three witnesses referred to answered: "No, sir; not that I know of. I never saw any one ride anywhere else except on the tender. Q. Except on the tender, you mean? A. Yes, sir." This witness, who states that he had been on that yard for 13 years, was asked if the place occupied by Cheatwood on the occasion of this accident to him was the best place for him to perform his duties, and answered, "Yes, sir; according to my judgment." Another of the three witnesses referred to was asked, "In the proper performance of his duties, due regard being had to facilitating the business of the company as well as to the safety of the man to discharge those duties, where was the best place for a man to stand to perform them—I mean as assistant hostler?" to which he answered: "Well, both for his own advantage and that of the man he was working with, it was best to stand on the step. It was in a manner to push the business along, and as much to their interest (meaning the company) as to that of the man." The same witness states: "That was the post they had been assuming to perform that duty; that was on the step at both ends—on the head when going west, and on the tank coming east backing."

According to these and other witnesses, to sum up, the following facts appear: (1) That the position occupied by the deceased, Cheatwood, was the necessary, usual, and proper position occupied by the assistant hostler; (2) that he could, in that position, best perform the duties required of him by the master; (3) that employes always rode in that position, unless it was storming; (4) that he could not properly attend to his duties in any other position which was as safe as that one; (5) that the position occupied by him was well known to the master; (6) that he had safely ridden in that position for from 12 to 20 years on all tenders known or handled by him prior to the 10th of July, 1903, when he received his fatal injuries; (7) that it was the first time an engine with a tender of that size, and headed as that one was, was taken by Cheatwood, the deceased, to the coal wharf by the sandhouse; (8) that Cheatwood was called to assist with this engine in the nighttime, and that he did not know, nor by the exercise of ordinary care could he have known, that he was handling an engine with a tender larger than those he was accustomed to riding; (9) that he was given no notice of the change in the size of the tender, or the altered condition of the ways; (10) that he had no instructions as to the position he should occupy on a tender and engine; (11) that on the tender upon which he was sent on the night of July 10th a man standing in the position he was accustomed to occupy could not, with ever so great care, possibly pass by the sandhouse without receiving fatal injuries; (12) that it was difficult to get upon the end sill at the end of the tender, that when there it was a dangerous position, more so than that on the step, and difficult to maintain, and that one in that position could not well perform the duties required of him; and (13) that the steps were the safer place for him to occupy as compared with the sill at the end of the tender, where it is claimed that he could have ridden with greater safety; in fact, until the introduction on the night of July 10th, for the first time, of the 6,000-gallon tender, the step upon which Cheatwood was riding was a perfectly safe place.

The situation, then, was this: The plaintiff in error had no rules prescribing where its servants should ride on its engines and tenders when performing the duties of an assistant hostler on the yard at Radford. It knew that its servants performing these duties had for years been in the habit of riding upon the engines and tenders run over the yard in the manner and places heretofore stated. It knew that it was impossible for an assistant hostler to ride upon the step of a 6,000-gallon tender, running backwards, over the yard, by the sandhouse situated near the track over which the engine and tender must necessarily pass, without certain injury or death to the assistant hostler; yet it permitted a tender of that size to be run over the yard in the nighttime on July 10, 1903, without any warning to those whose duty it was to handle it, and in consequence of this negligence on its part Cheatwood received injuries resulting in his death. Bearing in mind, as is conceded in the argument here, that the evidence does not show that Cheatwood and others repeatedly rode past the sandhouse on the steps of 5,000-gallon tenders, and in fact does not show that Cheatwood ever rode on the step of a tender of that size by the sandhouse, can it be said, in the face of the testimony of the hostler in charge of engine No. 771 on the night of July 10th, and with whom Cheatwood had worked for five years preceding, to the effect that it would have taken very close inspection to have discovered the fact that the tender attached to the engine on that occasion was larger than those formerly handled on the yard, that Cheatwood knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence could have known, that it was a larger tender than those he had formerly been handling, and that he could not with safety ride on its steps by the sandhouse, when in fact the hostler himself did not know the tender was larger until after Cheatwood had been mashed at the sandhouse? We think, as did the jury, that the question must be answered in the negative.

"No servant is presumptively chargeable with notice of a peculiar and unusual state of things. Reasonable time must be allowed to a new servant to become acquainted with his surroundings, and to an old servant to learn of changes in the situation. Servants are presumed to be aware of defects which are perfectly obvious to their sight, and the danger of which is obvious to any person of their mental capacity. But, to charge them with notice on this ground, the defect and danger must be unquestionably plain and clear, so that, if they did not see it, they must necessarily have been in fault." 1 Shearman & Red. on Neg. § 216.

The warning which it is claimed that Cheatwood had consisted merely in McGee, the hostler with whom he was working, saying to Cheatwood, "maybe a year or two before he was killed: * * * 'If I was in your place, I would not ride the tanks through there,' and I told him I thought it was dangerous." In view of the fact that it does not appear when these remarks were made to Cheatwood, and that the same witness (McGee), as well as others, testify that they never saw Cheatwood ride a 5,000-gallon tank by the sandhouse, but knew that he, as well as others, had been riding the smaller tanks by there regularly for years previous, no importance is to be attached to this so-called "warning." Nor do we concur in the view of counsel for plaintiff in error that the answer to the question asked Cheatwood the morning after his injuries, "Why on earth did you ride that big engine through there?" to which Cheatwood replied, "I don't know why; I had been riding those hogs; wasn't thinking what I was doing"—should be taken as an admission by Cheatwood that he knew that the tender which he was called upon to handle on the night of July 10th was larger than the tenders that he had theretofore been handling on the yard. When saying, "I had been riding those hogs," he must have had reference to the 4,000-gallon tenders upon which he had ridden with safety for a great number of years previous, as neither of the witnesses who testified on this point, and who were employes on the yard with Cheatwood, could say that they ever saw him ride on the steps of a 5,000-gallon tender by the sandhouse. Nor can any importance whatever, as it seems to us, be attached, under all the circumstances, to that part of Cheatwood's answer to the same witness, viz., "I wasn't thinking what I was doing."

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the judgment of the corporation court of Radford should be affirmed.

RICHMOND, F. & P. R. CO. v. JOHNSTON
et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 12, 1905.)

HIGHWAYS—POWER TO CONDEMN RAILROAD PROPERTY.

1. The general power to condemn land, conferred by Code 1887, §§ 1095, 1096, which authorizes the crossing of railroad tracks by a highway, is insufficient to authorize the condemnation for highway purposes of property purchased and used by a railroad company for station grounds and yards.

Error from Circuit Court, Henrico County.

Condemnation proceedings by one Johnston and others against the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company. From a judgment for petitioners, defendant brings error. Reversed.

Leake & Carter, for plaintiff in error.
Sands & Sands, for defendants in error.

KEITH, P. The Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company and the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company operate lines of railroad from the city of Richmond, in a northerly direction, into and beyond the county of Henrico. A short distance beyond the city limits a public thoroughfare was constructed between the two roads, and it became desirable, with a view to its extension, to cross the tracks of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad. This company had purchased a parcel of ground from Lewis Ginter, containing about nine acres, for which it paid the sum of $6,714.75, and received a deed dated November, 1891, which was admitted to record on the 1st day of February, 1892. This plat of ground is 120 feet in width and 3,250 feet in length, and is adjacent to the original right of way upon which the principal tracks of the railroad company are laid, and the purpose was to lay down upon it switches and other conveniences for the storing of cars and making up and shifting of trains.

Johnston, Beattie, and others filed their petition in the county court of Henrico county in September, 1900, asking the appointment of a commission to open a road "from the termination of Laburnum avenue, in Brookland township, at its intersection with the R. F. & P. Railroad, just west of Acca, also located in said magisterial district." It is stated in the petition that the road has become a necessity to the petitioners and to the public generally, in view of the fact that the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad has blocked up a private road which had been used by the public generally for a long period of years as a convenient outlet between the travel of Broad street road and the Hermitage and Brook roads and the section of the county lying between the same.

As a result of the litigation following upon the filing of this petition, such proceedings were had that on the 21st day of September, 1901, the county court of Henrico entered an order opening the road, and fixing $125 as the compensation to be paid the railroad company. This order was affirmed by the circuit court, and is now before us for review upon a writ of error to that court.

It satisfactorily appears that the railroad company purchased this land for the object stated, in good faith, and without notice of any rights attaching to it upon the part of the defendants in error.

Two questions are presented for decision, the first, as to the propriety of the condemnation of the railroad property under the circumstances disclosed in this record, and, secondly, as to the adequacy of the compensation awarded.

Section 1095 of the Code of 1887 provides that: "Every railroad hereafter constructed across a county road, street or other highway; and every county road, street, or other highway hereafter constructed across a railroad shall, as far as practicable, pass at surface grade, or pass beneath or above any existing structure at a sufficient depression or elevation, as the case may be, with easy grades, so as to admit of safe and speedy travel over each."

Section 1096: "At every existing crossing such as is mentioned in the preceding section, the grade of the work last constructed, to the full width of the railroad land, shall be made sufficiently smooth and level to admit of safe and speedy travel over such crossing. Where such improvement is to be made in a railroad, it shall be made by the corporation, company, or person operating the same. Where it is to be made in a county road, street, or other highway, it shall be made by the authorities having the control of such county road, street, or other highway and charged with the duty of keeping the same in order."

Acting under the authority conferred by these sections, the county authorities of Henrico seek to construct a public thoroughfare across the land of the railroad company, purchased for and devoted to the uses of a railroad yard, through which numerous trains engaged in freight and passenger traffic are passing, and in which engines are to be constantly employed in shifting cars and in making up trains. Under such conditions it would be well-nigh impossible to construct a crossing at surface grade so as to admit of safe and speedy travel, and it was therefore urged with much force that this consideration alone should defeat the petition for opening the road, as being inconsistent with proper regard for the safety of the traveling public, whether upon the proposed highway or along the railroad tracks.

We shall not, however, rest the decision of the case upon that point. We do not question the power of the state, in the exercise of its right of eminent domain, to condemn land already condemned and appropriated to a public use. The general statute which we have quoted is ample authority for crossing a railway with a public highway, or a public highway with a railway, the safety of the public being carefully protected. But the better opinion seems to be that a general power of condemnation, such as is found in sections 1095 and 1096 of the Code of 1887, which authorizes the crossing of the tracks of a railway company by a highway, or of a highway by the tracks of a railway company, is insufficient to authorize the condemnation of property purchased and used by a railroad company for depots, stations, and railroad yards. The power to condemn any and all such property is recognized, but the authorities seem uniformly to hold that it must be exercised in obedience to a statute which specifically authorizes its condemnation, and that general language, such as is used in the sections we have quoted, is insufficient to that end.

In Lewis on Eminent Domain (2d Ed.) § 266, it is said: "A general authority to lay out highways and streets is sufficient to authorize a lay-out across the right of way of a railroad. It makes no difference that the railroad company owns its right of way in fee. An authority to lay out a highway across the track of a railroad company is authority to cross all the tracks at any place. But under a general authority to lay out highways, a part of the right of way of a railroad cannot be taken longitudinally, nor can the way be laid through depot buildings, and grounds, shops, and the like, which are devoted to special uses in connection with the road, and necessary to its operation and in constant use in connection therewith, and which would be materially impaired or destroyed by the taking. But the rule must receive a reasonable application, and a slight interference with the platform of a depot will not prevent the establishment of a highway."

In Elliott on Roads and Streets (2d Ed.) at section 218, it is said: "The power to take property for public use is not restricted to property upon which the right has not been exercised, but it extends to property previously appropriated. Land which has been seized for one public purpose may be taken for another whenever the public necessity requires. A street may be laid upon a turnpike or on a railroad, or a canal may be seized for that purpose. The Legislature has supreme power over the subject, limited only by the constitutional provisions, and, when it exercises this authority, the presumption is that the former use has become less beneficial to the public, and that the necessity of the public demands the appropriation of the property to the new use."

Section 219: "The right of eminent domain is a dominant legislative power, only called into exercise by the enactment of a valid statute, and, when a party asserts a right to seize land previously appropriated to a public use, he must sustain his claim by producing a statute clearly conferring the asserted authority. It will not be presumed, in the absence of such a statute, that the Legislature intended to again seize property which had been once appropriated. The authority to take property seized and appropriated to another public use may be implied from the language of the statute, but this can only be so where the words employed and the evident intent of the statute make it clearly the duty of the courts to give force to the implication. The intent of the Legislature to destroy the rights granted by former statutes must unequivocally appear. A grant of authority to appropriate land seized under former statutes, or previously seized for public use, cannot ordinarily be inferred from a mere general grant. The general rule is that if the two uses are not inconsistent, and both may stand together without material impairment of the first, authority for the second use may be implied from a general grant; but if they cannot co-exist without material impairment of the first, authority to take for the second cannot be implied from a mere general grant of authority to condemn."

See, also, Dillon on Mun. Corp. § 688.

In this case it seems to be plain that the uses are inconsistent, and that they cannot stand together without a material impairment of the rights of the railroad company. The trains engaged in the transportation of passengers and freight over a great through line are of themselves so numerous as to render a crossing at grade extremely perilous. It is a matter of common knowledge that grade crossings are the cause of a large portion of the accidents which put life and property in jeopardy. How much more dangerous would be the passage along a broad thoroughfare or boulevard intended especially as a pleasure drive, which crosses at grade not only the ordinary business tracks of the railroad, but the numerous switches covering the yard of a railroad company used for storing and shifting its cars and making up its trains? It does not require the testimony of expert witnesses, for it is a matter of common knowledge that the use of the thoroughfare and of the railroad under such conditions would each be attended with constant and inevitable danger.

In Prospect Park & Coney Island R. R. Co. v. Williamson, 91 N. Y. 552, it is said: "Lands once taken for a public use, pursuant to law, under the right of eminent domain, cannot, under general laws, and without special authority from the Legislature, be appropriated by proceedings in invitum to a different public use."

Where a railroad corporation, by proceedings under the general railroad law, acquired title to lands belonging to a town for depot purposes, in which proceedings the town appeared and contested, putting in issue the necessity of the taking of all the lands sought to be condemned, it was held that it was not open for the officials of the town to question collaterally the propriety of the condemnation, and they could not, without special legislative authority, appropriate a portion of the land so taken for a public highway.

To the same effect, see Matter of City of Buffalo, 68 N. Y. 167, where Justice Folger says: "The Legislature may interfere with property held by a corporation for one public use and apply it to another, and may delegate the power so to do to another corporation, but such delegation must be in express terms, or must arise from necessary implication." In re Boston & Albany R. Co., 53 N. Y. 574; Boston Water Power Co. v. Boston & Worcester R. Co., 23 Pick. 360.

In Boston & Albany R. Co. v. President & Trustees of Village of Greenbush, 52 N. Y. 510, almost the identical question under consideration was decided. That eminent judge, Chief Justice Church, delivered the opinion of the court, in which it was held that the provision of the act regulating the construction of roads and streets across railroad tracks, which authorizes the laying out of streets and highways across the track of any railroad without compensation, etc., has reference only to tracks used for public traffic, and for turn-outs and switches, and that the term "track" therein used does not include grounds upon which tracks are laid for storing cars or exclusively for making up trains.

In Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry. Co. v. City of Faribault, 23 Minn. 167, it is held that, under a general power to lay out and open streets in a city, the city council has no authority to lay out and open a street through the depot grounds of a railroad company in such manner as to destroy or essentially impair the value of the company's easement therein, theretofore acquired under and in pursuance of an express legislative grant for that purpose. See, also, Wellington, and Others, Petitioners, 16 Pick. 89, 26 Am. Dec. 631.

In St. Paul Depot Co. v. City of St. Paul, 30 Minn. 350, 15 N. W. 684, it was held that the land, having been set apart for a specific public use, cannot be devoted to another public purpose except the power be expressly conferred by legislative grant or arises from a necessary implication. And there can ordinarily be no necessary implication of the existence of such authority when the public necessity for the specific appropriation of the particular tract is not made to appear, and where the general power may be beneficially exercised without such taking, or where the two public uses are necessarily inconsistent; and that, when the land appropriated by such corporation is lawfully acquired pursuant to its charter, and is actually used and needed for a public purpose authorized thereby, it is not material that it was acquired by purchase instead of by regular condemnation proceedings. Rochester Water Commissioners, 66 N. Y. 413; Yates v. Van de Bogert, 56 N. Y. 526.

The language employed in the sections of the Code relied upon as conferring authority to condemn the property in controversy is of a most general description. They obviously contemplate the crossing of tracks devoted to railway traffic, and not to property which railroads may lawfully, and must of necessity, acquire, such as depots, warehouses, yards for the shifting and making up of trains, and other like purposes incident to their duties. We repeat that we do not question the power of the Legislature to authorize the condemnation of the property in question for the purposes set forth in this record, but we are of opinion that no such power now exists, either by the express authority of the Legislature, or by necessary implication from any general power of condemnation for the construction of highways, and we think it may with much propriety be left with the Legislature to say whether or not Laburnum avenue should be permitted to cross the tracks and yard of the plaintiff in error at the point indicated, and, if so, under what limitations, restrictions, and conditions, in order that the public safety and convenience in the use of the avenue and of the railroad may be guarded and protected.

Having reached the conclusion that there was no power to condemn in the case before us, it is, of course, unnecessary to discuss the question of compensation.

The judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and the case remanded.

WARNER MOORE & CO. v. WESTERN ASSUR. CO.

REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENT—INSURANCE POLICY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. Evidence in a suit to reform a policy of insurance on a stock of goods, which described the goods as being in a building other than where situated, considered, and held sufficient to show that the error was made by mutual mistake, and to require reformation of the policy.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Bill in equity by Warner Moore & Co. against the Western Assurance Company. From a decree for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Shelton & Moore, for appellant. Wm. Ellyson and A. L. Holaday, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. This appeal is from a decree of the chancery court of the city of Richmond denying the relief sought in a bill filed by appellants against appellee to reform and enforce a certain fire insurance policy, issued on the 15th day of December, 1901, by appellee, through its agents, Julius Straus & Son, to appellants, insuring to the amount of $1,000 certain personal property mentioned and described in the policy, so that the policy would carry out and conform, and be paid according to, the true contract and intention of appellants and their agents, J. B. Moore & Co., on the one part, and the appellee and its agents aforesaid, on the other part; it being alleged that at the time of the execution of the policy a mutual mistake was made in describing the building in which the property insured was situated.

It appears that appellants owned considerable property in the city of Richmond, both real and personal, requiring them to take out a large amount of insurance for protection against fire, from time to time. Among those owned by them are three buildings adjoining each other, situated on the south side of Richmond Dock, near the foot of Seventeenth street, and running back towards James river. These buildings are generally described as the "easternmost," the "middle," and the "westernmost." Each of the buildings has a separate insurance rating, both upon themselves and stock contained in them, and has each its own peculiar and different description; all insurance policies using practically the same descriptive language.

It appears that appellants had a policy of insurance on the easternmost or corner building, as we shall call it in this opinion, with the Virginia Fire & Marine Insurance Company, for $1,000, and a like policy issued by the same company upon the contents of the building, each to expire on the 15th day of December, 1901, which policies the Virginia Fire & Marine Insurance Company refused to renew, whereupon appellants, through J. B. Moore & Co., their agents, applied to Julius Straus & Son, insurance agents, of the city of Richmond, on the 13th day of December, 1901, for policies of insurance to take the place of those which the Virginia Fire & Marine Insurance Company declined to renew; the one being, as above stated, for $1,000 on the corner building at the foot of Seventeenth street, and the other on the contents of that building. Upon this application being made, Milton J. Straus, one of the firm of Julius Straus & Son, called at the office of J. B. Moore & Co., and inquired whether the insurance applied for was intended to cover the old sumac mill or warehouse—that is, the middle building—stating that, if so, the Western Assurance Company (appellee) would not furnish the insurance, as it had already declined to do so; and upon being informed by J. B. Moore & Co. that it was not the middle building, wherein the sumac mill had formerly run, but the corner building, Straus took the typewritten slips which had been left with his firm when application for insurance was made, back to his office, and issued the two policies hereinbefore mentioned—the one on the corner building, and the other on personal property; but in the policy here in question (No. 1,864,265), the policy on the personalty, the same is described as being located in “a brick and iron building,” etc., which description applied only to the middle building, spoken of also in the record as the sumac mill or warehouse. The typewritten slips spoken of were made out by J. B. Moore & Co.’s clerk, and left at the office of Julius Straus & Son by him, and in these slips the error was begun in describing the location of the personal property, that is, the stock intended to be insured.

Upon issuing the policy upon the stock, etc., Straus made an entry on an insurance map which he kept in his office to the effect that the property insured was located in the middle or sumac warehouse building.

On December 31, 1901, the corner building was burned, as was also the stock therein, and appellee’s agents, Straus & Son, reported both losses to appellee, and the insurance on the building was promptly paid; but payment of the insurance on the stock was denied upon the ground solely that the policy described the location of the property insured as being in the “brick and iron building,” which description applied to the “middle building,” where there had been no loss.

The law applicable to the controversy here is too well settled to admit of discussion. In fact, there is practically no contention between counsel as to the law of the case, viz., that, while a court of equity has jurisdiction to reform and enforce contracts of insurance on the ground of fraud or mistake, relief will not be granted in any case except where there is a plain mistake, clearly made out by satisfactory and unquestionable proof, or the fraud relied on is established by the same degree of proof. Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Dunlap, 86 Va. 346, 10 S. E. 239, and authorities there cited.

There is no question of fraud presented in the case under consideration, but purely a question of fact, namely, whether or not, at the time the policy in question was issued, J. B. Moore & Co., agents for appellants, and Straus & Son, agents for appellee, understood and intended that the policy should cover the stock situated in the corner building, which was destroyed by fire on December 31, 1901.

That this was the intention of J. B. Moore & Co. is not at all questioned, and therefore a consideration of the evidence only requires that we ascertain whether or not Straus & Son understood that they were to insure the stock in that building, and intended to do so when they issued the policy.

As has been observed, the corner building and its stock had been previously insured in the Virginia Fire & Marine Insurance Company by two separate policies, of \$1,000 each—one on the stock, and the other on the building. That these policies expired on the 15th day of December, 1901, and in both of them this building was described as “the two-story brick, tin roof building situated on the south side of Richmond dock, corner 17th Street, used as a warehouse.” Straus & Son were informed of these facts, and of the further fact that the policies desired by J. B. Moore & Co. on December 18th were to take the place of the two policies in the Virginia Fire & Marine Insurance Company, which that company had declined to renew. It further clearly appears that on that day the location of the building (that is, the corner building, upon which the policies desired were to be placed, the one on the building and the other on its contents) was explained to Milton Straus, who called at the office of J. B. Moore & Co. to ascertain definitely the location of the property upon which insurance was desired, and, in making the explanation, reference was made to what is known among insurance people as the “City Insurance Map.” At this interview between Milton Straus and J. B. Moore, the rates of insurance were fully discussed; and it appears that there was a book or tariff of rates governing insurance in the city of Richmond, in which every insured building was rated. Straus & Son are shown to be about the best informed insurance agents in the city of Richmond. The book or tariff of rates shows that the rate on this corner building was $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; that the rate on the contents or stock was 1.60 per cent.; while the rate on the middle or sumac building prior to the removal of the sumac mill was 2.50 per cent. and subsequent to its removal, and at the time of the writing of the two policies hereinbefore spoken of, it was 1.50 per cent. The rate charged upon the policy here in question was 1.60 per cent.; thus showing that Straus understood the location of the building, and that the stock, etc., to be insured, was in that building, and fixed the rate, which was the proper rate only for the stock contained therein. There is no question made that the rate charged upon the stock, etc., intended to be insured, was the proper rate on the property as located in the corner building, and would have been an improper rate to charge if it had been located in the middle building.

It is testified to by J. B. Moore, J. B. Moore, Jr., and G. L. Cook—the latter being the person who wrote the description or form (slips) from which Straus & Son issued the two policies on December 13th—that the understanding and intention on their part was to insure the stock in the corner building. Milton Straus, of the firm of Straus & Son, admits that J. B. Moore informed him that these policies were intended to take the place of two similar policies which would soon expire in the Virginia Fire & Marine Insurance Company, and the only reason given by him for construing the policy here in question as applying to the stock in the middle building is that he was informed by Mr. Moore "that the only mechanical appliance in the middle building was the power from the gristmill, used in hoisting grain." The point made by Straus in his reason for that construction of the policy was that the corn or grist mill, being the westernmost building, was the building from which power would have to be obtained to run the machinery in the middle building, and that the power therefrom would not be likely to be transferred to the easternmost or lime warehouse (corner) building, on account of its distance, and that the clause in the policy granting "permission to hoist grain," etc., could only refer to the middle building—the brick and iron building—it being contiguous to the gristmill. This contention of Straus loses its force entirely by reason of the fact that the clause granting "permission to hoist grain," etc., is found in the policy issued by appellee through Straus, at the same time, on the easternmost (corner) building, which policy it never disputed, but promptly paid after the fire occurred. No controversy arose as to the location of the property covered by the policy here in question until W. B. Robins, a general insurance adjuster of Richmond, was sent to adjust the loss sustained by reason of the fire on the 31st of December, when, in examining the policies issued by the companies he represented, including appellee, he discovered that, by using the words "and iron" between the words "brick" and "building" in the policy here in question, the description applied to the middle building instead of the corner building, as he construed it; and Milton Straus frankly admits in his testimony in the case that up to the time that he received this information from Robins, which was about 10 days after the fire, he had supposed that the policy applied to the contents of the corner building, and that he had made a mistake in mapping the risk. He could not have supposed that the policy applied to the contents of the corner building if he had not intended that the policy, when issued, on the 13th of December, was to cover the contents of that building. He therefore practically admits that he, as did J. B. Moore, intended and understood that the policies issued to appellants on December 13th—one on the corner building, and the other on its contents—applied to that building and its contents. Robins is wholly unable to explain, nor does Straus attempt to explain, why Straus & Son should have charged the rate applicable only to the contents of the corner building, if it was intended that the policy should apply, and did in fact apply, to the contents of the middle building, except to suggest that at that time there was some confusion of rates by reason of legislation on the subject of insurance.

The facts, upon which appellee greatly relies, that the description of the building in the two policies was dissimilar, and that the application for insurance and the policy on the stock, etc., referred more clearly to the middle than to the corner building, covered by the other policy, are not a sufficient reply to appellant's contention that there was a mutual mistake, in the face of the evidence that appellee's agent, Straus, knew (which he admits) that "both policies, taken together, were intended to protect a building, and the stock in it"; that the application and policy on the building contained some expressions descriptive of the corner building, and some descriptive of the middle building; that the policies were not issued till the applications therefor had been taken by Straus to J. B. Moore & Co., who explained to him that the insurance was desired on the corner building and its contents, and not the middle building, upon which appellee had already declined to place insurance; and that Straus supposed that the policy here in question applied to the stock in the corner building, and thought he "had made a mistake in mapping the risk," until informed differently by Robins about 10 days after the fire. After stating on cross-examination, "I thought the building and the stock were the same location," Straus was asked: "You understood, then, that the stock was contained in the building which was insured under the other policy? Ans. Yes, sir. Q. Was it not your intention, in issuing these two policies, that the policy on the stock should cover that stock which was then contained in the building which was covered by the other policy? Ans. I understood so from the interview I had with Messrs. J. B. Moore & Co."

Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that there was a mutual mistake, which should be corrected, and the policy in question reformed. The decree appealed from will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded to the chancery court of the city of Richmond, to be further proceeded with in accordance with this opinion.

NORFOLK RY. & LIGHT CO. v. SPRATLEY.

ELECTRICITY—INJURY FROM LIVE WIRE—PRESUMPTION OF NEGLIGENCE—REBUTTAL OF PRESUMPTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—PROXIMATE CAUSE—HARMLESS ERROR—EXPERT TESTIMONY—INSTRUCTIONS—DAMAGES.

1. Electric companies are not insurers against accidents, but they are held to a high degree of care in the construction and maintenance of their dangerous appliances.

2. The fact that a child was injured by picking up a live electric wire which had fallen to the sidewalk created a presumption of negligence on the part of the corporation owning and maintaining the wire.

3. In an action for injuries sustained by a child by picking up a live electric wire that had fallen to the sidewalk, the testimony of a lineman that he looked over the wires every day, and that between 6 and 7 o'clock in the morning of the day of the accident he had looked over the wire in question, and had found it all right, was not sufficient to remove the presumption of negligence on the part of the corporation owning and maintaining the wire.

4. The presumption of negligence which arises from an injury to a pedestrian in a public street from a broken electric wire is not overcome by testimony of employees of the one owning and maintaining the wire that the wire was properly constructed and put up.

5. Though a question asked a witness and his answer thereto are improper, if the propounder's case has been completely made out otherwise the error is harmless.

6. Though exception to the testimony of a witness is well taken, if the same fact is proved by other witnesses without objection the error is harmless.

7. In an action for injuries to a child caused by his having picked up a live electric wire that had fallen to the sidewalk, a witness testified that two women were struck in the face by the wire, but not injured, and that the child grasped it at a point where it was not insulated, and that he thought he (the witness) took hold of it at a place where it was insulated without being hurt. Held, that such evidence did not show that a lack of insulation, and not the falling of the wire, was the proximate cause of the injury.

8. In an action for personal injuries, it was proper to permit the physician who attended plaintiff to testify as to the probable future effects of the injuries.

9. In an action for personal injuries, the jury may consider, in addition to the expense and pain and loss already incurred and suffered, such as will reasonably and probably result as a consequence.

10. On appeal in an action for personal injuries suffered by a child, the question whether there was error in permitting his mother to testify that she had spent $7 for medicines was precluded by the maxim, "De minimis non curat lex."

11. Where no exception was taken to certain testimony when the question was asked the witness, and no bill of exceptions subsequently asked for, and there was no mention of such an assignment of error in the petition to the Supreme Court for a writ of error, the admissibility of the testimony could not be considered on appeal.

12. The verdict of the jury in an action for personal injuries could not be disturbed on appeal where there was nothing to show that the jury were actuated by prejudice or partiality.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Herbert Wesley Spratley, by his next friend, J. W. Spratley, against the Norfolk Railway & Light Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Richard B. Tunstall, for plaintiff in error. Miller & Coleman, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. On the 14th day of June, 1903—a clear, bright day—Herbert Wesley Spratley, an infant seven years of age, in company with his little sister and their little companion, Mabel Blair, were en route to the cemetery in Berkley, a suburb of the city of Norfolk. While passing along Liberty street, Herbert was injured by coming in contact with a charged electric wire owned by the plaintiff in error, which had fallen across the sidewalk about two hours before the accident. He was playing with his sister, and, thinking the wire was a switch, picked it up to hit her, with the result that he was severely shocked and burned about his head, hand, and leg, and was rendered unconscious. These injuries confined him to the bed for four weeks, and to the house for six weeks or more.

This suit was brought by the injured child, in the name of J. W. Spratley, as next friend, against the defendant company, to recover damages for the injuries mentioned; and, upon a demurrer to the evidence, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $2,000, the amount ascertained by the verdict of the jury. A writ of error was awarded, which brings the case to this court for review of errors alleged to have been committed at the trial.

It is contended that the demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained, because the defendant company was not shown to have been guilty of negligence.

This is a clear case for the application of the common sense rule of evidence expressed in the maxim res ipsa loquitur. While electric companies are not held to be insurers against accident, still it is due to the citizen that such companies, permitted as they are to use for their own purposes the streets of a city or town, should be held to the exercise of a high degree of care in the construction and maintenance of the dangerous appliances employed by them, to the end that travelers along the highway may not be injured. The danger is great, and care and watchfulness must be commensurate with it. Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co., 114 N. C. 203, 19 S. E. 344, 28 L. R. A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786; City Elec. St. R. Co. v. Conery (Ark.) 33 S. W. 420, 31 L. R. A. 570, and note page 578; Joyce on Electricity, §§ 438, 606. A consequence of this rule as to the high degree of care required in the use of a dangerous current of electricity is the presumption of negligence that is raised by the fact that a dangerous wire has broken and fallen into the street. But it is insisted that the testimony of the witness Wiggins Fuller, introduced by the plaintiff, showed that the defendant company had exercised due care, and that this proof did away with the presumption afforded by the accident itself, and rendered some other evidence of negligence essential to the plaintiff's case. The testimony mentioned is that of an adverse witness, called, as such, by the plaintiff to prove the ownership of the wire in question, and that the witness had repaired it. Upon cross-examination by the defendant company, the witness testified that he was not the inspector, but was a line-man; that he looked over the wires every day; and that between 6 and 7 o'clock in the morning of the day of the accident he had looked over this wire and found it all right.

This evidence was not sufficient to remove the presumption of negligence arising from the accident itself. Upon the whole evidence, the question was one for the jury.

In Uggle v. West End St. R. Co., 160 Mass. 351, 35 N. E. 1126, 39 Am. St. Rep. 481, the plaintiff was struck by part of an iron ear used to clasp a trolley wire to keep it in place around a curve over the defendant's track. There was no evidence of fault on the part of the defendant, other than that afforded by the accident itself. There was, however, evidence introduced by the defendant that it was not negligent, tending to show that the break was a clean one, bright in color and appearance; that the iron was sound all through, with no flaw or defect in it; that the whole apparatus was manufactured and put up by a manufacturer of the highest reputation; that the ear and guy constituted the best and strongest device known at the time for keeping trolley wires in place; that the defendant employed a corps of competent superintendents, foremen, and inspectors, who inspected the whole line weekly, including the cars and their attachments; and that this particular part of the line had been inspected within a week prior to the accident.

Notwithstanding this evidence of due care on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff was not called upon to introduce other evidence of negligence than the accident itself; the court holding that upon the whole evidence the question was for the jury, and sustaining their verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

The presumption of negligence arising from an injury to a passer-by in a public street from a broken electric wire is not overcome, so as to require the case to be taken from the jury, by testimony of defendant's employees that the wire was properly constructed and put up. Boyd v. Portland General Cement Co. (Or.) 66 Pac. 576, 57 L. R. A. 619.

The declaration in the case at bar, after setting out the duty of the defendant company to so operate, control, and maintain its wires that they would not fall upon or come in contact with pedestrians lawfully upon and passing along a public street and highway, avers that the defendant, in disregard of its duty in that behalf, so carelessly and negligently maintained, controlled, and operated its wire that it was broken, and negligently permitted to fall from the poles, and negligently permitted to remain upon the street, charged with an electric current, and that by reason of this negligence the wire came in contact with the plaintiff, and he was thereby severely shocked, burned, etc. At the conclusion of the testimony of George W. Wiggins, a witness for the plaintiff, he was asked the following question: "Did you notice the condition of that wire—whether it was an old or new wire, or whether the insulation was on or off?" The witness answered that the insulation was off in a great many places, but that he did not know whether the wire was old or new. A motion to strike out this answer was overruled, and this action of the court is assigned as error.

It is contended that the declaration did not aver imperfect insulation as a ground of negligence, and that evidence tending to show lack of insulation could not, therefore, be introduced. On the other hand, it is most earnestly and with much force insisted that such evidence was admissible under the averment that the defendant negligently maintained its wire.

To properly maintain this electric wire would seem to include proper insulation, but it is insisted that the declaration limits the negligence in maintaining to preventing the wire from falling. In our view, a consideration of this question is not necessary. Under the rule res ipsa loquitur, the plaintiff's case was made out. The wire was down and across the sidewalk, and the child grasped it in the palm of his hand, and was injured. When the plaintiff has established the fact of ownership and control of the wire, and its dangerous condition, in a public street or highway, coupled with the accident, he has made out a prima facie case of negligence, and cast the burden upon the defendant to show that the wire was broken, and remain ed in such condition until the accident, without its fault. Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co., supra; Western Union Tel. Co. v. State, for, etc., 82 Md. 293, 33 Atl. 763, 31 L. R. A. 572, 51 Am. St. Rep. 464; Willey v. Boston Elec. Co., 168 Mass. 40, 46 N. E. 395, 37 L. R. A. 723; Trenton Pass. R. Co. v. Cooper (N. J. Err. & App.) 37 Atl. 730, 38 L. R. A. 637, 64 Am. St. Rep. 592; Richmond Ry., etc., Co. v. Hudgins, 100 Va. 409, 41 S. E. 736.

The question and answer objected to were not essential to the plaintiff's case. His case was completely made out without it.

In Morotock Ins. Co. v. Fostoria Novelty Co., 94 Va. 361, 26 S. E. 850, it is held that although a question asked the witness, and his answer thereto, are illegal and improper, yet, if the propounder's case has been completely made out without such question and answer, and the admission of the answer did not and could not affect the result, it is harmless error, and the appellate court will not for this cause reverse the judgment of the lower court.

Further, the question and answer under consideration were without prejudice to the defendant company, because its own evidence tended just as strongly to show that the wire was not properly insulated.

In Taylor v. Mallory, 96 Va. 18, 30 S. E. 472, it is held that, although an exception to the testimony of a witness may be well taken, if the same fact is subsequently proved by other witnesses without objection the error will be deemed to be harmless. See, also, Va. & S. W. Ry. Co. v. Bailey, 103 Va. —, 49 S. E. 33.

The defendant further contends that its demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained because the proximate cause of the injury was the lack of insulation, and the declaration did not contain a specific allegation that the wire was not insulated. In support of this contention the defendant company relies upon its witness T. F. Newberry, who testified that two colored women passing along the sidewalk were struck in the face by the wire, and flirited it out of the way without being injured. This witness also testified that he saw the little boy, while standing on the lot by the sidewalk, take hold of the wire, and that he grasped it at a point where it was not insulated. The witness further says that he thinks that he (the witness) took hold of the wire at a point where it was insulated without being hurt. The clear inference from this evidence introduced by the defendant is that the wire was not maintained as to its insulation; that the insulation was off at some points, and on at others; and consequently that the two colored women were not injured, because they were struck by the wire at a point where it was insulated, while the child, as shown by the witness, grasped the wire at a point where it was not insulated. We see nothing in this evidence to establish the contention that the lack of insulation was the proximate cause of the accident. The want of insulation would have been harmless had not the wire fallen. It was the negligence of the defendant company in allowing the wire to fall and remain across the sidewalk, and not the lack of insulation, that was the proximate cause of the accident. Had not the wire fallen, it could have remained on the pole in the air, uninsulated, indefinitely, without injury to any one. So that it was the falling of the wire that brought about the injury sustained by the plaintiff.

It is further contended by the plaintiff in error that the court below erred in allowing Dr. Lankford to testify as to the probable future effects of the injuries sustained by the plaintiff, and in not striking out evidence as to such future effects.

In Watson on Personal Injuries, § 604, p. 720, it is said: "An exception to the rule excluding opinion evidence exists where it is desired to show by properly qualified experts the nature or extent of the plaintiff's injuries, and their probable permanency or the reverse. 'There is,' indeed, it has been said, 'no evidence other than that of experts by which courts and juries can determine whether a disease or an injury has or can be permanently cured, or what its effect will be upon the health and capability of the injured person in the future.' It is competent, therefore, for the physician who attended the plaintiff during the period of treatment for the injuries received to give his opinion as to the effect of the injuries received by the plaintiff upon his future condition, or to state from his experience and medical knowledge the probability of the recurrence of inflammation in an injured muscle. And a physician may also testify, in a general way, that there is a probability that certain conditions caused by the injuries, and shown to exist at the time of the trial, will produce still more serious results in the future, or may be requested to express his opinion as to the probable effect of the injuries on the plaintiff's general health, or may be asked whether, in his opinion, on the facts shown, if certain conditions exist two years after the accident, they will probably be permanent."

In Toledo Ry. Co. v. Baddeley, 54 Ill. 19, 5 Am. Rep. 71, it was held to be proper for qualified experts to testify as to the probable effect of the injuries received by the plaintiff upon his future condition.

Any evidence tending to show the character and extent of the injury, and its probable results, and the probability of an injury leaving permanent effects of an injurious nature, is competent. A question, therefore, to a physician, asking him to state, from his experience and medical knowledge, the future effects likely to result from an injury, is proper. Filer v. N. Y. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 42.

This court, in the case of Richmond P. & Power Co. v. Robinson, 100 Va. 394-400, 41

2. 719, in discussing the measure of damages, said the amount in question could not be considered as unreasonable compensation for such physical pain and suffering as the plaintiff experienced, or was likely to experience. Such inconvenience, discomfort, mental suffering as might have been inflicted upon him by the injuries and consequent disability were also to be considered. In the light of these authorities, we are of opinion that there was no error in permitting the witness Dr. Lankford to testify to the probable future effects likely to result from the injuries sustained by the plaintiff.

It is further asserted that the court erred in its instruction to the jury touching the measure of damages. The objection urged on this instruction is that it told the jury they should take into consideration, in addition to the expenses and pain and loss already incurred and suffered, such as would naturally, reasonably, and probably result to the plaintiff as a consequence of his injuries.

The objection made to this instruction has been practically disposed of by what has been said in dealing with the last-mentioned assignment of error, in regard to the introduction of expert evidence as to the probable future effects of the injuries sustained by the plaintiff.

In Watson on Personal Injuries, § 384, p. 18, the learned author, in discussing the propriety of an instruction embodying the element of damage here objected to, says: "but it is not perceived why the probability, likelihood or reasonable expectation of the future suffering does not satisfy the rule of reasonable certainty, and such is believed to be the weight of the best considered cases." An instruction so worded, indeed, would seem to be preferable to one simply stating the requirement to be reasonable certainty, because in the former case the jury would be advised in some measure as to what constitutes reasonable certainty. It has been held, accordingly, that a jury may be properly instructed to give damages for such future suffering as the plaintiff will probably endure, or "in any reasonable probability will hereafter sustain." And in an action for personal injuries, where proof of future effects with certainty was impossible, and reasonable probabilities were necessarily the basis of the medical opinions, it was held proper to charge that damages could be awarded for "such consequences as are reasonably likely to ensue," and all pain and suffering which the plaintiff, "in reasonable probability, will hereafter sustain." In the Supreme Court of Arkansas the following instruction was approved in an action for assault and battery: "If the jury find for the plaintiff, it will be their duty to consider whether or not the plaintiff is likely to suffer in the future from the effects of the wound received at the hands of defendant;

* * * and, if they find in the affirmative, it will be their duty to assess a sum equivalent to the injuries and sufferings, as they find from the evidence, he is likely to suffer in the future."

We are of opinion that in the case at bar the court committed no error in telling the jury that they could take into consideration, in assessing damages, "such as will naturally, reasonably, and probably result to the plaintiff as a consequence of his injuries."

Mrs. Rosa Spratley, the mother of the plaintiff, introduced on his behalf, was asked, "Has any money been expended for medicine?" and answered, "I spent, I think, in the neighborhood of seven dollars. I don't know whether it was that much, or any more. I did not keep a strict account." It is contended in the oral argument before this court that the admission of this question and answer was error, for which the judgment should be reversed, because the plaintiff could not recover except for such expenses as he had himself incurred, whereas the answer showed that the mother had expended the sum mentioned.

If consideration of this question were not precluded by the maxim, "De minimis non curat lex," the contention would not be tenable, in view of the instruction given, which expressly limits the consideration of the jury to such necessary expenses as the plaintiff himself incurred for medicine. But apart from these considerations, this question cannot be raised for the first time in oral argument before this court. No exception was taken to the evidence at the time the question was asked. No bill of exception was subsequently asked for on the subject, and there is no mention of such an assignment of error in the petition to this court for a writ of error. It is well settled that under such circumstances it is too late to now make the introduction of this evidence a ground for setting aside the verdict of the jury.

It is further assigned as error that the damages allowed by the verdict of the jury are excessive.

There is not a suggestion in the record that the jury were actuated by prejudice or partiality, and therefore, upon well-settled principles, their verdict cannot be disturbed. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Shott, 92 Va. 34, 22 S. E. 811; Richmond Ry. & Elec. Co. v. Garthright, 92 Va. 627, 24 S. E. 267, 32 L. R. A. 220, 53 Am. St. Rep. 839. In the last-named case it is said, "No method has yet been devised, nor scales adjusted, by which to measure or weigh and value in money the degrees of pain and anguish of a suffering human being, nor ever likely to be"; that, unless the finding of the jury is so great as to furnish ground for believing that they were actuated by partiality or prejudice, the court should not, under the well-settled rule in this state, disturb the verdict.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the judgment complained of must be affirmed.

LAKE DRUMMOND CANAL & WATER CO.
v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 12, 1905.)

FORECLOSURE OF CORPORATE MORTGAGE — RIGHTS CONVEYED — IMMUNITY FROM TAXA-TION — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES — CONSTI-TUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

1. Code 1887, § 1233 [Ann. Code 1904, p. 623], provides that a sale under a mortgage or trust deed executed by a corporation on all its works and property shall pass to the purchaser all the property of the corporation other than debts due to it, and on such conveyance "the said company shall ipso facto be dissolved," etc. Section 1234 [page 623] provides that the corporation created by or in consequence of such sale and conveyance shall succeed to "all such franchise rights and privileges and perform all such duties as would have been had or should have been performed by the first company but for such sale and conveyance." Held, that a sale on foreclosure of a deed of trust of all the property and franchise of the corporation did not pass to the purchaser the immunity from taxation granted by the state to the original corporation, its successors and assigns.

2. Under Const. 1851, art. 10, § 1 [Ann. Code 1904, p. cclxi], providing that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth, and all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, etc., a corporation created under Code 1887, § 1234 [Ann. Code 1904, p. 623], on the purchase of the property and franchise of another corporation on foreclosure of a deed of trust pursuant to section 1233 [page 623] cannot claim the right to immunity from taxation granted to the original corporation prior to the adoption of such constitutional provision.

Appeal from State Corporation Commission.

Proceedings by the commonwealth against the Lake Drummond Canal & Water Company to recover a fine for failing to make a report of property to the Corporation Commission. From an order imposing a fine, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. White and T. S. Garnett, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

KEITH, P. On December 1, 1787, the General Assembly of Virginia granted a charter to the Dismal Swamp Canal Company, which, among other things, recites: "That for and in consideration of the expenses the said proprietors will be at, not only in cutting the said canal, erecting locks, making causeways and performing other works necessary for this navigation, but in maintaining and keeping the same in repair, the said canal, locks, causeways, and other works, with all their profits, shall be and the same are hereby vested in the said proprietors, their heirs and assigns forever, as tenants in common in proportion to their respective shares, and the same shall be deemed real estate, and be forever exempt from the payment of any tax imposition or assessment whatever, and it shall and may be lawful for the said president and directors at all times for ever hereafter to demand and receive at some convenient place near one of the extremities of the canal, for all commodities transported through it or over the causeways, tolls, according to the following table and rates which shall be in Spanish milled dollars, to-wit:"

In the concluding section of the charter it is provided that the act creating the corporation should be in effect from and after the passage of a like act by the General Assembly of North Carolina, and such an act was passed in the year 1790, and the internal improvement contemplated in the charter was undertaken, completed, and put into operation.

In the year 1867 a deed of trust was executed upon all the property of the company, which was foreclosed in 1880, and conveyance made to certain purchasers, who assumed the corporate name of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company. This company in turn executed a deed of trust upon all the property of the canal of every character to certain trustees, which was foreclosed and conveyance made in 1889 to certain purchasers, who assumed the corporate name of the Norfolk & North Carolina Canal Company. The corporation thus created also executed a deed of trust, which was foreclosed in the year 1892, and conveyance of the property made to purchasers who assumed the name of the Lake Drummond Canal & Water Company, the style under which the canal is now operated.

The Lake Drummond Company now owns the canal and all its property and appurtenances, and on the 29th of February, 1904, the State Corporation Commission issued a summons requiring it to appear and show cause why a fine should not be imposed upon it for failing to make report to the commission, as provided by section 27 of an act of the General Assembly of Virginia approved April 16, 1903, of all its real and personal property of every description and of its receipts for transportation. In obedience to this summons, the company appeared and answered, claiming that all the franchises, rights, and privileges conferred upon the Dismal Swamp Canal Company by the act of 1787, whereby an irrepealable immunity from taxation was granted by the state, have, by virtue of the foreclosures under the several deeds of trust before mentioned, devolved upon and vested in the present Lake Drummond Canal & Water Company.

The State Corporation Commission was of opinion that the answer was insufficient, and imposed a fine upon the defendant for failure to make report as required by law, and from this order the canal company appealed.

It would be a fruitless task to inquire into the power of a state Legislature to enter into a contract granting a perpetual immunity from taxation so as to bind succeeding Legislatures. The power is too thoroughly established by authority to be any longer open to question.

In State of New Jersey v. Wilson, 7 Cranch, 185, 3 L. Ed. 303, the Supreme Court held, Judge Marshall delivering the opinion, that a legislative act declaring that certain lands which should be purchased for the Indians should not thereafter be subject to any tax constituted a contract which could not be rescinded by a subsequent legislative act, and the principle thus established has been followed in cases almost without number.

The case under consideration possesses all the elements of a contract. The act of 1787 recites: "That for and in consideration of the expenses the said proprietors will be at, not only in cutting the said canal, erecting locks, making causeways, and performing other works necessary for this navigation, but in maintaining and keeping the same in repair, the said canal, locks, causeways, and other works * * * shall be * * * forever exempt from the payment of any tax, imposition or assessment whatever," and there can be no doubt that, in the language of the Corporation Commission, there was a contract between the state and the corporation, which could not be violated by the state by any attempt in the future to repeal the immunity from taxation granted to this corporation. It remains, then, to consider whether or not this immunity has passed to the present corporation.

In the petition for appeal it is claimed that the charter of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company contains a perpetual exemption from taxation of "all the property, rights and franchises of the company, its successors and assigns," and this exemption accrues to the benefit of the petitioner by force of sections 1233 and 1234 of the Code of Virginia of 1887 [Ann. Code 1904, p. 623], by which it became such successor and assignee by the name of the Lake Drummond Canal & Water Company; and, secondly, that the exemption being a contract with the state of Virginia and a compact between the state of Virginia and the state of North Carolina, expressly declared by the concurrent acts of said states, the act of Assembly of April 15, 1903, p. 144, § 27 [Ann. Code 1904, p. 723, § 1313a], under which this proceeding is taken by the State Corporation Commission, if enforced, is a violation of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits the impairment of the obligations of contracts, and is therefore unconstitutional and void.

Sections 1233 and 1234 of the Code of 1887 [Ann. Code 1904, p. 623] are as follows:

"Sec. 1233. Sale of company's property under deed of trust; what it passes; dissolution of company; purchaser, a corporation.—If a sale be made under a deed of trust or mortgage executed by a company on all its works and property, and there be a conveyance pursuant thereto, such sale and conveyance shall pass to the purchaser at the sale, not only the works and property of the company as they were at the time of making the deed of trust or mortgage, but any works which the company may, after that time and before the sale, have constructed, and all other property of which it may be possessed at the time of the sale, other than debts due to it. Upon such conveyance to the purchaser, the said company shall ipso facto be dissolved. And the said purchaser shall forthwith be a corporation, by any name which may be set forth in the said conveyance, or in any writing signed by him and recorded in the court in which the conveyance shall be recorded.

"Sec. 1234. The corporation created by or in consequence of such sale and conveyance shall succeed to all such franchises, rights, and privileges, and perform all such duties as would have been had, or should have been performed, by the first company, but for such sale and conveyance, including the duty of maintaining and operating any branch or lateral road which may have been constructed and operated before the sale, and of transporting freight and passengers therein save only that the corporation so created shall not be entitled to the debts due to the first company, and shall not be liable for any debts of, or claims against, the said first company which may not be expressly assumed in the contract of purchase, and the whole profits of the business done by such corporation shall belong to the said purchaser and his assigns. His interest in the corporation shall be personal estate, and he or his assigns may create so many shares of stock therein as he or they may think proper, not exceeding together the amount of stock in the first company at the time of the sale, and assign the same in the book to be kept for that purpose. The said shares shall thereupon be on the footing of shares in joint stock companies generally, except only that the first meeting of the stockholders shall be held on such day and at such place as shall be fixed by the said purchaser, of which notice shall be published for two successive weeks in a newspaper."

Without undertaking to trace the history of these sections beyond the Code of 1849, it is enough to say that they have undergone little change since that time. To those sections the Lake Drummond Company must look for its corporate franchises, rights, and privileges. By force of section 1233 the foreclosure of the deed of trust and conveyance to the purchaser under it by the Dismal Swamp Canal Company operated ipso facto to dissolve that company, and so with the successive sales, purchases, and conveyances under subsequent deeds of trust. By section 1234 the new corporation thus created succeeds to "all such franchises, rights and privileges, and perform all such duties as would have been had, or should have been performed by the first company, but for such sale and conveyance."

It follows from what has been said that the existing company, by virtue of the conveyance to it, and as a corporation having its origin and existence only under and by force of section 1234, succeeds to only such franchises, rights, and privileges as pass by force of the language employed in that section, and not by virtue of the assignability of the original contract of exemption from taxation granted to the Dismal Swamp Canal Company, its successors and assigns.

The case is different from that of New Jersey v. Wilson, supra. In that case the exemption was held to pass with the land. The purchaser of the Indian title was a natural person. He did not derive his capacity to receive from the state of New Jersey. "The privilege," says the opinion in that case, "though for the benefit of the Indians, is annexed, by the terms which create it, to the land itself, not to their persons. It is for their advantage that it should be annexed to the land, because in the event of a sale, on which alone the question could become material, the value would be enhanced by it. It is not doubted but that the state of New Jersey might have insisted on a surrender of this privilege as the sole condition on which a sale of the property should be allowed. But this condition has not been insisted on. The land has been sold, with the assent of the state, with all its privileges and immunities. The purchaser succeeds, with the assent of the state, to all the rights of the Indians. He stands with respect to this land in their place, and claims the benefit of their contract. This contract is certainly impaired by a law which would annul this essential part of it."

The case of an artificial person—of a corporation deriving its existence, its capacities, and its franchises from the state—is wholly different from that of a natural person. In the Indian land case all that was enjoyed by the Indians passed to the purchaser from them; in the absence of objection by the state, its assent in such case being presumed. In the case of a corporation its capacity to take is to be measured by the expressed will of the state.

What force, then, is to be given to the words "franchises, rights, and privileges" in this section?

There are numerous cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the subject, and it is a matter of regret that they appear not to be entirely harmonious. There is, however, a principle upon which they seem to be agreed.

In Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 514, 7 L. Ed. 939, Chief Justice Marshall thus states the law: "That the taxing power is of vital importance, that it is essential to the existence of government, are truths which it cannot be necessary to reaffirm.

They are acknowledged and asserted by all. It would seem that the relinquishment of such a power is never to be assumed. We will not say that a state may not relinquish it; that a consideration sufficiently valuable to induce a partial release of it may not exist; but as the whole community is interested in retaining it undiminished, that community has a right to insist that its abandonment ought not to be presumed in a case in which the deliberate purpose of the state to abandon it does not appear." This may be regarded as the controlling canon of interpretation in such cases.

In Tucker v. Ferguson, 22 Wall. 527, 22 L. Ed. 805, the principle is maintained that the taxing power may be restrained by contract in special cases for the public good, but such a contract "is to be rigidly scrutinized, and never permitted to extend, either in scope or duration, beyond what the terms of the concession clearly require."

In Chicago, Burlington, etc., R. R. Co. v. State of Missouri, 120 U. S. 569, 7 Sup. Ct. 693, 30 L. Ed. 732, Justice Harlan said: "It is a settled doctrine of this court that an immunity from taxation by the state will not be recognized unless granted in terms too plain to be mistaken."

In Pickard v. East Tenn., etc., R. Co., 130 U. S. 637, 9 Sup. Ct. 640, 32 L. Ed. 1051, Justice Field says: "It has been held, and the doctrine has been so often repeated that it is no longer an open question, that the Legislature of a state may exempt the property of particular persons or corporations from taxation, either for a limited period or perpetually; but to justify the conclusion that such exemption is granted it must appear by language so clear and unmistakable as to leave no doubt of the purpose of the Legislature. The power of taxation is one of the highest attributes of sovereignty, and the suspension of its exercise as to any persons or property is not a matter to be presumed or inferred. It must be declared, or it will not be deemed to exist. If the Legislature can lay aside a power devolved upon it for the good of the whole people of the state for the benefit of a private party, it must speak in such unmistakable terms that they will not admit of any reasonable construction consistent with the reservation of the power. Yielding to the doctrine that immunity from taxation may be granted, that point being already adjudged, it must be considered as a personal privilege not extending beyond the immediate grantee, unless otherwise so declared in express terms. The same considerations which call for clear and unambiguous language to justify the conclusion that immunity from taxation has been granted in any instance must require similar distinctness of expression before the immunity will be extended to others than the original grantee. It will not pass merely by a conveyance of the property and franchises of a railroad company, although such company may hold its property exempt from taxation."

Can it be said that section 1234 in clear and unambiguous language justifies the conclusion that the Legislature intended that the original immunity from taxation granted to the Dismal Swamp Canal Company should pass to and vest in the Lake Drummond Canal & Water Company? Upon this point, as we have said, the authorities are not easy to be reconciled.

In Humphrey v. Pegues, 16 Wall. 244, 21 L. Ed. 326, it appears that the Cheraw & Darlington Railroad Company was chartered by the General Assembly of South Carolina, which provided that for the purpose of organizing and forming the company all the powers conferred by the charter of the Wilmington & Manchester Railroad Company on the commissioners therein named should be vested in the town of Cheraw, and all the powers, rights, and privileges granted to that company shall be and are hereby granted to the Cheraw Railroad Company, and subject to the conditions therein contained, and the question was, what passed under the terms "powers, rights, and privileges." Mr. Justice Hunt, in his opinion, said: "All the 'privileges,' as well as powers and rights, of the prior company, were granted to the latter. A more important or more comprehensive privilege than a perpetual immunity from taxation can scarcely be imagined. It contains the essential idea of a peculiar benefit or advantage as a special exemption from a burden falling upon others." And the immunity from taxation was upheld.

In Morgan v. State of Louisiana, 93 U. S. 217, 23 L. Ed. 860, Mr. Justice Field uses the following language: "Much confusion of thought has arisen in this case and in similar cases from attaching a vague and undefined meaning to the term 'franchises.' It is often used as synonymous with 'rights,' 'privileges,' and 'immunities,' though of a personal and temporary character; so that, if any one of these exists, it is loosely termed a 'franchise,' and is supposed to pass upon a transfer of the franchises of the company. But the term must always be considered in connection with the corporation or property to which it is alleged to appertain. The franchises of a railroad corporation are rights or privileges which are essential to the operation of the corporation, and without which its road and works would be of little value; such as the franchise to run cars, to take tolls, to appropriate earth and gravel for the bed of its road, or water for its engines, and the like. They are positive rights or privileges, without the possession of which the road of the company could not be successfully worked. Immunity from taxation is not one of them. The former may be conveyed to the purchaser of the road as part of the property of the company; the latter is personal, and incapable of transfer without express statutory direction." Railroad Co. v. Hamblen County, 102 U. S. 273, 26 L. Ed. 152; Pickard v. Railroad Co., supra.

In the latter case it is said upon this point that: "There are some cases where the term 'privileges' has been held to include immunity from taxation, but that has generally been where other provisions of the act have given such meaning to it. The later, and, we think, the better, opinion is that, unless other provisions remove all doubt of the intention of the Legislature to include the immunity in the term 'privileges,' it will not be so construed. It can have its full force by confining it to other grants to the corporation."

In Phoenix Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. State of Tennessee, 161 U. S. 174, 16 Sup. Ct. 471, 40 L. Ed. 660, Mr. Justice Peckham says: "It cannot be denied that the decisions of this court are somewhat involved in relation to this question of exemption. It is difficult in some cases to distinguish the language used in each so far that the different results arrived at by the court can be seen to be founded upon a real difference in the meaning of such language. The question has sometimes arisen upon the consolidation of different companies, and sometimes upon a sale under a mortgage foreclosure. Among the former is the case of Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 301, 14 Sup. Ct. 592, 38 L. Ed. 450, where, under the laws of Missouri, there was a provision that the consolidated companies should be 'subject to all the liabilities and bound by all the obligations of the companies within this state,' and 'be entitled to the same franchises and privileges under the laws of this state as if the consolidation had not taken place.' The question was said to admit of doubt whether under the name 'franchises and privileges' an immunity from taxation passed to the new company. Various cases are cited in the opinion, which was delivered by Mr. Justice Brown, showing the grounds taken by this court in such cases." The learned judge then discusses the decisions upon this subject, and reaches this conclusion: "If this were an original question, we should have no hesitation in holding that the plaintiff in error did not acquire the exemption from taxation claimed by it, and we think at the present time the weight of authority, as well as the better opinion, is in favor of the same conclusion which we should otherwise reach." The exemption was denied, and the general principle reaffirmed, that there is no inference in favor of an exemption from taxation if the Legislature did not affirmatively grant the right. "To assert," said he, "that there is an inference in favor of an exemption from taxation is a complete overturning of the universal rule in regard to taxation. The power and the right to tax are always presumed, and the exemption is to be clearly granted. Mere silence is the same as a denial of exemption."

In the Gulf & Ship Island Ry. Co. v. Hewes, 183 U. S. 68, 22 Sup. Ct. 26, 46 L. Ed. 86, speaking of the construction to be given to language such as is used in section 1234, the court says that the better opinion is that a subrogation to the rights and privileges of a former corporation does not include an immunity from taxation; citing Phoenix Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Tennessee, supra.

We come now to a case in which the Supreme Court has construed a statute identical with that found in our Code.

The state of West Virginia, by a charter granted to the Covington & Ohio Railroad Company, provided that "no taxation upon the property of the said company shall be imposed by the state until the profits of said company shall amount to ten per cent. on the capital of the company." Subsequently the Legislature of that state passed an act which authorized a consolidation of the Covington & Ohio Railroad Company when organized under the act of March 1, 1866 (Acts 1866, p. 127, c. 131), with one or more railroad companies, including the West Virginia Central Railway Company, the consolidated company to be known as the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Company, and to be vested with "all the rights, privileges, franchises and property which may have been vested in either company prior to the act of consolidation." By an act of the Legislature passed January 26, 1870 (Acts 1870, p. 5, c. 3), it was, among other things, provided that the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Company might borrow such sums of money as might be necessary, and secure the payment of such loans; and the railroad company was thereby declared to be entitled to all the benefits of the charter of the Covington & Ohio Railroad, and to all the rights, interests, benefits, and privileges, and be subject to all the duties and responsibilities provided and declared in the said contract and in the statutes therein referred to. The Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Company completed its line of railroad, and put the same into operation, and in order to do so issued a large amount of bonds, secured by deed of trust, and in default of payment proceedings of foreclosure and sale of the property were prosecuted to final decrees in the courts of Virginia and West Virginia; so that all the railroad property in West Virginia was sold, and conveyed to purchasers, who, in pursuance of the statute then in force applicable thereto, became a corporation under the name of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. The statute here referred to, as appears from the opinion, is identical with, and is, indeed, taken from, the Code of Virginia. In 1879 (Acts 1879, p. 104, c. 73) the Legislature of West Virginia passed an act subjecting the property of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company to taxation. The question was ultimately brought before the Supreme Court of the United States in Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co. v. Miller, 114 U. S. 176, 5 Sup. Ct. 813, 29 L. Ed. 121. Mr. Justice Matthews delivered an elaborate opinion, from which we think it clearly appears (1) that the words somewhat relied upon by the plaintiff in error in this case, that the grant of immunity from taxation was not only to the original company, but to "their heirs and assigns, forever," does not affect the result, the question being, not whether the immunity was capable of assignment, but whether there is a clear expression of legislative intention that this immunity should pass to and vest in the new corporation created by force of section 1234. Says the court: "There is no claim that the exemption passed to the trustees in the trust deeds or mortgages given to secure the payment of the bonds of the company; and none can be made that it passed to the purchasers by the judicial sale made under the decree for foreclosure and sale by force of the statute declaring what such a sale should pass. The language of the act upon this subject is that 'such sale and conveyance shall pass to the purchaser at the sale, not only the works and property of the company, as they were at the time of making the deed of trust or mortgage, but any works which the company may, after that time and before the sale, have constructed and all other property of which it may be possessed at the time of the sale, other than debts due to it.' So far nothing is said of what rights, privileges, franchises, and immunities shall vest in the purchaser in respect to the property, the title to which is thus conveyed. The act, however, proceeds to say that 'upon such conveyance to the purchaser, the said company shall ipso facto be dissolved.' From this it necessarily follows that all privileges which by the terms of its charter were personal to it ceased with its dissolution. But the statute adds: 'And the said purchaser shall forthwith be a corporation by any name which may be set forth in said conveyance or in any writing signed by him or them and recorded in the recorder's office of any county wherein the property so sold, or any part thereof, is situated, or where said conveyance is recorded.' Thus is formed a new corporate body, succeeding to the title of the property sold and conveyed to it, but deriving its existence from this law, and not from the original act of incorporation, which constituted the charter of its predecessor, and with such powers, rights, privileges, franchises, and immunities only as are conferred upon it by the law which has brought it into being.

"These are defined in the next succeeding section. So far as material to the question, its language is: 'The corporation created by or in consequence of such sale and conveyance shall succeed to all such franchises, rights and privileges, and perform all such duties as would have been had, or should have been performed, by the first company, but for such sale and conveyance,' etc.

"It is earnestly contended on behalf of the plaintiff in error that by virtue of this language it is entitled to enjoy the property formerly belonging to the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Company, its predecessor, precisely as though it had been incorporated under the charter of that company, and therefore with the exemption from taxation which was conceded to that company. But broad, general, and comprehensive as the language is, we cannot, in reference to the subject-matter now in hand, apply it with that force and meaning. The words used are, it will be observed, 'franchises, rights and privileges * * * as would have been had, * * * by the first company, but for such sale,' etc. There is no express reference to a grant of any exemption or immunity. Nothing is said in relation to the subject of taxation. The words actually used do not necessarily embrace a grant of such an exemption." Then follows a citation of Morgan v. Louisiana, 93 U. S. 217, 23 L. Ed. 860, which already appears in this opinion.

Continuing, Justice Matthews says: "Here there is no such express statutory direction. Nor is there an equivalent implication by necessary construction. There is nothing in the language itself, nor the context, nor the subject-matter of the legislation, nor the situation and relation of the parties to be affected, which indicates that a grant of an exemption from taxation to a particular railroad corporation, or to a class of such, was in the contemplation of the Legislature. The subject-matter of this legislation was, not the original construction of railroads, but the operation of railroads already constructed. The state was not in the attitude of a contractor, soliciting subscriptions of capital, in the formation of companies to undertake the risk of public improvements for the benefit of the state, with the hazard of loss, and perhaps financial ruin, to the first promoters, and offering exemptions from taxation as a consideration, by way of contract, for the acceptance of its proposals. It was legislating in reference to enterprises already undertaken, prosecuted and completed by companies originally thus incorporated, and who, by reason of insolvency, had been stripped of their property by creditors, and sentenced by the law to dissolution; and the purpose of the statute was simply to provide suitable means of incorporating the purchasers to facilitate their use of the property in operating it for the benefit of the public, as designed from the beginning. These purchasers had not bought the immunity now demanded either from the state or the prior possessor. The contract of the creditors would be fully met, on failure of payment of the stipulated debt, by subjecting to sale the property pledged for its payment, with such rights, franchises, and privileges only as were necessary for its beneficial use and enjoyment. The immunity from taxation, as we have already said, was not necessarily included in that designation. The debtor corporation and its creditors combined could not confer upon the purchasers any rights which were not assignable; and, as no consideration moved to the state for a renewal of the grant, there is no motive for finding, by mere construction and implication, what the words of the law have failed to express. That certainly is not a reasonable interpretation for which no sufficient reason can be assigned. We conclude, therefore, that the act from which the plaintiff in error derives its corporate existence and powers in West Virginia does not contain a renewal of the grant by exemption from taxation."

To the same effect is Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Pendleton, 156 U. S. 667, 15 Sup. Ct. 413, 39 L. Ed. 574, which also construes statutes of this state.

There is another ground upon which the judgment of the Corporation Commission may be sustained.

The first mortgage upon the property of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company was executed in 1867. When it was foreclosed that company ceased to exist, and a new company came into existence, which derived its vitality from section 1234. Upon this point the authorities which we have considered are conclusive.

By the Constitution adopted in 1851 it is provided that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth, and all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, which shall be ascertained in such manner as shall be prescribed by law. Const. art. 10, § 1 [Ann. Code 1904, p. cclxii]. This provision, or its equivalent, has been continued in the organic law of this state down to the adoption of the present Constitution. It was beyond the power of the Legislature, in the face of this provision, to have granted a perpetual exemption from taxation to a corporation, either by a special act of incorporation or by force of a general law. This position seems to be incontrovertible in principle, and is abundantly supported by authority.

In Keokuk R. Co. v. State of Missouri, 152 U. S. 301, 14 Sup. Ct. 592, 38 L. Ed. 450, it is said: "When the new corporation came into existence, it came precisely as if it had been organized under a charter granted at the date of the consolidation, and subject to the constitutional provisions then existing, which required that no property, real or personal, should be exempted from taxation, except such as was used exclusively for public purposes; in other words, that the exemption from taxation contained in section 9 of the original charter of the Alexandria & Bloomfield Railway Company did not pass to the Missouri, Iowa & Nebraska Company. As was said of an Arkansas corporation in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 113 U. S.

465, 475, 5 Sup. Ct. 529, 534, 28 L. Ed. 1055: 'It came into existence as a corporation of the state of Arkansas, in pursuance of its Constitution and laws, and subject in all respects to their restrictions and limitations. Among these was that one which declared that "the property of corporations, now existing, or hereafter created, shall forever be subject to taxation the same as property of individuals." This rendered it impossible for the consolidated corporation to receive by transfer from the Cairo & Fulton Railroad Company, or otherwise, the exemption sought to be enforced in this suit.'

In Louisville, etc., R. R. Co. v. Palmes, 109 U. S. 244, 3 Sup. Ct. 193, 27 L. Ed. 922, the court said: "But the grant to the Pensacola & Louisville Railroad Company by the act of 1872 and that to the Pensacola Railroad Company by the act of 1877, though in form the renewal or transfers of previously existing grants, were in fact the creation of new ones. In Trask v. Maguire, 18 Wall. 391, 21 L. Ed. 938, it was said, speaking of similar provisions in the Constitution of Missouri: 'The inhibition of the Constitution applies in all its force against the renewal of an exemption equally as against its original creation.'" Gulf & C. Ry. Co. v. Hewes, supra; Maryland v. Northern Cent. Ry. Co., 44 Md. 131; Bloxham v. F. C. & R. R. Co., 35 Fla. 625, 17 South. 902; Shaw v. Covington, 194 U. S. 593, 24 Sup. Ct. 754, 48 L. Ed. 1131.

If, therefore, the construction contended for by plaintiff in error be given to section 1234, its effect would be to violate that rule of equality and uniformity of taxation imposed by the Constitution of this state in force when the several deeds of trust under which the plaintiff in error claims were executed and foreclosed.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the Corporation Commission.

(103 Va. 399)

RICHMOND & P. ELECTRIC RY. CO. v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.

EMINENT DOMAIN—RAILROADS—RIGHT OF WAY—CONDEMNATION—CONTINUANCE—DAMAGES—ELEMENTS.

1. Code 1887, §§ 1075, 1076, 1079, provide for the condemnation of a railroad right of way; and section 1081 declares that no order or injunction shall be awarded to stay the prosecution of the work, unless the company is transgressing its authority, or such injunction is required to prevent injury which cannot be adequately compensated in damages; and section 1084 provides for a proceeding to ascertain what persons are entitled to the fund awarded for land taken, and in what proportions. Held that, under such sections, alleged owners of land sought to be condemned for a railroad right of way were not entitled to have the proceedings stayed pending a suit in equity between such alleged owners, involving the title to the land.

2. Under Code 1887, § 1079, providing that the report of commissioners in railroad condemnation proceedings shall be confirmed, unless good cause is shown to the contrary, and that the amount awarded may be paid into court, or to the persons entitled thereto, the amount awarded to landowners by such report is to be treated as prima facie correct.

3. In a proceeding to condemn land for a railroad right of way, the fact that the land was available for a public park, and that the owners intended to improve the same for that purpose in the future, and use it as a source of revenue in connection with an electric railway, was too speculative, remote, and conjectural to be considered as an element of damage.

Error to Chesterfield County Court.

Wm. L. Royall, for plaintiff in error. E. R. Williams and E. H. Wells, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. In April, 1899, the Richmond, Petersburg & Carolina Railroad Company, the predecessor of the defendant in error, the Seaboard Air Line Railway, instituted proceedings under chapter 46 of the Code of Virginia, edition of 1887, in the county court of Chesterfield county, to condemn a right of way through a tract of 435 acres of land situated in said county, on the Manchester & Petersburg Turnpike, about seven miles from the city of Manchester, and known as the "Madill Tract." At the time of the institution of these proceedings, George A. Madill, the proprietor of record of this land, was a nonresident of the state, and James Bellwood, his agent, was tenant of the freehold. Subsequently, it appearing that Bellwood had acquired a conveyance to the property, the former proceedings were abandoned, and new proceedings instituted against him individually.

At the June term, 1899, the county court, over the objection of Bellwood, appointed a commission, composed of five disinterested freeholders, to ascertain what would be a just compensation for the land proposed to be taken, and for damages to the residue.

It appears that Bellwood's farm tract, through which the railroad was also to pass, adjoins the Madill tract, and for damages to both tracts the sum of $12,348.85 was awarded. With respect to these properties the commissioners, in their report, say: "Of a portion of the land from which the strip or part of land above described, and which is required by the Richmond, Petersburg & Carolina Railroad for its purposes, is carved or taken, James Bellwood appears to be the absolute and unquestioned fee-simple owner. Of another portion, known as the Madill or Drewry's Bluff tract, but recently acquired by the said James Bellwood, it appears from the evidence before us that, while the fee-simple title also stands in the said James Bellwood, upon the records, he is in fact only trustee of the latter tract; holding the legal title for the Richmond & Petersburg Electric Railway Company, the equitable or beneficial owner. By consent of parties, this latter company was permitted to appear before your commissioners as the true owner, and show its title and claim to damages occasioned by the taking of said strip, part, or portion from the Madill tract, and for convenience, and to avoid future contest and uncertainty between James Bellwood and the Richmond & Petersburg Electric Railway Company respecting the rightful share or proportion of each of the damages awarded, it was further agreed between the Richmond, Petersburg & Carolina Railroad Company, James Bellwood, and the Richmond & Petersburg Electric Railway Company that your commissioners should make an apportionment of the sum of damages above awarded between the said James Bellwood and the Richmond & Petersburg Electric Railway Company, what portion of said sum should go to each of said parties. Accordingly, in pursuance of this agreement or understanding, of the sum of $12,348.85 above fixed and awarded by us as damages, we apportioned to James Bellwood the sum of $11,353.45, and to the Richmond & Petersburg Electric Railway Company the sum of $995.40, as compensation to them severally for the land actually taken from each, and for the damages to the residue of their respective tracts, beyond the peculiar benefits to be derived in respect to such residue from the work to be constructed."

Affixed to the report is the following statement, signed by counsel for Bellwood, the Richmond & Petersburg Electric Railway Company, and the Richmond, Petersburg & Carolina Railroad Company: "We hereby confirm the above in all respects save as to the correctness of the damages awarded, which is not admitted."

The report of the commissioners was returned August 14, 1899, and confirmed by the county court June 13, 1901, as to the James Bellwood farm tract, and leave was given either party to make objection thereafter to the award with respect to the Madill tract.

In December, 1902, upon motion of defendant in error, the Seaboard Air Line Railway, successor of the Richmond, Petersburg & Carolina Railroad Company, the county court, upon the evidence and argument of counsel, confirmed the award as to the Madill tract, no good cause being shown against it. To that order a writ of error was awarded by this court.

There are practically but two assignments of error in the case. It is contended:

First, that the county court erred in overruling the motion of plaintiffs in error for a continuance; and

Second, that the amount of damages awarded by the commissioners was inadequate—a result, it is said, chiefly owing to the refusal of the commissioners to take into consideration an important and essential element of damages in fixing the amount of their award.

The ground of the motion for a continuance was the pendency of a suit in equity in the law and equity court of the city of Richmond between Bellwood and Beach and others, involving the title to the Madill tract, the termination of which suit, it was insisted, a trial of the condemnation proceedings should await.

Aside from the circumstance that plaintiffs in error were parties to the condemnation proceedings, with the fullest opportunity of introducing testimony in their own behalf, and of being heard by counsel, both before the commissioners and the county court, their contention would plainly contravene the terms and policy of the statute under which these proceedings were had.

Chapter 46 of the Code of 1887 provides for service of notice on the tenant of the freehold, if there be such tenant (section 1075); the appointment of commissioners upon that notice (section 1076); the prompt return and confirmation of the report, unless good cause be shown against it, the payment of the damages assessed into court, and the absolute vesting of the title in the company to the part of the land for which such compensation is allowed (section 1079); the right of the company to enter upon the premises condemned and construct its work, and that no order shall be made nor any injunction awarded to stay the prosecution of the work, unless it be manifest that the company is transcending its authority, and that the interposition of the court is necessary to prevent injury that cannot be adequately compensated in damages (section 1081); and finally, in order that the money paid into court may be properly disposed of, that a reference to a commissioner may be had to ascertain what persons are entitled to the fund, and in what proportions (section 1084).

It is obvious from the foregoing enactments that it was the policy of the Legislature to provide a summary remedy for condemning land for works of internal improvement, where the company and owner could not agree on the terms of purchase, and not to obstruct the company in the acquisition of a good title to the land needed for its purposes, or in the prosecution of its work, by controversies in respect to the title, but to transfer such controversy from the land to the fund which the company is required to pay into court. Va.-Carolina Co. v. Booker, 99 Va. 633, 39 S. E. 591; Ches., etc., R. Co. v. Washington, etc., R. Co., 99 Va. 715, 723, 40 S. E. 20; Fulkerson v. Taylor, 102 Va. 314, 321, 46 S. E. 309.

99 Va., page 22, 40 S. E., in giving the reason for the rule, says: "If this be not the case, railroad companies would have no assurance that the steps taken by them to procure rights of way or property wanted for their purposes would conclude any one, and they would be constantly subject to vexatious litigation. This view is not only in accordance with the better reason, but is sustained by the weight of authority. See 2 Mills on Em. Domain (2d Ed.) §§ 388, 389, 391; B. & O. R. Co. v. P., W. & Ky. R. Co., 17 W. Va. 844, and cases there cited; St. Joseph R. Co. v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co. (Mo. Sup.) 6 S. W. 691; Secombe v. R. Co., 23 Wall. 109, 119, 23 L. Ed. 67; 1 Red. on Rys. (5th Ed.) 271."

The court is therefore of opinion that the first assignment of error is not well taken.

In considering the second assignment of error, namely, that the amount of damages awarded by the commissioners is inadequate, it must be borne in mind that, by provision of the statute, the report of the commissioners is to be taken as prima facie correct. Va. Code 1887, § 1079.

In the very nature of things, the finding of the commissioners is entitled to great weight, and is not to be disturbed unless it is shown to be erroneous by clear proof. The commissioners are disinterested parties. They act under the solemnity of an oath, and are selected by the court from a conservative class of citizens—freeholders—on account of their peculiar fitness for the service to be rendered. They also possess the advantage of inspecting the property, and of seeing the witnesses and hearing them testify.

In the case of Crawford v. Valley R. Co., 25 Grat. 467, Judge Bouldin, speaking for the court, said: "We hold it to be clear and unquestionable, under the plain mandate as well as the spirit of the statute, that the report of the commissioners, ascertaining the amount of compensation and damages to be paid to the landowner, must be confirmed by the court, and judgment entered for the amount reported, unless, in the words of the statute, 'good cause be shown against it.' This makes the commissioners' report, if no illegality nor irregularity appear on its face, at least prima facie evidence of the propriety and correctness of the award of compensation and damages; and that award must therefore stand as the judgment of the court, or, rather, the judgment of the court must accord therewith, unless some sufficient matter be established to vary or arrest it. The landowner must be passive, and the entire onus of showing such sufficient cause is thrown on the objector."

And so, in Cranford Paving Co. v. Baum, 97 Va., at page 501, 24 S. E. 906, Judge Riely, in delivering the opinion of the court, observes: "When it becomes necessary to ascertain what is just compensation for land taken for a public use, as in the present case, the statute directs that the court shall appoint five disinterested freeholders as commissioners to perform this duty, and requires that in its performance they shall themselves view the land so taken. The law lays great stress upon the matter of the view, and justly attaches great weight to the report of the commissioners. They are greatly aided, as they were in this case, by the evidence of their own senses. They have the advantage of seeing the land itself, which is taken, and judging as to its value, and of determining the effect of the opening of the road upon the residue of the tract. They have, as they also had here, after having their attention specially drawn to the element of damage relied upon, the opportunity to apply the evidence produced before them to the subject of the controversy, and to determine the weight to be given to its several parts. We are without the benefit of their opportunities, and of what they saw and were the judges, and it should be a very clear case, indeed, of inadequate compensation, to justify the court in disturbing their sworn, deliberate, and disinterested judgment, as disclosed in their report." Richmond Traction Co. v. Murphy, 98 Va. 104, 34 S. E. 982; Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Chamblin, 100 Va. 401, 41 S. E. 750.

In the case of Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S. 306, 13 Sup. Ct. 393, 37 L. Ed. 170, the court said: "The rule on this subject is so well settled that we shall content ourselves in repeating an apt quotation from Mills on Eminent Domain, 246, made in the opinion of the court below: 'An appellate court will not interfere with the report of commissioners, to correct the amount of damages, except in cases of gross error, showing prejudice or corruption. The commissioners hear the evidence, and frequently make their principal evidence out of a view of the premises, and this evidence cannot be carried up so as to correct the report as being against the weight of evidence. Hence, for an error in the judgment of commissioners in arriving at the amount of damages there can be no correction, especially where the evidence is conflicting. Commissioners are not bound by the opinions of experts or by the apparent weight of evidence, but may give their own conclusions.'"

But it is insisted that it was the purpose of promoters to develop the Madill tract as a public park, to be used in conjunction with the electric railway by the expenditure of thousands of dollars in the erection of a summer hotel, casinos, pleasure buildings, ball-ground, golf links, and other improvements, and that its value for such uses was practically destroyed by the construction of the defendant in error's railroad through the property. That it was therefore the duty of the commissioners, in making up their award, to have treated the property as a park, and not to have based their estimate upon its actual condition at the time the award was made.

This court cannot assent to the soundness of that proposition. In that connection the commissioners, in their supplemental report, say: "This claim, so far as based upon evidence of future indications and investments, the commissioners disallowed and rejected, holding the same as too speculative, remote, or conjectural for them to be able to estimate, and, in making their estimate and award, as above stated, took the said land in its present conditions, with its adaptability as it at present stands to-day."

The above is a correct and succinct exposition of the principle of law which should control commissioners in arriving at a proper award. The reason of the rule is plain, and a departure from it would transfer the inquiry from the field of fact to that of fancy and speculation. It is the present actual value of the land, with all its adaptations to general and special uses, and not its prospective or speculative or possible value, based upon future expenditures and improvements, that is to be considered.

In the case of Schuylkill River, etc., R. Co. v. Stocker, 128 Pa. 233, 18 Atl. 399, it was held that the jury was not to value the tract upon the theory of what it might bring, platted and divided up into building lots; that they were to inquire what a present purchaser would be willing to pay for it in its present condition, and not what a speculator might be able to realize out of a resale in the future. See, also, S. W., etc., R. Co. v. Abell, 18 Mo. App. 637; Pinkham v. Chelmsford, 109 Mass. 228; Penn. R. Co. v. Cleary, 125 Pa. 451, 17 Atl. 468, 11 Am. St. Rep. 913.

"The conclusion from the authorities and reason of the matter seems to be that witnesses should not be allowed to give their opinion as to the value of property for a particular purpose, but should state its market value in view of any purpose to which it is adapted. The condition of the property and all its surroundings may be shown, and its availability for any particular use. If it has a peculiar adaptation for certain uses, this may be shown; and, if such peculiar adaptation adds to its value, the owner is entitled to the benefit of it. But when all the facts and circumstances have been shown, the question at last is, what is its worth in the market." 2 Lewis on Em. Dom. 1056, 1057.

The above is substantially the doctrine enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. Ed. 206, cited by this court with approval in R. & M. R. Co. v. Humphreys, 90 Va. 425, 436, 18 S. E. 901.

The record shows that, as a matter of law, the award of the commissioners was founded upon correct principles, and, as there was ample evidence to sustain it, the order complained of is without error and must be affirmed.

LISKEY et al. v. SNYDER et al.*

Dec. 20, 1904.)

MORTGAGE—PURCHASE AT JUDICIAL SALE—RE-SALE TO OWNER—RELEASE OF EQUITY—CONSIDERATION—USURY—BILL TO REDEEM.

1. A purchase of real estate at a judicial sale by strangers to the proceeding, and contemporaneous resale thereof by them to the debtor by an executory contract in writing, whereby he is charged with a certain sum in addition to the amount for which it sold at the judicial sale, all in pursuance of a prior verbal contract, though in form a purchase of the land, is regarded in equity as a loan of money on the land as security, and the rights of the parties are determined by the principles governing the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee.

2. Where a mortgagee has obtained from the mortgagor a release of his equity of redemption, the burden is upon him to show that, in obtaining it, his conduct was in all things fair and frank, and that he paid for the property what it was worth.

3. If, in such case, it be shown that the mortgagee induced the act of conveyance or release by any indirection or obliquity of conduct, such as an assurance that it is desired for some purpose other than to bar redemption, and that it shall not do so, and that there was no consideration for it except the original debt, the release will be set aside in equity.

4. Reasonable expenses by the lender in making a loan, such as those incident to inspection of the land offered as security, and examination of the title thereto, incurred at the instance and request of the borrower, and upon his promise and undertaking to pay the same, may, upon full and clear proof, be allowed him, and will not render the debt usurious.

5. Upon a bill by a mortgagor to redeem, the costs of the suit are to be decreed against him, unless he established a prior tender of the amount due on the mortgage.

Brannon, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by Robert Liskey and others against Sampson Snyder and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant Sampson Snyder appeals. Reversed.

Scott, Cobb & Maxwell, Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, and L. Hansford, for appellant. C. W. Dailey, Erskine & Allison, Winfield Leggett, W. B. Maxwell, and W. S. Lurty, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, P. Sampson Snyder, being the owner of a large amount of real estate, consisting of several tracts of land situate in Randolph county, and indebted in a sum exceeding $16,000, for which his lands had been decreed to be sold, applied to Robert Liskey, John W. Liskey, and W. H. Rickard, all of Harrisonburg, Va., for a loan of sufficient money to pay off the debts. This application was made in the latter part of the year 1898, and resulted in an arrangement whereby the land was to be permitted to go to sale, and be purchased by Rickard and the Liskeys, but to remain in the possession of Snyder under a contract of purchase from Rickard and the Liskeys at a price $3,000 in excess of the purchase money under the judicial sale, and to be paid by Snyder in four installments, to become due in 6, 12, 18, and 24 months, respectively. This arrangement was consummated on the 23d day of January, 1899, when the lands were sold to Rickard and the Liskeys under the decree of sale for the sum of $16,660, of which $1,666 was paid in cash, and for the residue of which four notes, of $3,748.50 each, payable in 6, 12, 18, and 24 months from date, were executed. On the same day Rickard and the Liskeys entered into a contract under seal whereby they sold the land to Snyder for the sum of $19,660, of which $6,164.50 was to be paid in 6 months from the date of the contract, and the residue in three equal installments, payable in 12, 18, and 24 months from date, all bearing interest. By this contract Snyder bound himself to pay, in addition to these notes, the expenses of Rickard and the Liskeys in coming to and returning from Beverly, and such attorney's fees as they had paid or agreed to pay in connection with the purchase; also to keep the buildings on the real estate fully insured, to commit no waste, and to pay off and discharge the taxes assessed on the land, and keep the taxes paid thereon until the contract of sale should be fully executed. It was further provided that upon the payment of all the purchase money the vendors should execute a deed to Snyder, with special warranty, and that the provision against waste should not prohibit Snyder from making sale of any of the timber on the land with the consent of the vendors, and applying the proceeds on the purchase money. At the same time a deed of trust was executed by Sampson Snyder and one John W. Snyder, conveying a lot of personal property to secure the payment of the notes executed by Sampson Snyder for the purchase money specified in the contract of sale; and in said contract it was agreed that, if Snyder should fail to comply with the terms of the contract of sale and the provisions of the deed of trust, then the vendors should have the right "to enter upon and take possession of the property" mentioned and described in the contract.

The record shows three letters written by Snyder to W. H. Rickard, bearing date December 28, 1898, and January 5 and 11, 1899, representing that $15,000 or $16,000 would relieve the land, and appealing to Rickard to obtain a loan of that amount for him, and offering the land as security. On the 11th day of January, 1899, Rickard wrote Snyder, saying he had seen several gentlemen whom he could interest in Snyder's behalf, and that he felt certain that if the property was worth what Snyder had said it was, and $15,000 would make the title clear, they would buy it at the price of $15,000, and resell it to him, and give him an extension of time for such an advance as was reasonable, but they would not go security or lend money out of the state of Virginia. Further on in the letter it is said, "Of course you would have to pay more for the property, say $3,000." There is no controversy as to the amount of the advance, but it is insisted by Snyder that this transaction, although an absolute sale on its face, was in fact a mere loan of money by Rickard and the Liskeys, and that the papers executed must be regarded as constituting, in equity, a mortgage securing the repayment of the money. Snyder insists that he paid off some debts, and reduced the amount charged upon the land to the sum of $16,600, for the express purpose of bringing the indebtedness within such limits as would induce the purchasers to take the land as a security for their advancement to him, and also that, in pursuance of an understanding with them, he on the day of sale represented to persons intending to become bidders that the purchase by Rickard and the Liskeys would be made for his benefit. These claims of Snyder's are controverted, but it is not denied that the purchase was made with intent to resell to Snyder at an advance of $3,000, nor that this intention was effectuated.

Snyder having failed to meet the payments as provided in the contract of sale, an agreement under seal was made on the 6th day of October, 1899, between Rickard and the Liskeys, on one side, and Snyder and his wife, on the other, whereby, in consideration of $1, and that Rickard and the Liskeys surrender unto Snyder the bonds and deed of trust aforesaid, Snyder and his wife released all their right and title to said real estate, and also all claims and demands against the vendors or said property, as growing out of any transaction whatever, and it was further provided that "neither party hereto shall have any claim or demand against the other as growing out of the transactions of January 23, 1899." On the same day another contract under seal was executed, whereby Rickard and the Liskeys leased the real estate to Snyder for the period of one year; Snyder agreeing to pay them $600 as balance due on rent for the preceding year, and $1,200 as rent for the year expiring October 5, 1900, the receipt of all which rent was thereby acknowledged as having been paid by the sale by Snyder to the Liskeys of 20 two year old cattle, and 20 one year old cattle, and 10 steer calves, all on the premises, and stated to be in the possession of the Liskeys, and, in addition thereto, an open expense account of $78.76. By this contract, Snyder and wife obligated themselves to keep the above-named cattle on the premises free of charge for 12 months; to take care of the property; to pay all back taxes for the years 1897 and 1898, and the taxes for 1899—the latter to be paid by lessors at end of the year; to make such repairs to buildings and fencing, and to cut such brush, etc., as should be agreed on by the parties, and keep a correct account for final settlement. The final clause of this agreement reads as follows: "It is further agreed by first parties that if second parties will take good care of premises as above mentioned that they shall on Oct. 5, 1900, by the repayment of $1,868.76, repurchase the personal property, cattle, herein defined as having been sold to first parties on Oct. 5th, 1899." On October 1, 1900, five days before the expiration of the lease, the following receipt and agreement was executed by Rickard, the Liskeys, and Snyder and his wife; W. H. Rickard signing for Robert Liskey, and Sampson Snyder for Mrs. Snyder: "Received of Sampson Snyder and Elizabeth Snyder seven hundred and eighty, $100 dollars, paid as follows: $62.95 in passing C. T. Painter's cattle; $108⁸⁵/₁₀₀, do, C. Reherd; $60.40, do, J. W. Liskey, and delivery of eleven cattle for $476.85, all to be applied as a credit upon rent due to Snyder on Oct. 6, 1900, or to be credited to Sampson Snyder and Elizabeth Snyder on their rental contract, dated Oct. 6, 1899. It is the purpose and intent of all the parties hereto that the above credits are to be applied toward redeeming the cattle as mentioned in the contract of rental dated Oct. 6th, 1899, and signed by Robert Liskey, W. H. Rickard, John Liskey, Sampson Snyder and Elizabeth Snyder, and this receipt is to be used in connection with said contract." On the 20th day of October, 1900, two other papers were executed. One was a receipt to Snyder for 68 cents on the title at the price of $1,990.26, to be credited on the rental under the contract of October 6, 1899, and on the rent for an extension of the lease to March 1, 1901, which extension was made by another paper, executed on the 10th day of October, 1900, fixing the rent for the time of the extension at the gross sum of $25. The account between Snyder and the other parties, as stated by Mr. Rickard, who seems to have kept the accounts between the parties, charges Snyder with $2,225 rent, $37.77 back taxes, and $67.76 balance of expense account (total, $2,730.53), and credits him with $709.05 as of October 1, 1900, and $1,990.26 as of October 20, 1900 (total, $2,699.31), leaving a balance due from Snyder of $31.22. Snyder files an account against the other parties amounting to $2,861.57, most of the items of which are included in the account as stated by Rickard. The state of this account is not important, and need not be settled here, but it is referred to as showing the relation of the parties and their transactions with reference to the land forming the subject of this controversy, and as tending to cast some light upon the real question in the cause.

In some of these transactions, one D. C. Reherd participated, although he (Rickard) and the Liskeys all deny that he had any interest in them until some time in December, 1899. For some time prior to the judicial sale of these lands, Snyder had grazed stock for Reherd, Rickard, and the Liskeys. One of Snyder's letters asking for aid was addressed to Rickard and Reherd, and the latter was consulted by Rickard in his effort to raise the money. The release of October 6, 1899, was written and signed at Snyder's house, and Reherd was there, and knew that some papers were being prepared, but denies that he was in the room, or knew the character of the papers, or what conversations were had. Afterwards, on or about December 20, 1899, according to his statement, he purchased a one-fourth interest from Rickard and the Liskeys in whatever title they had to the land.

Early in March, 1901, Reherd and John W. Liskey went to Snyder's home for the purpose of taking possession of the land; taking with them a man whom they expected to occupy the residence and take control of the lands for them. Snyder refused to give them possession, and on the 19th day of March, 1901, Reherd, Rickard, and the Liskeys presented their bill in equity to the judge of the circuit court of Randolph county, setting forth their purchase of the lands, and resale thereof to Snyder, Snyder's release, and the two leases executed, under which Snyder was holding as their tenant; alleging the expiration of the leases, Snyder's refusal to give possession, his insolvency, the annual rental value of the land to be not less than $1,200, their necessity of having immediate possession by reason of their having about 400 head of cattle which they intended to pasture on the land, and the commission of waste by Snyder, in that he had a sawmill on the land, and had cut and manufactured timber from the land into lumber of the value of six or seven hundred dollars, and was continuing to take the timber from the land; and praying that Snyder be enjoined from cutting any timber on any of the land, from manufacturing the same into lumber, from removing the same from the land or selling it, from cultivating any of the land, pasturing it, cutting hay upon it, gathering and disposing of the fruit, exercising actual ownership over it, collecting or receiving rent from any of the occupants of the land, and from renting or leasing any part of the land, and for general relief. An injunction was awarded.

Snyder answered the bill, setting forth the facts hereinbefore stated, and claiming that, although the transaction of January 23, 1899, was on its face a contract of sale, it was in reality a loan from Rickard and the Liskeys to him; he having agreed to pay them $3,000 for the use of their money. As to the release executed October 6, 1899, he averred that at the time it was executed it was expressly understood and agreed that it was not to work a relinquishment in any respect of his rights as owner of the lands, or to make sale of the timber thereon for the purpose of raising money with which to pay for the land. The principal allegations of the answer in respect to the lease are as follows: "That some time about October 6, 1899, plaintiffs Robert Liskey, John W. Liskey, and W. H. Rickard came to the respondent, at his home, near Harman, far from his counsel, and requested him to give them a statement by which they could more effectually raise money to carry on business enterprises which they had then before them, and claimed that they would stand by the contract as stated in Exhibit E in plaintiffs' bill, and would allow him all the time necessary to repay said loan, and would allow even more time if he would execute the statement than otherwise. They also represented that they wished to take in a partner to strengthen their standing and promote their business. They also represented that they had engaged or were about to engage in some large business enterprises, which would require a great deal of money, and on that account they would be obliged to borrow large sums of money. And they claimed and represented that, while they did not want respondent's property, and did not expect him to pay any faster than he was doing, still the situation of their business with him was such, as they claimed, as to impair their credit, and on that account they demanded a statement from respondent showing that they were the owners of this vast estate, and not the respondent, whereby they might be able to get such credit as they might need for their own purposes, and also to enable them the better to carry the loan held by respondent; and on that day they presented to him, and requested the signature of himself and his wife to, the paper writing referred to in the plaintiffs' bill as Exhibit F, which writing was prepared by them, and was not fully considered or understood by respondent, but respondent was specially and freely informed by all of said parties, and also by the said D. C. Reherd, who was present at the time, and who was taken in by them as a partner in said loan, that said paper writing was not intended to have any effect upon his ownership and rights to said lands, or impair in any way his indulgence in the repayment of the loan, but that such writing would be the means of enabling them to give him all the time he might need for that purpose." It is further alleged in the answer that the plaintiffs had violated that clause of the contract of January 23, 1899, providing for sale of the timber, and the crediting of the proceeds on the purchase money of the lands. In this connection it is averred that in 1899, prior to October 6th, an offer of $9,000 had been made for the timber on one of the tracts, and that later other parties had offered $10,000 for it, but that the plaintiffs refused to permit the sale; that prior to October 6, 1899, $12,000 had been offered for what is called the home place, and the plaintiffs had protested against the sale, and assured the respondent that if he would keep the land they would give him all the time he wanted on the loan; and that Taylor & Fenderson, of New York, were willing and ready to take the timber off of one of the tracts, and pay $12,000 for it, but that the plaintiffs had prevented the sale by attempting to impose unreasonable terms and conditions. The answer further avers that Taylor & Fenderson had deposited the money in bank, and filed their bill against the plaintiffs to compel them to perform an agreement made for the sale of the timber to them. The answer prays that the release of October 6, 1899, be canceled; that the plaintiffs be compelled to execute the contract of sale of timber to Taylor & Fenderson; that the proceeds of the timber be credited upon the purchase money of the land; that, if necessary, the cause be referred to a commissioner to ascertain the amount of the loan due and unpaid; and that he be allowed a day in which to pay the same.

To this answer the plaintiffs filed a special replication, the most material features of which are a denial of the charges made in the answer respecting the proposed sales of one of the tracts of land, prior and subsequent to October 6, 1899, and the refusal of the plaintiffs to accept or agree to the offers of sale, and the hindering of the sales. As to the offer of $12,000 for the home place, they deny having dissuaded the defendant from taking it, and also that they ever had any knowledge of such a proposition, and also the allegations about the sale to Taylor & Fenderson. The replication denies that the plaintiffs purchased the lands in question as agents and trustees of Snyder, that they hold the same in equity for his benefit, and that in executing the notes and paying the expenses, as stated in the contract, the defendant was acting within the premises stated in his answer, and relying upon the promises of the plaintiffs to treat their purchase and payment of money as a loan to be repaid. As to the important paper dated October 6, 1899, purporting to be an absolute release from Snyder of all further interest in the land, this replication says: "The plaintiffs further say that it is not true that the contract in writing dated October 6, 1899 (Exhibit F), was entered into by the defendants with the plaintiffs because of fraudulent misrepresentations, deceit, or fraud made or used by the plaintiffs, and all the allegations which allege any such deception or misrepresentation on the part of the plaintiffs, or either of them, for the purpose of obtaining such contract in writing, or that the same was to be used or held by them for any other purpose than that for which its legal import implies, are not true."

Depositions were taken, and the cause was submitted on the 7th day of May, 1901, when the court entered a decree by which it was "adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the injunction heretofore awarded in this cause be, and the same is hereby, perpetuated; that the plaintiffs do recover of the defendants the said real estate specifically mentioned and described in their bill in this cause filed; and that a writ of possession do issue, directed to the sheriff of this county, requiring him to place the plaintiffs in possession of said real estate." From this decree, Snyder has appealed.

The pleadings, evidence, and decree must be viewed in the light of the relations which the parties sustained to one another in respect to the transactions and the property involved in the cause. Whether Snyder can have relief from the release executed by him upon the ground set forth in his answer, which prays affirmative relief against the plaintiffs—assuming that the allegations he makes of representations as to the use to be made of the release, and of the promise and assurance on the part of the plaintiffs that it should not interfere with or bar Snyder's right to pay the purchase money and keep the lands—to be sustained by evidence, depends absolutely upon whether their relations were such at the time of the execution of that release as to bring the transaction within equitable principles which do not obtain between strangers dealing with each other at arm's length and on equal footing. As Snyder had failed to pay what he had bound himself to pay within the time specified in the contract, and one of the stipulations of the instrument was that in case of such failure the vendors might re-enter, by the strict letter of the contract, it appears that, in executing this release, Snyder did only that which he was bound to do, namely, yield the land into the possession of the plaintiffs. So viewing the transaction, he lost nothing, was deprived of nothing, is not injured, and has no right to complain. Possession of the land, however, was only one of the elements of Snyder's claim to it. Assuming that the transaction of January 23, 1899, was an absolute sale to the plaintiffs, and a contract of resale by them to the defendant—just what appears on the face of the papers—the defendant, being in possession under the contract, held the equitable title to the land; and, even after eviction, with or without an action for that purpose, a court of equity would still have been open to him for the assertion of his right to pay the purchase money and compel a conveyance of the legal title. Hence, conceding the right of the plaintiffs to re-enter upon the failure of the defendant to pay the first purchase-money note when due, such entry, if made, would not have cut off the defendant's equity of redemption. At law, under a contract of sale, the vendor, in case of failure to pay the purchase money, might have his action of ejectment for the recovery of the possession of the land, or he may sue at law for the purchase money, or in equity for the specific execution of the contract. 2 Lom. Dig. c. 4, §§ 1, 11. The vendee may also sue in equity for the specific performance of the contract, tendering the purchase money, and praying that the vendor be compelled to convey to him the legal title, although he is in default in respect to the time of payment, unless by the terms of the contract it appears that it was intended that time should be of the essence of the contract. 2 Lom. Dig. c. 4, §§ 11, 43, 44. This is especially true when the vendee has been put in possession under the contract. In such case time of payment is rarely, if ever, regarded as material. "Resting on the equitable estate by a person in possession, without clothing it with a legal title, has never been held to be that sort of laches which prevents relief. Or, as it may be otherwise expressed, where a party, under an agreement to have a conveyance of land, holds the possession of the land, time will be no bar to his claim for specific performance." 2 Lom. Dig. c. 4, § 44, p. 103; Crofton v. Ormsby, 2 Scho. & Lefr. 604; Zane's Devisees v. Zane, 6 Munf. 406.

In equity, the vendor, under such conditions, is treated and regarded as a trustee holding the legal title to the land for the benefit of the purchaser, and the purchaser is treated as a trustee holding the purchase money for the benefit of the vendor; and, although the pleadings in a suit to compel specific performance of such contract differ from the pleadings in a suit to redeem from a mortgage and enforce an express trust, the purposes sought and results attained by these different bills are substantially the same. The vendee, mortgagor, or beneficiary of the trust, as the case may be, calls upon a court of equity to invest him with the legal title, but is allowed to do so only upon condition that he pay the purchase money or loan, or perform such other duty as he is bound in equity or by his contract to perform. The position that in equity the trust relation is regarded as existing between vendor and vendee under a contract of sale is sustained by numerous authorities. 2 Lom. Dig. c. 4, § 11; 1 Sug. Concerning the status of parties to a contract of sale of real estate, Jones on Mortgages, at section 218, says: "There can be no sensible distinction between the case of a legal title conveyed to secure the payment of a debt and a legal title retained to secure payment. The vendor holds the legal title, and all persons must necessarily take notice of it; and, although the vendee enter into possession, his deed will, of course, convey only his equitable title. Like a mortgagor in possession, he has an equity of redemption, while the vendor holds the title by reservation, rather than by grant, as in the case of an ordinary mortgage." This important equity on the part of the vendee is recognized by statute in this state. "A vendor, or any person claiming under him, shall not at law recover against a vendee, or those claiming under him, lands sold by such vendor to such vendee, where there is a writing stating the purchase, and the terms thereof, signed by the vendor or his agent." Code 1899, c. 90, § 20. Section 21 makes provision for the protection of the equitable titles of mortgagors and grantors in deeds of trust after the accomplishment of the whole purpose for which the mortgage or deed of trust was made. Then section 22 of the same chapter requires the defendant in an action of ejectment to file a notice in writing with his plea, in order to avail himself of his equitable defense, and then says, "Whether he shall or shall not make or attempt such defense, he shall not be precluded from resorting to equity for relief to which he would have been entitled, if the said sections had not been enacted."

Unless time is of the essence of the contract here, the equity of the defendant at the time he signed the release was analogous to that of the mortgagor in default. "In all ordinary cases of contract, equity does not regard time as the essence of the agreement. In all ordinary cases of contract for the sale of land, if there is nothing special in its object, subject-matter, or terms, although a certain period of time is stipulated for its completion or for the execution of any of its terms, equity treats the provision as formal, rather than essential, and permits the party who has suffered the period of lapse to perform such acts after the prescribed date, and to compel the performance by the other party notwithstanding his own delay." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1408. In the note to this section it is said: "Time may be made essence by express stipulation. No particular form is necessary, but any clause will have the effect which clearly provides that the contract is to be null if the fulfillment is not within the prescribed time." These general propositions are abundantly supported by the decisions. Kirby v. Harrison, 2 Ohio St. 326, 59 Am. Dec. 677; Jones v. Robbins, 29 Me. 351, 1 Am. Rep. 593; Johnson v. Evans, 8 Gill (Md.) 155, 50 Am. Dec. 669; Wells v. Smith, 7 Paige, 22, 31 Am. Dec. 274; Benedict v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 370, 7 Am. Dec.

484; Green v. Covillaud, 10 Cal. 317, 70 Am. Dec. 725; Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. 280, 18 Am. St. Rep. 187; Sowles v. Hall, 62 Vt. 247, 20 Atl. 810, 22 Am. St. Rep. 101. The only provision of this contract from which it might possibly be inferred that it was intended that time should be material is the one giving the right to enter upon and take possession of the property in case of failure to comply with the provisions of the contract and of the deed of trust. This falls far short of the express provisions held to be sufficient in the cases above cited. In them the contracts provided that in case of default they should be void, and the parties thereto should be released from further obligation. The re-entry clause is one of forfeiture only, such as is inserted in mortgages, and is not allowed to be enforced in equity without giving the right of redemption after forfeiture. Hoffman v. Ryan, 21 W. Va. 432.

By the execution of the release of October 6, 1899, Snyder gave up his right to call upon the plaintiffs in a court of equity for the specific execution of their contract—a right somewhat similar to the right of redemption held by a mortgagor, as has been shown. Under such circumstances, equity requires, on the part of him who obtains a release or conveyance of the equity of redemption, the utmost fairness and frankness, especially where he pays nothing or an inadequate price for what he receives. The relation is regarded as in some degree confidential. Therefore, if it be found that in obtaining this release the plaintiffs resorted to any indirection, or held out any delusive hopes or assurances by way of inducement, it cannot stand, and the parties must be placed in statu quo. In speaking of such transactions between mortgagor and mortgagee, 1 Bigelow on Frauds, at page 347, says: "Principles are applied almost as stern as those which govern where a sale by a cestui que trust to his trustee is drawn in question. To give validity to such a sale by a mortgagor, it must be shown that the conduct of the mortgagee was in all things fair and frank, and that he paid for the property what it was worth. He must hold out no delusive hopes; he must exercise no undue influence; he must take no advantage of the fears or poverty of the other party. Any indirection or obliquity of conduct is fatal to his title. Every doubt will be resolved against him." This doctrine is fully supported by the following cases: Villa v. Rodriguez, 12 Wall. 323, 20 L. Ed. 406; Morris v. Nixon, 1 How. 118, 11 L. Ed. 69; Russell v. Southard, 12 How. 139, 13 L. Ed. 927; Holmes v. Grant, 8 Paige, 245; Webb v. Rorke, 2 Scho. & L. 673; Spurgeon v. Collier, 1 Eden, 59; Vernon v. Bethel, 2 Eden, 113; Toombs v. Conset, 3 Atk. 261; Gubbins v. Creed, 2 Scho. & L. 214; McLeod v. Bullard, 86 N. C. 210; Chapman v. Mull, 42 N. C. 292; 4 Kent's Comm. 143. In England it is said that there is no presumption of fraud in the case of a conveyance by a mortgagor to a mortgagee in consideration of the mortgage debt only, as there the parties are not held to stand in a relation of confidence, but that transactions between them are looked upon with jealousy when the mortgagor, in embarrassed circumstances and under pressure, sells the equity of redemption to the mortgagee for a sum considerably less than its value. Kerr on Fraud, 194. In this last-named work, at page 183, it is said: "The principle on which a court of equity acts in relieving against transactions on the ground of inequality of footing between the parties is not confined to cases where a fiduciary relation can be shown to exist, but extends to all the varieties of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one man over another, and applies to every case where influence is acquired and abused, or where confidence is reposed and betrayed. In cases where a fiduciary relation does not subsist between the parties, the court will not, as it does where a fiduciary relation subsists, presume confidence put and influence exerted. The confidence and influence must in such cases be proved extrinsically, but, when they are proved extrinsically, the rules of equity are just as applicable in the one case as in the other." In this country, as has been shown, it is otherwise. There is a presumption against the bona fides of the transaction, for the burden is upon the mortgagee to show that he paid for the property what it was worth, and took no advantage of his superior position in obtaining the conveyance or release. 1 Big. Fraud, 347-349. This confidential relation is said to exist between vendor and vendee. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 963. From what has been said of the relation between vendor and vendee when the latter is in possession under a contract of sale, it must be apparent that the reason and necessity for jealous scrutiny on the part of courts of equity in passing upon transactions between them are almost as great as in the case of mortgagor and mortgagee. Indeed, the doctrine extends to all persons who occupy positions of trust and confidence, or influence or dependence, in fact although not, perhaps, in law. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 963; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. p. 331, § 323.

Notwithstanding the general rule in this country that the burden is upon the mortgagee to show that, in obtaining a conveyance or release of the equity of redemption, he acted with fairness and took no advantage, it is held that, in order to correct or reform a written instrument, or establish a declaration on the part of the mortgagor at the time he executed the mortgage that the equity of redemption should pass to the mortgagee, or that by a subsequent parol agreement the mortgagor surrendered his rights, the evidence must be plain and convincing beyond reasonable controversy, and, if the proofs are doubtful and unsatisfactory, the writing will be held to express correctly the intention of the parties. Howland v. Blake, 97 U. S. 624, 24 L. Ed. 1027; Hoffman v. Ryan, 21 W. Va. 415; Van Gilder v. Hoffman, 22 W. Va. 1; Lawrence v. Du Bois, 16 W. Va. 443; Davis v. Demming, 12 W. Va. 246. Here is an apparent, but not a real, contradiction. The burden is on the party claiming the relation of mortgagor to establish it. He must show that he was mortgagor, and the other party mortgagee. Then, if it appears that the latter has acquired the equity of redemption, the burden shifts, and it devolves upon the grantee to show that in procuring the conveyance or release he acted fairly and paid full value.

It is insisted here that the parol evidence offered by the defendant is inadmissible, because in violation of the rule forbidding the contradiction of a written instrument by parol evidence. But it is well settled that, in this and the similar cases above named, such evidence is admissible. It is admitted, not to contradict or vary the terms of such instrument, but to establish a constructive fraud vitiating the instrument, or a superior equity, in the nature of a trust. See the cases last above cited.

Constructive fraud on the part of the plaintiffs, as defined by the foregoing authorities, is abundantly established by the evidence. It is disclosed by surrounding circumstances, conduct of parties, direct testimony, and admissions. As has been shown, it is important to ascertain whether an adequate price was paid for the equity released. Nothing whatever was given for it here. The transaction was on its face a rescission of the contract of sale, pure and simple. The defendant's right to have specific performance was valuable. According to the testimony of the defendant, the land was worth considerably more than the debt, although when first offered at judicial sale the highest bid was less than $15,000. The quantity of the land was large, amounting to between three and four thousand acres, of which a good deal appears to have been in good condition for grazing, and a large portion covered with valuable timber. It is charged in the answer, and supported by the evidence of the defendant, that the land was purchased by the plaintiffs at a great deal less than its value. The averment of the answer was that it was purchased at a price recognized by the parties to be less than one-third of its actual value. In the replication filed by the plaintiffs this averment is denied, but it is not shown in the replication or by any testimony introduced by the plaintiffs that the value of the land was not greater than the amount for which it was resold to the defendant. It is not specifically denied in the pleadings. In applying to plaintiffs for help, Snyder had represented his property to be worth $40,000 or $50,000, and requested them to verify his statement at his expense. Some investigation was made. Rickard wrote him that if his indebtedness was not over $15,000, and his property was worth what he claimed it was, the money would be furnished, and the property purchased and resold to him at an advance of $3,000, and it would then be very cheap. This plan was executed without change, except that Rickard had to join the Liskeys to induce them to undertake it. Beyond Rickard's statement that the Liskeys were not very well satisfied with the result of the investigation, and refused to make the purchase unless he would join them, there is no testimony contradicting that of Snyder to the effect that the property was worth more than the debt.

Prior to the execution of the release the plaintiffs were indulgent. On June 19, 1899, they were notified by letter that Snyder would not be able to meet the first payment when it should become due; and Rickard replied under date of June 24, 1899, saying that his associates were very much surprised at the contents of the letter, and requested Snyder to come over at once and see what could be done. The record shows no other communications between them until October, 1899, when Rickard, the Liskeys, and Reherd all went to Snyder's home and procured the execution of the release. Concerning this transaction, Snyder says they came three or four days or more before the paper was signed, and induced him to sign it by representing that they needed some money in their business, and had been compelled to borrow money, by reason of which their credit had become impaired, and, if he would execute the release, it should not interfere with him, and he should have the land back in the same manner as originally agreed upon. He says they were all there and talked about this release for three or four days before the arrangement was consummated, and that he entered into it by reason of the fair promise made to him, and some persuasion on the part of his wife, who had the utmost confidence in the plaintiffs, and with the understanding that his rights were not to be impaired, and that he should have longer time in which to pay the money. He says they said they would give him a copy of the writing, but that as soon as it was acknowledged they left hurriedly without giving the copy, saying they wanted to get as far as Franklin that day. Elizabeth Snyder, wife of the defendant, says the release was talked about for several days, and that the plaintiffs claimed they needed it on account of some of their business dealings, and that if they got it they could give her husband more time on the money he owed them, and that she heard Rickard say in the presence of the others, in reference to the release, that it should not in any way interfere with the right of her husband to redeem the land, but that they would give him all the time he would ask, and more. Nettie Harman, a daughter of the defendant, says she was not present on the day the release was signed, but that she had stayed at her father's house the night before it was signed, and when the release was under discussion, and that Reherd told her that they wanted the release of the property in order to obtain money, and that it was not to have any effect against her father's right in the property, but was simply for their benefit, to help them in some way. She further says that on the next morning, before she went away, they were talking about the matter at the house. Her father was objecting to the release, and Reherd then said they were men of their word, and, if they did not carry out their branch of the agreement with her father, and let him have his property back, he would be a witness for him against the rest of them, and would show what the agreement was. M. C. Harman, who took the acknowledgment of the release, says all of the plaintiffs were present while he was writing his certificate of acknowledgment, and one of them said to the defendant: "You need not be uneasy. We have always intended to treat you right, and yet intend to treat you right." This was said in response to an objection made by Snyder to the form of the writing, and it was repeated once or twice, says the witness.

On October 10, 1899, four days after the release was executed, Reherd wrote Snyder a letter in which he said, among other things: "I told you when I was at your place that the Liskeys and W. H. Rickard wanted me to join them in the contract in case they had to raise the money to pay for the land; they were after me again as we were coming home." He then asked what he should do about it, and expressed a willingness to do whatever Snyder should think best. As a witness he admits the truth of the matter set forth in the letter, and adds that he was requested in May, 1899, to join in the contract. Under date of October 30, 1899, Reherd, in reply to Snyder's letter, which does not appear in the record, wrote as follows: "I received your letter of the 25 and was sorry to hear of the terrible fires you have had and hope you have had rain by this time. I saw Mr. John Liskey and W. H. Rickard, and they said I should tell you they would treat you all right about the redemption of your land in a year from now, and that you should not give yourself any uneasiness in the matter." In explanation of this letter, he says, on the witness stand, he should have used the word "resale" instead of "redemption." Being examined about it before its production, and led to believe it contained the word "authorized," he said he should have used the word "knowledge" instead of it, and, further, "I notice in all of my letters—I was looking over some copies—that I used the word 'redemption' when I ought to use the word 'resale,' and that when I use the word 'authorized' it should have been 'knowledge'; and I will just state here that they never authorized me to make a statement for them as their agent." In a letter to Mrs. Harman, dated November 30, 1899, Reherd said: " saw a letter your father wrote W. H. Rickard, and he seems to fear they will not let have his farms back; if he makes arrangements to pay for them please tell him for me that he need have no fear of that for I had a long talk with W. H. Rickard and John and Robert Liskey yesterday, and they all said if he could get the money within the twelve months from October, 1899, they would gladly let him have it back, and besides that I would be a witness for your father in case they did not do what they said." As a witness he admits that his associates told him what he, in the letter, represented that they had said, after a labored and unsuccessful effort to convey the idea that his knowledge of the redemption agreement had been imparted by Snyder. Objection is made to the use of these letters of Reherd as evidence on the ground that he was not interested with Rickard and the Liskeys in the lands at the time they were written, nor in any sense their agent. Whether they were admissible or not need not be determined, for Rickard took the stand as a witness for the plaintiffs, and solemnly testified to the truth of the salient statements contained in the letters, and that, too, against his interest, after he had joined the original parties as purchasers.

On the 9th day of October, 1899, three days after the execution of the release, Snyder wrote Rickard and the Liskeys, asking what he should do about sowing grass seed, clearing land, fixing up fences, etc., at their expense, in case he should fail to get the land back, and saying: "I will not go further or faster than I would for myself on expenses, if you leave it to me till I see what I can do; if I fail to redeem it, then the expenses and improvements is all left for you to say." No reply to this appears in the record. On October 30, 1899, Snyder wrote that forest fires had greatly damaged the property, asking what he should do about rebuilding fences and suing the party who put out the fire for damages, and saying: "So it is a big job for you if you should keep the land & if I get it back or redeem myself the same on me." After suggesting what sort of fence should be built, he said: "But you have the say yet, please advise." To this letter, which contained other references to the possibility of redemption, the record shows a reply from Rickard, dated November 1, 1899, saying, for himself and associates, that they were unable to say just what he should do about rebuilding the fencing or suing for damages, but that he, as tenant, might take such action as he might think best; leaving to them, as owners, the adjustment of the permanent damages. In the same letter they declined to authorize him to have clearing done on the land. On the 16th day of November, 1899, Snyder wrote again, saying he had before that time written them concerning an offer from some parties to buy the timber on the upper farm, and that he thought he could get from five to seven thousand dollars cash for it. He reminded them that he had written upon that subject some 10 days before, but had received no answer, and urged them to permit him to make the sale and apply the proceeds on the purchase money of the land, and said he could raise the balance of the money and pay it all up. This letter concludes as follows: "What do you say? Answer at once. The parties is here wanting to buy will pay spot cash. Gentlemen, I think you ought to do this; give me this opportunity to redeem myself. I think that the $3,000.00 that I gave you in the start ought to satisfy you all well; answer at once fully what is the reason you did not answer my other letters like this one on the same subject." On November 20, 1899, Rickard wrote, acknowledging the receipt of Snyder's letter, and saying the Liskeys were very much provoked that he had had possession of the property for nearly 12 months since he promised to pay the delinquent taxes, and had finally written that he was unable to do so, and that they wanted some definite answer at once, as the property was threatened with sale. As to the proposed sale of the timber, the letter said: "They say they will sell provided they can get its worth, but the timber is not on the market to be hawked about subject to all kinds of offers. If the parties to whom you refer will submit a proposition to us of purchase, we will reply at once. If the offer is, in our opinion, what the timber is worth we will sell if the terms suit us, otherwise it is not for sale." This letter closed with an expression of the hope that "this is a full answer to your question of sale." This seems to have been very unsatisfactory to Snyder, as well as out of harmony with what he had understood up to that time to be the agreement. In reply he wrote November 22, 1899, saying, among other things: "Yours of the 20th inst., to hand, but nothing in it satisfactory as in answer to my letter or in fact the last two letters. * * * Why do you avoid answering my questions? * * * If you get your $19,000 and its interest what need you care about the taxes. * * * Now all I ask of you gentlemen is to give me the privilege to sell the timber on that upper farm for $7,000 Spot cash & you get the money and credit me with it in my $19,000 or what it is Sum over, & I will pay you the rest in a very short time; in time for you to take up all your other obligations when the next payment falls due or before; I don't look to get one cent till you are fully paid isn't this right? Didn't you say that all you wanted was your money back & the interest and your $3,000 profits for your favor; didn't you agree to this? I hope you do not intend to take it all and turn me out of house and home. * * * Why do you hesitate & stand back and give me no chance to Redeem myself when opportunity presents its Self? * * * Answer me definitely what I can depend on, & not answer so indefinitely & evade my questions; answer as you mean; if you don't intend to let me have my land back Say so & don't keep me in the dark or in a Strain." On November 27, 1899, Rickard answered, and said: "We are men of our word and will fulfill any promise we make, and it is of no use to repeat same; we positively refuse to give you an option on the property or otherwise handicap ourselves or 'embarrass' the title of same. We intended visiting you next week and looking over the timber on upper tract and setting a price on it, but since you make a direct offer of $7,000.00 for the timber in cash we have concluded to take that for it if tendered within a few days; we have another party who wants to look at it, but if we hear from you or your people that they will take it at above price that will settle the matter with the other gentlemen. So let us hear from you at once. Now, as to selling you the property we will sell it to you if you are ready to buy 'now' right along the lines we have always talked and at the same price, but this does not give you or anybody else an option for the future. If you are not ready to buy then this settles the matter for the present; I am sure this is plain enough and ought to be entirely satisfactory to you; we want to be entirely understood; we reserve the right in the future as we have in the past to do just as we do now, viz., consider any proposition made to us to reject or accept same at our pleasure." Snyder seems to have understood from this that he would be permitted to sell the timber and pay for the land as provided in the original contract of January 23, 1899. About two months later he wrote again, saying that he had about consummated a sale of the timber on the upper place at $7,000, and would be able soon to sell the timber on the lower farm, and, if so, it would enable him to redeem the land.

In connection with this correspondence, Rickard's testimony must be considered. He says that, after the execution of the release, Snyder and his wife seemed to be very much hurt over their failure, and that the former had said that he felt that he could repurchase the land if they would give him the opportunity to do so upon liberal terms, and that in response to this he was advised that in all such efforts he would be the worse off, but that if he should get in shape at any time, and convince them that he could, with his own money, during the year of his rental contract, purchase the property and save a home for himself, they would be willing to enter into an agreement with him upon such terms as might be agreed upon, or liberal terms, but they were not willing to give him an option, or anything that might handicap the title, or give anybody else the privilege to take their place and get the benefit of a profit that they might have in case of a rise in prices, after they had purchased the property in a panic, and carried it through, when nobody else would pay the price. Reherd also narrows his evidence to the extent of saying that Rickard and the Liskeys had stated, in their conversations with him concerning their agreement with Snyder, that the price at which he was to have the land back had not been fixed. While Rickard does not say at what price he had said Snyder could have the land back, it is to be noted that his language, as given by himself, imported, and was calculated to lead Snyder to believe, that he could have it upon the original terms. They required him to purchase with his own money, denied him the privilege of borrowing money from others, and safeguarded the property from falling into the hands of anybody but Snyder. While he says this agreement was made after the execution of the release, he admits that it was made on the same day and at the same place. Considering his testimony in connection with the evasiveness of his letters to Snyder, written in response to Snyder's appeal for an absolutely frank and definite statement as to whether the plaintiffs would comply with what Snyder said was their agreement, namely, that he might redeem, and in connection with the positive testimony of Snyder and his wife and daughter, and the corroborative testimony of Harman, the conclusion that Snyder was led to believe and did believe that, notwithstanding the release, he still had the right to redeem, is irresistible. But Rickard says the agreement or offer to let Snyder have the land back was made after the release was executed. If so, it could scarcely be said to have been an inducement to the execution of that instrument. In this connection it is to be remembered that Snyder and his wife say the plaintiffs negotiated for this release for a period of at least three or four days, and hastily took their departure after its execution. As to these important facts bearing upon the question, all the plaintiffs are silent. The long pendency of these negotiations is suggestive of persuasion and inducement, and corroborative of the testimony of the witnesses for the defendant. If Harman is to be believed, there was some prior oral agreement which at the moment of acknowledgment the plaintiffs assured the defendant they would comply with. Rickard admits that there was a sort of consolatory agreement or offer on the day of the execution of the release, but the two Liskeys, who were present, are silent as to whether such arrangement was made on that day, even after the execution of the release. Reherd, who undoubtedly had several conversations with these people, and was not only intimate with them, but closely allied with them in business enterprises, and finally joined them in this, testifies to their having told him that Snyder should have the land back if he raised the money within 12 months, and does not say they qualified it to the extent to which Rickard qualifies it in his testimony. He does not say they told him the agreement was made after the execution of the release, and it is to be remembered that it was discussed between them for the purpose of informing Reherd of the exact conditions, so that he might know whether to join them.

Whether made before or after the execution of the release, the agreement undoubtedly was that Snyder should have the land back upon payment of the price specified in the contract of January 23, 1899. This clearly appears from Rickard's letter of January 27, 1900. What else could he have meant by saying they would sell Snyder the land right along the lines they had always talked, "and at the same price"? His testimony imports that no price had been mentioned, and that it remained to be fixed, as part of the liberal terms, in case Snyder should ever become able to repurchase. The letter of January 27, 1899, flatly stamps this an error, and at the same time supports Snyder's claim that a price was fixed, and there is nothing to indicate that it was different from the original purchase price. As the agreement was, in substance and effect, exactly what Snyder claims it was, namely, that he should have the land at the original price, notwithstanding the release, it is wholly unimportant that they called it a resale, and refused to give an option. Again, what did he mean by saying "right along the lines they had always talked"? Does not "always" go back beyond the date of the release? Can anybody read these letters without concluding that Rickard's was written to reassure Snyder that he might redeem? Can it be doubted that the words "always" and "same price" were used deliberately? What could have been the promise he said it was "of no use to repeat," other than that Snyder might still pay the money and keep the land? In the same letter, and same connection, Rickard said they would sell the timber on the upper farm. This, too, was one of the terms of the original contract. True, he did not say the purchase money of the timber might be credited on the purchase money of the land as provided by the contract, but he said the timber might be sold, and Snyder could have the land back—two of the things asked by him—and evaded a direct answer as to the right of redemption, and this to a man known to him to be illiterate and in a distressed state of mind. It was substantially an admission of the claim of Snyder. To this equivocation and evasion add the flat contradiction and admission on a vital point just referred to, and the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs stands self-discredited, while that of the defendants stands substantially admitted, except on the single question whether the agreement was made before or after the execution of the release.

On this point enough has probably been said to clearly show that the court ought to have found on it for the defendant. But there are other circumstances tending to prove the contention of Snyder. Although the surrender of the purchase-money notes is stated in the release to be one of the considerations for its execution, and the release was recorded, they were never surrendered, but are still held by the plaintiffs. Rickard says they, together with the deed of trust, were left in his custody to be copied and to be compared by Albert Snyder, who was to come to Harrisonburg and bring some cattle to plaintiffs, and then take the papers back to his father, but he never came. Snyder, however, says the papers to be sent him were copies of the release and rental contract. In a postscript to his letter of November 27, 1899, Rickard said: "Some time ago I had the papers copied to send you but thought you would come over this fall and we could compare copy with original. Is there any one here who could do this for you, or shall I send them to you by mail?" A very natural inquiry here is why should comparison by Snyder be important, if original papers were to be sent to him, and copies retained by Rickard? Could not Rickard see for himself whether the copies he desired to retain were true and correct? What possible interest could Snyder have in seeing that copies to be retained by Rickard were correct? Again, of what practical use could copies of canceled and surrendered papers be to the plaintiffs? Was the withholding of these notes, contrary to the terms of the release, an act intended to lull Snyder into a feeling of security, and in pursuance of the agreement as claimed by him? Did the plaintiffs hurry away as soon as the release was signed, without leaving copies of it and the rental contract, lest Snyder's meditation over the ironclad terms of these papers should create dissatisfaction, and arouse him to a premature demand of his rights under the verbal agreement? This, too, looks probable. Why were these papers not surrendered on October 1, 1900, when Rickard and Snyder appear to have been together, or on October 20, 1900, when Rickard and probably all his associates were at Snyder's house? Is there any reason why they could not have taken them there? Taken in connection with Snyder's pending efforts to sell the timber and raise the money to pay for the land, the further detention of the notes is rather significant, and tends to uphold Snyder's claim and condemn that of the plaintiffs. Moreover, at or about the time the new rental contract of October 20, 1900, was entered into at Snyder's house, another extension of 60 days was given Snyder. On October 7, 1900, Reherd wrote Snyder, saying, "I hope you have arranged your affairs so I can try and get the time extended." This occurred after he became interested in the land, and before the date of the second rental contract. Explaining, he says he does not know why he used the word "extended," but supposes it referred to the refusal given Snyder to repurchase within one year from October 6, 1899. He further contradicts himself. He says that when the second rental contract was executed they told Snyder that, if he got the money within sixty days, he could buy the place back, but that "there was no price set," so far as he knew. Afterwards, in explaining his use of the word extended, he says, "On October the 6th we had given him the price and terms on the place for 60 days."

Thus it appears that, treating the parties as vendors and vendee, under a contract of sale, the defendant is entitled to specific execution of the contract, notwithstanding the release executed by him. But the theory of the defendant's case is that the original purchase by the plaintiffs, and resale to him, are to be treated in equity as a loan by the plaintiffs to the defendant of money on the faith of the land as security, and that the transaction was intended to be, and was in fact, such loan. Many cases illustrating the principle relied upon have been decided by this court, but none of them stand upon like or strikingly similar facts. It is universally held that the intention of the parties to the transaction, gathered from the circumstances attending it, the conduct of the parties, the face of the written contract, and parol evidence, must control. Thompson v. Davenport, 1 Wash. (Va.) 125; Dabney v. Green, 4 Hen. & M. 101, 4 Am. Dec. 503; Lawrence v. Du Bois, 16 W. Va. 443; Sadler v. Taylor, 49 W. Va. 104, 38 S. E. 583; 2 Min. Ins. 329; Jones, Mort. 258. Certain rules have been laid down by this court for guidance in seeking the intention of the parties, but some of them are clearly inapplicable here. It appears that the grantor was hard pressed for money, but not that the grantees were known money lenders. Nor can it be said that the rule of gross inadequacy of price clearly applies here. On the contrary, it is undisputed that Snyder applied to the plaintiffs for a loan or their indorsement for the purpose of enabling him to pay off his indebtedness, and also that the possession of the land remained with Snyder, and without the payment of rent, until October, 1899. For the rules laid down by this court, see Klinck v. Price, 4 W. Va. 4, 6 Am. Rep. 268; Lawrence v. Du Bois, 16 W. Va. 443; Davis v. Demming, 12 W. Va. 281; Vangilder v. Hoffman, 22 W. Va. 2; Hoffman v. Ryan, 21 W. Va. 415; Mathe-ney v. Sandford, 26 W. Va. 386. In all those cases the relations of the parties and the contracts passed upon were so different from the transactions now under consideration that these rules furnish very slight aid in this case. The possession of the defendant without payment of rent was consistent with his contract of purchase, and cannot be regarded as a circumstance in itself strongly tending to show that a loan, and not an absolute sale, was intended to be effected by the parties. This case resembles not so much those to which reference has been made, as it does a long list of other cases holding that, if an absolute conveyance be made and accepted in payment of an existing debt, and not merely as security for it, an agreement by the grantee to reconvey the land to the grantor upon receiving a certain sum within a specified time does not create a mortgage, but a conditional sale. Sadler v. Taylor, 49 W. Va. 104, 38 S. E. 583; Kerr v. Hill, 27 W. Va. 576; Jones, Mort. § 265; Glover v. Payn, 19 Wend. 519; Conway v. Alexander, 7 Cranch, 218, 3 L. Ed. 321; Wallace v. Johnstone, 129 U. S. 58, 9 Sup. Ct. 243, 32 L. Ed. 619; Rue v. Dole, 107 Ill. 275; Stratton v. Sabin, 9 Ohio, 28, 39 Am. Dec. 418; Wallace v. Smith, 155 Pa. 78, 25 Atl. 807, 35 Am. St. Rep. 868; Stahl v. Dehn, 72 Mich. 645, 40 N. W. 922; Digman v. Moore, 8 Wash. 312, 36 Pac. 146; Swarm v. Boggs, 12 Wash. 246, 40 Pac. 941. In each of these cases there was an absolute conveyance, and then a defeasance, either in the deed or a separate paper, providing that the grantee should reconvey within a specified time upon payment by the grantor of so much money, or that within a certain time the grantor might repurchase. But there was not in any of them any clause by which the grantor bound himself to pay the money and take a conveyance of the land. These defeasances were held to amount to nothing more than options given the grantor to repurchase, and the conveyances were held to be conditional sales, and not mortgages. Had the defeasances bound the grantor to pay the money and take the land, the conveyances would probably have been held mortgages, since it appears from the opinions delivered that the absence of any clause so binding the grantor was virtually held to be decisive of the question.

In another long list of cases it is held that one who purchases at a foreclosure or execution sale for the benefit of the debtor, and upon an agreement to convey to him upon the subsequent repayment of the amount paid, takes the property as a mortgagee, even when the debtor has not actually paid any money toward the purchase, if he has abstained from bidding, or induced others so to do, whereby the purchaser obtained the property at a price below its real value. Jones, Mort. § 332; Ryan v. Dox, 34 N. Y. 307, 90 Am. Dec. 696; Brown v. Lynch, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 147; Sahler v. Signer, 37 Barb. 329; Guinn v. Locke, 1 Head, 110; Helster v. Maderia, 3 Watts & S. (Pa.) 384; Roberts v. McMahan, 4 G. Greene, 34; Sandfoss v. Jones, 35 Cal. 481; Smith v. Doyle, 46 Ill. 451; Beatty v. Brummett, 94 Ind. 76; Reece v. Roush, 2 Mont. 586.

The principle announced in these last-named cases seems to be fairly applicable to the transaction now under consideration. The purchase in each of these cases was held to have been made for the benefit of the debtor, and upon an agreement to reconvey to him upon repayment of the purchase money, interest, and costs. These differ from the cases in the former list in this: that, in the cases in said former list, the purchases were not made at judicial sales, nor upon an agreement to reconvey, nor does it appear that, in addition to the agreement to reconvey in case the option to repurchase should be exercised, there was any declaration of trust made by the grantee. In the cases given in the last list, all these things appear. An examination of the transaction of January 23, 1899, between the plaintiffs and defendant in this cause, reveals the fact that the purchase made by the plaintiffs at the judicial sale was intended for the benefit of the defendant. It appears from the testimony of the plaintiffs, as well as that of the defendant, that prior to the sale it was understood and agreed that the plaintiffs would purchase the land of the defendant for the purpose of reselling it to him at an advance of $3,000. This arrangement was perfected, as has been shown. Snyder, the debtor, paid all the expenses of the plaintiffs; amounting, as he claims, to $300. He says further that he procured certain liens to be released in order to reduce the amount of the indebtedness on the land, and on the day of sale kept other people from bidding on the property by representing that the plaintiffs would purchase for his benefit. The plaintiffs do not deny that he paid their expenses, including attorney's fees, nor that he reduced the amount of the indebtedness, nor that he kept persons from bidding on the property, but they say they did not authorize him or direct him to do so. In his letter of January 11, 1899, Rickard said to Snyder that he felt sure that the persons whom he had seen in Snyder's interest would buy the property, and resell it to him, and give him an extension of time for such an advance as would be reasonable; that they would not go security, nor lend money out of the state of Virginia, but were willing to buy the land, and trust to Snyder's health to make the payments; that he would have to pay more for the property (naming $3,000), but it would still be very cheap, and he would then owe honorable gentlemen, who would treat him differently from what he had been treated, according to his letters; and that he would have to pay, in addition, all expenses of looking up the title, writing papers, etc., and pay the expenses of four gentlemen to visit him. The terms stated in this letter were fully embodied in the final agreement made and executed by the parties. The plaintiffs purchased and entered into a contract of sale with defendant on the same day. It was all one transaction, fully agreed upon and understood prior to its execution. The plaintiffs did not purchase with the expectation of keeping the land, or deriving any advantage from their purchase, except a profit of $3,000 on the transaction. Except for the $3,000, it was confessedly for the benefit of Snyder. Prior to January 23, 1899, Snyder was the legal and equitable owner of the land, subject to indebtedness to various persons amounting to over $16,000. On that day he became the debtor, by express contract of the plaintiffs, in the sum of over $19,000, and continued to hold the equitable title to the land, while the plaintiffs held the legal title for their security. He was their debtor, bound by an express contract to pay them the money and take the land. The relation of debtor and creditor existed between him and them. This is one of the strongest indications of a mortgage. In Davis v. Demming, 12 W. Va. 246, this court held that: "The distinction between a mortgage and a conditional sale is that where money is not loaned, but is advanced, with an agreement that, if it be repaid at a given time, the vendee will reconvey the land, and the whole transaction shows clearly that no debt really remained after the execution of the deed, such transaction is a conditional sale; but if, no matter in what form the papers might be drawn, the whole transaction shows that after the execution of the deed the debt still remained, such transaction will be held a mortgage." Jones, Mort. § 265, says: "The existence of a debt is the test." In Conway v. Alexander, 7 Cranch, 218, 3 L. Ed. 321, Chief Justice Marshall said: "It is therefore a necessary ingredient in a mortgage that the mortgagee should have a remedy against the person of the debtor." On the whole, the transaction of January 23, 1899, in view of the prior understanding and agreement that it should be consummated exactly as it was carried out, and the fact that Snyder paid all expenses, reduced the indebtedness, and induced bidders to refrain from bidding, cannot be regarded as anything other than a single transaction, the sole object of which was to put the plaintiffs in the shoes of Snyder's creditors, with the added advantage of having the legal title in themselves for their security, with an additional $3,000 for their risk and the use of their money, while Snyder was to have every other benefit arising from it. This clearly stamps it a mortgage. It is wholly immaterial that the parties did not call it a mortgage, but saw fit to term it a purchase by the plaintiffs, and resale by them to the defendant. It matters not what they call it. The law fixes its real character. "Whenever there is in fact an advance of money, to be returned within a specified time, upon the security of an absolute conveyance, the law converts the transaction into a mortgage, whatever may be the understanding of the parties. Even a sheriff's sale will be converted into a mortgage when it is made the means to carry out the agreement of the parties to raise money by way of loan, and the loan is made in consequence of it." Jones, Mort. § 332.

It is needless to say that the reasons given for holding that the release of October 6, 1899, does not bar the right to specific performance, on the theory that the parties stand in the relation of vendor and vendee, are more clearly sufficient to sustain the like holding that it does not bar the right of the mortgagor to redeem. Viewing the parties as sustaining the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, equity is somewhat more liberal to the mortgagor than to a vendee seeking specific performance. The latter must tender with his bill the purchase money, when he calls for a conveyance of the legal title. 20 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 458, 459. In the case of a mortgagor, it is not necessary to make an actual tender of the money with the bill. An offer to pay whatever may be found to be due is sufficient. Jones on Mort. § 1095. In the case of a mortgage, it is the practice to direct the land to be sold, the debt and costs paid, and the residue, if any, to be paid to the mortgagor. Bart. Chy. Pr. 992. A vendor has the option to cause the land to be sold, and the proceeds thus disposed of, or to rescind the contract for failure of the vendee to comply with his part of it. Hence, if the vendee desires specific performance, he must aver his readiness and willingness to pay the purchase money, as a bar to the vendor's right to rescind. The omission of this averment in the answer of defendant praying affirmative relief makes it defective as a cross-bill for specific performance, but that is immaterial, since it appears that the relation of the parties is that of mortgagor and mortgagee, on which basis the matters in difference between them must be settled. The discussion of their rights on the assumption that at the time of the execution of the release they sustained the relation of vendor and vendee is simply an elaboration and illustration of the principle upon which relief from a release of an equity may be set aside on the ground of constructive fraud. However, the averment of the answer is hardly sufficient. It may be argued from it that the defendant desires to redeem, and is willing to pay the debt, but this averment is qualified and limited by the prayer for relief in reference to the sale of timber, as provided in the contract of January 23, 1899. As these sales of timber could not be made, except by the consent of the plaintiffs, that clause of the contract is too uncertain to be enforceable. He must unqualifiedly express an offer to pay whatever may be found due on the mortgage debt. However, it is familiar law that when the court can see that, on the evidence, a plaintiff has a good case, relief in which cannot be decreed because of a defect in the bill, an amendment will be permitted, and the cause remanded, with leave to amend. Snyder is in a like situation. On the evidence, he has a good case for relief by a cross-bill, to which his answer corresponds, but it is defective because he fails to offer to do equity. Therefore the decree can be reversed, and the cause remanded, with leave to him to amend his answer in this respect.

As the cause is to be remanded with leave, as aforesaid, it is proper to say, by way of guidance in further proceedings, that, upon strict and full proof, such as to preclude the existence of any shift or device to evade the statute against usury, the plaintiffs may be allowed any just and reasonable expenses incurred by them in making their loan, and not already paid by the defendant. 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (1st Ed.) 1013; Bridges v. Sheldon (C. O.) 7 Fed. 17, 18 Blatchf. (U. S.) 507; Nourse v. Prine, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 69, 11 Am. Dec. 403; Smith v. Wolf, 55 Iowa, 555, 8 N. W. 429; Beadle v. Munson, 30 Conn. 175. This is not improper where the expense of examining the title and similar services is incurred by the lender at the instance and request of the borrower, and on the faith of his promise to pay it. 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (1st Ed.) 1013; Harger v. McCullough, 2 Denio (N. Y.) 119; Thurston v. Cornell, 38 N. Y. 281; Jones v. Berryhill, 25 Iowa, 289. It is proper to remark, also, that as the status of the defendant is substantially that of a mortgagor filing a bill to redeem, without having made a previous tender of the amount due, the costs in the trial court are to be included in the decree against him, but not the costs in this court. 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 623, citing a large number of cases.

No further suggestions are deemed necessary, it being assumed, now that the relations of the parties have been defined, that, under the advice of competent counsel, the defendant will make such amendments in his answer as will give him such relief as he desires, within the limits of his rights as herein ascertained.

For the reasons stated, the decree will be reversed, the injunction dissolved, except in so far as it prohibits and restrains the defendants, their agents, servants, employees, and tenants, from cutting and manufacturing into lumber any timber on any of the lands in the bill and proceedings mentioned, and from removing or selling any lumber already manufactured at the mill on said lands, and the cause remanded, with leave to both parties to make such amendments to their pleadings as may be consistent with the principles stated and rights adjudicated as herein indicated, and for such further proceedings as the parties may be entitled to have under principles here announced, and the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

BRANNON, J. (dissenting). Sampson Snyder, was owner of a number of tracts of land in Randolph county—in all, about 3,600 acres—and became financially embarrassed, and in a chancery suit his lands were decreed to be sold for debts amounting to upwards of $16,000. They were sold under the decree to Robert Liskey, John W. Liskey, and W. H. Rickard for $16,660, and the sale was confirmed. On the day of the sale, 23d January, 1899, the two Liskeys, Rickard, and

Snyder entered into a sealed contract by which said Liskeys and Rickard sold to Snyder the same lands for $19,660, and expenses of the vendors in travel from Harrisonburg, Va., to Beverly; and attorney's fees for examining titles. Snyder paid no money down, but gave his bonds for the purchase money, payable at different dates in future. Said contract provided that, on failure of payment, Snyder should surrender possession of the lands. On 6th October, 1899, an agreement under seal was made between the Liskeys, Rickard, and Snyder, which recited that the Liskeys and Rickard had purchased the lands at the judicial sale, and that Snyder, by said contract of 23d January, 1899, had the privilege to redeem the lands by payment of large sums set out in that contract, and that Snyder had found it impossible to raise the money to meet any of the installments payable under that contract, and that, in consideration of $1 paid, and the further consideration that the Liskeys and Rickard surrender to Snyder all bonds executed by him for purchase money under the contract of 23d January, 1899, and also surrender a deed of trust upon some personal property and two lots in the village of Harmon, given by both Sampson Snyder and his son John Snyder to further secure payment of the purchase money required by said contract, the said Sampson Snyder released all right and title to said lands, and all claims and demands against said Liskeys and Rickard, or said land, growing out of any transaction whatever, and no party to said agreement should thereafter have any claim or demand against another, growing out of said transaction of 23d January, 1899. On the same date with this release agreement, 6th October, 1899, a written lease of said lands by Liskeys and Rickard to Sampson Snyder was made, by which the Liskeys and Rickard let said lands to Snyder for one year; the consideration stated being that Snyder was to pay $600 as balance due on rent for the past year, and $1,200 rent for the year ensuing. Afterwards said parties made another written lease, by which the land was leased to Snyder for another term, ending 1st March, 1901, for $425. On 20th December, 1899, D. C. Reherd purchased from the Liskeys an interest in the lands. In March, 1901, Robert Liskey, John W. Liskey, William H. Rickard, and D. C. Reherd filed their bill in chancery against Sampson Snyder, stating the above facts, and the further facts that Snyder was yet in possession, refusing to surrender it to the plaintiffs; that he failed to pay the balance of rent; that a large part of the land was in sod, valuable for grazing, another part in fallow, which should be tilled and put in grass, another in a large orchard, bearing yearly 3,000 or 4,000 bushels of apples, and another part in merchantable timber of great value; that Snyder was holding possession in order to secure the benefit of the grass, meadow land, the fruit, and crops from the fallow land, and to cut, remove, and market the timber on the land, and then had a saw mill on the land, and was actively engaged in sawing the merchantable timber and selling it; that, unless restrained, he would use crops, grass, and fruit, and sell the timber, to the irreparable injury of the plaintiffs. The bill alleged Snyder to be insolvent. The bill prayed an injunction against cutting timber and manufacturing it into lumber and removing it, or cultivating and pasturing the land, taking fruit, and for general relief. Snyder filed an answer, setting up that he had applied to the Liskeys and Rickard for a loan to discharge the decree against his lands, and that he made an arrangement with them whereby they were to lend him a sum sufficient to pay the decree—the loan to be secured by a lien on the land—and they were to be present at the sale under the decree, and bring with them an attorney to advise as to the safety of the loan—Snyder to pay traveling expenses and fee of attorney; that, pursuant to this arrangement, the land was knocked down at the sale to Liskeys and Rickard, and the sale was confirmed after the execution of an agreement showing that the purchase was for his benefit, and he was to have the lands on repayment of said purchase money, with interest, and traveling expenses of the purchasers and their attorney from Harrisonburg, and his fee. The answer stated that Snyder had given the Liskeys and Rickard his bonds, not only for $16,600, the price they purchased the land for under the decree, but also $3,000 bonds required by them upon the loan, in addition to interest, traveling expenses, and attorney's fee. The answer charged that Liskeys and Rickard had purchased for the benefit of Snyder at the judicial sale, and they were not in fact the purchasers, but merely the agents and trustees of Snyder, and took by the judicial sale no title against Snyder, except as an equitable mortgage for the money paid by the purchasers and interest. The answer stated that, relying upon their promises, he did enter into the contract of 23d January, 1899, by which he repurchased the lands of Liskeys and Rickard, and gave bonds for $19,660. It denied that Snyder abandoned his purchase under that contract, or admitted his inability to pay the money required by it, but that, on the contrary, the timber alone would pay it. It further charged that the Liskeys and Rickard came to his home, and requested him to give them a statement by which they could more effectually raise money to carry on business, and that they would stand by the sale contract between them, and allow him time to pay, and did not want his property, but that the state of things impaired their credit in certain business enterprises, and therefore they wanted a statement from him showing that they were owners of the lands, and presented and asked him to sign a writing prepared by them, which he did not fully consider and understand, and that, as they informed him that the paper was not intended to have, and would not have, any effect upon his ownership, he signed it—the same paper or release mentioned above, dated 6th October, 1899. The answer stated that the two leases of the land were only given to strengthen the credit of the Liskeys and Rickard, and not to operate as a relinquishment of his right to the land. The answer prayed that, upon payment to the plaintiffs of the sum legally due to them, they be required to convey to him the said lands. Upon the hearing a decree was entered for the plaintiffs, perpetuating the injunction, granting a recovery of the lands by the plaintiffs, and awarding them a writ of possession, and Snyder appeals.

Snyder rests his case upon the theory that the Liskeys and Rickard bought in the land for his benefit at the judicial sale, and that he is thus entitled to have the land, upon principles found in numerous cases. Currence v. Ward, 43 W. Va. 367, 27 S. E. 329; Walraven v. Lock, 2 Pat. & H. 547; Heiskell v. Powell, 23 W. Va. 717. Though it is the theory of Snyder that the purchase at the judicial sale was in fact for his benefit—his purchase—yet I do not regard even his answer, and more plainly yet his own evidence, as showing that. They show that the contract was that Liskeys and Rickard were to purchase and then sell the land as their own property to Snyder. Snyder could not buy. They were no relation to him—under no call to come hundreds of miles simply to buy in the property for him without profit to themselves. That theory does not bear the face of plausibility. It was a serious thing for them to make this trip, and make themselves personally liable for $16,660, for nothing. I do not know that this trust-purchase theory is material, in view of the release agreement of 6th October, 1899, and the leases; but if we can say that at the birth of the transaction, in the judicial sale, there was no trust, it goes to dissipate Snyder's claim based on a trust. If it did not exist then, when did it arise? If a trust existed, and were not afterwards released, it would deny the plaintiffs the so-called bonus of $3,000 in fixing the amount due. But as stated, a fair interpretation of facts stated in the answer and in Snyder's evidence is that there was no arrangement to buy in the land for Snyder's use. That such is the truth is plainly shown, not only by the evidence of Liskey and Rickard, but by a letter from Rickard to Snyder telling him that he had seen some parties in his behalf, and that if his property was worth what Snyder represented, and his debts were not over $15,000, those parties would buy the property at $15,000, and then sell it to Snyder on time, but would not lend, and that he would have to pay $3,000 more, and traveling expenses, and attorney's fee for investigating title. This shows that the sale was not to be in trust for Snyder, and that he accepted the proposition with eyes open to this fact. Will a court of equity make it another contract—a mere loan—in the face of this? Of course, the letter of the record of sale is against such trust purchase. Then on the very day of the sale a formal contract is signed by Snyder, declaring that the Liskeys and Rickard purchased under that sale, and had sold the land to Snyder. Snyder says as a witness that that contract was agreed to before the sale—that arrangement as to the sale. It was no purchase for Snyder. The parties declined to loan or indorse, or act in any other form than as purchasers, with absolute rights as such; and he knew it, and let them purchase on that faith. He says that, owing to this arrangement, he deterred others from buying, when others would have bought at a higher price. This proves nothing. Would others have sold to him and indulged him? Would the land have sold for more? It had been twice before offered for sale; the best bids being at one sale $10,000, at another $13,000, and then an upset bid of $15,000. This does not sifow, but negatives, that Snyder could have done better. It negatives inadequacy of price, or any deductions or claims based on that theory, though that cuts no figure in the case. Now, how can Snyder, in the face of all these things—in the face of his written admission in that contract that those parties were the purchasers—deny that fact, and say they were purchasers in trust? If so—if that were the truth—we should expect a paper so stating, and giving him, in so important a matter, involving his all, a right simply to repay, and get his land back. He was about 58 years of age, entirely capable of contracting. True, he was an unfortunate debtor, in hard circumstances, like thousands before and since, and our mere sympathy goes out to him in his distress; but we cannot for that relieve him. True, we may say that $3,000 profit was large, but any man has right to drive a good bargain. He urged and begged those people, by letter after letter, to come to his relief—did so when the sale was at his very door—and they evinced no eagerness, and he knew their terms, and accepted them. Could he get anybody to do better for him? It does not so appear, and, if he could have done so, it would be immaterial. These purchasers came far, took upon themselves a large debt, bought land far from them, sold it to a man well advanced in years, without a dollar paid down. Liskey and Rickard on oath utterly deny that they purchased for Snyder, and solemn papers under hand and seal support them. I have said this much, not because I do not think that, if such trust purchase really existed, it was released by Snyder afterwards, but to show that there was not such trust at the beginning of this transaction, and thus no superstructure can be reared upon it.

Time passed, and the date of payment for the first installment of purchase money under that contract came, and found Snyder unable to meet it. If he could not raise one-third, how could he raise the balance? The land was involved, and a very large amount, perhaps all, of the personal property, and two village lots of himself and son also. A large debt was growing, and might not be paid by the property. He made a contract by which, in consideration of a release of the debt and the personal property and lots, he surrendered his purchase under the contract of 23d January, 1899. By that contract Snyder and wife released "all their rights and titles to said above described property, also all claims and demands against said first parties or said property as growing out of any transaction whatsoever and neither party hereto shall have any claim or demand against the other as growing out of the transaction of Jan. 23, 1899." Does not this drown and extinguish any trust in the judicial sale, or in the contract of sale, or any right in the whole transaction? His first contract promised to surrender the land for nonpayment. If not, can people contract at all? Not only that contract, but on the same day Snyder made a lease of the land, and thus became tenant; not only that, but he made a second lease for another term; not only that, but he paid a large amount of rent as tenant. Thus he confirmed that deed of release. No fraud is shown in it. If there were, it is waived by the second lease at later date, and rent. How is it possible for Snyder to deny the effect of those plain things? Do any writings bind? Does any contract? Snyder says that this release was not to affect his prior ownership. This he says in the teeth of that writing, sealed with his seal. It was a release and rescission, and yet no release or rescission. So the maker of a note once said that the understanding was that he was not to be bound, but the court said that he could not prove that understanding against a plain note. Towner v. Lucas Ex'rs, 13 Grat. 705. Same principle, Martin v. Railroad, 48 W. Va. 542, 37 S. E. 563; Hukill v. Guffey, 37 W. Va. 46, 16 S. E. 544; Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. 611; Miller v. Fletcher, 27 Grat. 403, 21 Am. Rep. 356.

It is not pretended that the execution of this release created a silent mortgage, so as to admit oral evidence under that principle. It is simply asserted that it was agreed that it should not release and impair, when itself, in its words, does that very thing. If the dangerous doctrine of allowing oral evidence to destroy writings can go thus far, then away with the vaunted superiority of written over oral evidence of men's acts, and the rule that oral evidence cannot contradict writings. The courts should narrow, not widen, the door allowing such evidence. This practice has largely repealed the statute of frauds. In these days of general education and facilities of making writings, there is less need of such a practice than long ago.

In this connection we may say that it is an easy matter to assert a trust for land, but the law steps in with no uncertain tread and says that "parol evidence to establish a trust must be clear and unquestionable." Armstrong v. Bailey, 43 W. Va. 778, 28 S. E. 766. The whole case, as put by Snyder in his answer and evidence, bears the hue of unprobability, and is contradicted by his action and the documents. But it is said that, these parties occupying the relation of trustees and beneficiary, they could not thus deal with each other. The point is void of any plausibility. Their relation, if it existed, was not a fiduciary relation of the character to apply that rule, as in case of express trusteeship.

This case is uncontrollably governed by documentary evidence of absolute and certain import, and the oral evidence is therefore unimportant; but, if this were not so, a conclusive reason why we should affirm the decree is that the oral evidence is squarely, flatly conflicting, and involves credibility of the witnesses. There is but little law involved, but the case turns on facts, and documents bring in the solvent facts. So far as oral evidence does merit consideration, I will state what is worn and trite—that this court cannot reverse the lower court when the evidence is contradictory, and the credibility of witnesses is involved. Camden v. Dewing, 47 W. Va. 315, 34 S. E. 911, 81 Am. St. Rep. 797.

It is assigned for error that the court perpetuated the injunction, and gave the plaintiff's a recovery of the land and a writ of possession. If it is meant that equity has no jurisdiction for injunction at all, the point cannot be sustained. View Snyder as a tenant committing waste; equity has clear jurisdiction for injunction to stop waste. That late excellent work, American & Eng. Decis. Eq., in volume 2, pp. 660, 668, says that the old common-law remedies are now superseded, and that "an injunction will therefore issue to restrain any act of waste by a tenant in possession whenever the threatened acts amount to a manifest injury to the inheritance and are a wanton abuse of the tenant's rights." "The remedy by injunction is so peculiarly adapted to the redress of injuries which constitute waste, that it has supplanted to a large extent the remedies at law." 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 922; 2 Taylor, Landl. & Ten. § 691. Insolvency is not requisite in case of a tenant committing waste. Viewed not as tenant, which he was, but as a trespasser, injunction lies; Snyder being insolvent, as shown by the whole record, and the damage in cutting and selling large quantities of timber entailing large damage. Becker v. McGraw, 48 W. Va. 539, 37 S. E.

532. On the theory disclosed by the answer—that of mortgage—the injunction was proper, and could not be dissolved. Core v. Bell, 20 W. Va. 189. But I suppose the assignment does not mean to question jurisdiction in the inception of the case, but only in perpetuating the injunction, and granting recovery of the land and a writ of possession at the end of the case. The case being one of a tenant guilty of waste, it was surely right to perpetuate the injunction without trial at law. University v. Tucker, 31 W. Va. 621, 8 S. E. 410. So, if the case were as Snyder contended, one of vendor and vendee, or equitable mortgage, and the mortgagor doing irreparable injury, as the evidence clearly shows that Snyder was cutting and sawing with a mill a large amount of timber. But did the court err in giving a recovery of the land and a writ of possession? Viewing the case as that of the tenant refusing possession after term expired, of course there is no equity merely for the recovery of possession; but as the court had clear jurisdiction for waste, and the bill alleged both waste and unlawful detainer, could not the court go on to give full relief by delivery of possession, under the rule that equity, having jurisdiction for one purpose, will give complete relief on the merits, and end the litigation, and not turn the parties loose for another lawsuit? Hotchkiss v. Fitzgerald, 41 W. Va. 357, 23 S. E. 576. But this action of the court does not rest alone on the consideration just stated. The bill set forth the plaintiff's title to the land, and the defendant's tenancy and detainer and waste. The answer of Snyder came in, settling up his claim under the alleged trust, presented his facts to sustain that defense, justified his detainer of possession under that claim, and, as upon a cross-bill, asked the court to adjudicate his right to the land, and to compel the plaintiff to execute the trust by conveyance of the land to Snyder on payment of the debt. Now, why should not equity, having jurisdiction on the bill, as just stated, and jurisdiction upon the cross-bill of the matters therein stated in defense of the bill, give final decision upon the rights of the parties, and, finding that the defendant had no right, give the plaintiffs their property? Note that this is not, like Freer v. Davis (decided this term) 43 S. E. 164, 59 L. R. A. 556, a contest between two distinct titles, adverse from their origin, but a question of which of the litigants was entitled to the one only title, and the land under it. It is a case where the question is one of equitable right, equitable mortgage, which can be adjudicated only in equity. The court adjudicated against this equitable title, and why should not the court give recovery and possession to the legal right, instead of sending it to a law court to get recovery? The court, if it decided, had to pass on the respective rights, and ought to have power to effectuate its decision.

GRAFTON & B. R. CO. v. BUCKHANNON & N. R. CO.*

Dec. 13, 1904.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—CROSSING ANOTHER RAILROAD—JURISDICTION—INJUNCTION.

1. The circuit courts have jurisdiction at law in proceedings for the condemnation of crossing by one railroad company over the real estate and line of another railroad company.

2. Injunction will not lie to restrain such proceedings.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Suit by the Grafton & Belington Railroad Company against the Buckhannon & Northern Railroad Company. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. G. Dayton and Fred O. Blue, for appellant. Samuel V. Woods and Reese Blizzard, for appellee.

McWHORTER, J. The Buckhannon & Northern Railroad Company, a corporation under the laws of the state of West Virginia, filed its petition, after due notice given, in the circuit court of Barbour county, for the purpose of condemning a right of way for crossing over the line of the Berry Branch of the Grafton & Belington Railroad Company, on the west side of the Tygart's Valley river, necessary to the petitioner in building and constructing its road for public use from the town of Buckhannon, in Upshur county, through the counties of Barbour, Taylor, and Marion, to Fairmont, in Marion county, and thence to the Pennsylvania state line; praying that commissioners be appointed by the said court to ascertain and report what would be a just compensation to the owners for the real estate and crossing sought to be obtained for the said purposes, and that such other proceedings might be had in said premises as the law might require, and that upon payment of compensation found to be just that petitioner might have the right and privilege to construct, maintain, and operate said railroad across the said Berry Branch of the Grafton & Belington Railroad Company at the point and place designated in said petition, notice and maps therewith filed. On the 27th day of February, 1904, the Grafton & Belington Railroad Company presented its bill in chancery against the Buckhannon & Northern Railroad Company, praying an injunction restraining the defendant from proceeding with its petition and application for a condemnation of said crossing at the point proposed, as set out in said notice, until a decree of a court of equity having jurisdiction had been obtained, decreeing that said crossing is a proper crossing, and the mode and manner of said crossing, and that the court might fix and determine what is the proper crossing, and the mode and manner of said crossing, as provided by law. The court granted the order of injunction as prayed for. The defendant answered the bill, and gave notice of motion to dissolve said injunction. On the 12th day of April the motion was heard in vacation before the judge of the circuit court of Barbour county at Grafton, when the defendant company tendered its answer, demurrer, and affidavits A and B, and moved the courts to dissolve the injunction theretofore awarded in the cause. The motion was sustained and the injunction dissolved. The plaintiff appealed from said order of dissolution of the injunction.

The first question to decide is whether an injunction will lie. It is contended by counsel for plaintiff that under section 11, c. 52, Code 1899, the applicant to condemn was necessarily required to first go into a court of equity and procure a decree for such crossing. But there is another provision in subsection 7 of section 50, c. 54, Code 1899, respecting grade or other crossings, which gives the circuit court law jurisdiction for the condemnation thereof. "It is a well-settled rule that a court of equity will not usually enjoin an action at law on grounds which may be urged as a defense to such action. Even in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, the action will not be interfered with by a court of equity, unless that court can give a more perfect remedy, or the case can be better tried by the procedure of that court." 16 A. & E. L. 365. And 1 High on Injunctions, § 45, in treating of the subject of restraining judicial proceedings, says: "It merely seeks to control the person to whom it is addressed, and to prevent him from using the process of courts of law where it would be against conscience to allow him to proceed. It is granted on the ground that an unfair use is being made of a legal forum which from circumstances of which equity alone can take cognizance should be restrained, lest an injury be committed wholly remediless at law. And the power of courts of equity to restrain the assertions or doubtful rights in a manner productive of irreparable damage, and to prevent injury to a person from the doubtful title of another, is regarded as one of the legitimate uses of equity" (and cases there cited). "In cases of concurrent jurisdiction, proceedings at law will not be interfered with by the court of chancery, unless that court can give a more perfect remedy, or the case can be better tried by the procedure of that court." Ochenbein v. Papeller, L. R. 8 Ch. 695; Hoare v. Bremridge, Id. 22; McLin v. Marshall, 1 Heisk. (Tenn.) 678. "If the defenses set up in the bill to the defendant's claim are the same as those made in the suit at law, or are only such as can be made in equity, it is clear that no injunction ought to be granted before judgment at law, although the bill may contain matter enough to warrant the granting it." Mutter v. Hamilton, 2 Hayw. 346. "The injunction should be to stay execution, not trial." White v. Steinwicks, 19 Ves. 85. The remedy of plaintiff is by writ of error, or in case the court is proceeding without jurisdiction, and a more speedy remedy is desired, the writ of prohibition could be invoked. A court of equity is without jurisdiction to enjoin the proceeding.

There being no error, the decree dissolving the injunction is affirmed, and the bill will be dismissed.

POFFENBARGER, P. (concurring). I think the injunction was properly dissolved and concur in the affirmance of the order; but I am unwilling to say on this appeal that a condemnation proceeding for a railroad crossing can be sustained in a court of law without a previous determination, by a court of equity, under section 11 of chapter 52 of the Code, or by agreement of the place of crossing and the manner of effecting it. That question is not properly before this court, and I do not think it ought to be drawn in here on the far-fetched theory that it is an additional reason for the conclusion arrived at. The statute, which the syllabus and opinion virtually nullifies, relates to great agencies of commerce and transportation, representing millions of capital, and affecting the prosperity and lives of the people in their operation. Nevertheless it is drawn in here unnecessarily and incidentally, and the intimation given out by this court that it has been repealed by implication. Going further in this indirect method, the court declares that, even if not repealed, it does not require the fixing of the place and manner of crossing before instituting the condemnation proceeding in the law court. May the railroad company, desiring the crossing, select the place and prescribe its own method of crossing, without reckoning the inconvenience and danger to the other company and detriment to the public arising from an improper location? Can the law court refuse the crossing demanded and grant another? Can it do more than find that the purpose for which the property is demanded is a public use, and that the taking is necessary, and authorize the crossing as demanded? Was it not the intention of the Legislature, in passing section 11 of chapter 52 of the Code of 1899, to remedy this defect in the condemnation proceedings for crossings by referring the place and manner of the crossing to the courts of equity, where, by means of depositions, plats, and other documents, the situation might be more carefully and fully laid before the court? This case indirectly and incidentally forecloses all these important questions.

It amply suffices for the disposition of this appeal to say injunction is never used to restrain a court from proceeding on the ground of lack of jurisdiction, and that in this case there is an adequate remedy at law. "A writ of injunction is in no just sense a prohibition to the courts of common law in the exercise of their jurisdiction. It is not addressed to those courts. It does not even affect to interfere with them. The process, when its object is to restrain proceedings at law, is directed only to the parties. It neither assumes any superiority over the court in which those proceedings are had nor denies its jurisdiction. It is granted on the sole ground that from certain equitable circumstances, of which the court of equity granting the process has cognizance, it is against conscience that the party inhibited should proceed in the cause." 2 Story's Eq. Jur. § 875. Injunction does not lie when there is an adequate remedy at law. Here there is one. After the entry of an order authorizing the applicant to take possession of the land, a writ of error with a supersedeas is immediately available and completely efficacious, if there is any error in the proceeding due to want of jurisdiction or any other cause. For the purpose of an application for the writ of error the court would enter an order suspending the judgment. No injury whatever could result. Hence there is no equity calling for relief against the applicant, and none can be had by injunction against the court.

As the bill can, in no sense, raise the question of the extent of the jurisdiction of the law court, it is utterly incapable of bringing that question before this court on appeal. We can only say it is immaterial whether the law court has jurisdiction. The remedy chosen cannot bring up that question. To test it, you must resort to the writ of prohibition.

JOSEPH SPEIDEL GROCERY CO. v. WARDER et al.*

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 20, 1904.)

JUSTICE—JURISDICTION—ACTION AGAINST CORPORATION—TRANSCRIPT OF JUDGMENT—EXECUTION FROM CIRCUIT COURT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—STATUTES.

1. A justice has jurisdiction of an action for money against a domestic corporation either in the county of its principal office or in the county where the cause of action arose, if service of process can be made in that county on a director or other officer or agent of the corporation, whether the person served resides therein or not, and the return of service need not show that he resides therein.

2. Section 118, c. 50, Code 1899, allowing a transcript of a judgment of a justice to be filed in the office of a circuit court, and execution to be issued thereon, does not violate the provision of the Constitution requiring the amount for jurisdiction of the circuit court to exceed $50.

3. Inconsistent clauses in the same section of a statute—which prevails?

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition by the Joseph Speidel Grocery Company for writ of prohibition to Hugh Warder and others. Writ denied.

A. W. Burdette, for petitioner. Ira E. Robinson, for respondents.

BRANNON, J. Hugh Warder sued the Joseph Speidel Grocery Company, a West Virginia corporation, before J. O. Jacob, a justice of Taylor county, on a money demand, and on April 2, 1904, the justice rendered a judgment by default against said grocery company for $32.20 and $2.25 costs. Warder filed a transcript of his judgment in the clerk's office of the circuit court, and caused an execution to issue to the sheriff of Ohio county, where is the principal office of said corporation, and the said grocery company moved the circuit court, and quashed the execution, but the motion was overruled. The summons in said action was served on an agent of said corporation in said county of Taylor, the return showing that the president, cashier, treasurer, or other chief officers were absent, and not found in Taylor county, and that the agent resided therein. The said corporation now applies to this court for a writ of prohibition against said justice, said Warder, and the circuit court of Taylor county, to prohibit them from further enforcing said judgment. The theory on which the prohibition is asked is that there was no jurisdiction of said action in Taylor county, because the said corporation kept its principal office in the county of Ohio, where alone it can be sued.

As to suits before justices, chapter 50 of the Code of 1899 is the sole fountain and guide to the exercise of the jurisdiction of their courts. They are courts of limited jurisdiction. They have no jurisdiction save that given by chapter 50. In section 16 we find the answer to the above question as to justices' courts: "The civil jurisdiction of a justice shall not extend to any action, unless the cause of action arose in his county, or the defendant, or one of the defendants, reside therein, or being a non-resident of the state, is found, or has property or effects, within the county." That section prohibits a civil suit in any county not in it designated. It is that section which designates the county for a civil action before justices. This section covers suits against a domestic corporation, because it has a residence in that county in which it keeps its principal office. It can therefore be sued in the county where it has that office in transitory actions. "There is therefore no difficulty in holding that, for the purposes of jurisdiction, procedure, litigation affecting a corporation, and the taxation of its personal property, it may be taken to reside where its chief office is." Its residence is where it exercises corporate functions. 1 Thomp. Corp. § 689. I repeat that section 16 points out the place of suit. Section 34 does not give the place of suit, but is designed only to provide for service of process. The heading in the Code above section 32, "Service of Process and Notices," shows that the design is only to provide for service of process, not to give the place of jurisdiction. Under section 16 suit may be in either the county of the principal office or of the cause of action.

I cannot see how we can disregard the provision in section 16 that a justice of the county of the cause of action shall have jurisdiction. A corporation is surely included within that section. A natural person is, and so is a corporation. That section would give the Taylor county justice jurisdiction, because the cause of action arose therein. Having thus jurisdiction in Taylor county, the next requisite is service of process. That is a different thing from the place of jurisdiction. It is true that a justice's summons cannot go out of his county for service, but the place of service cannot be said to give jurisdiction, though it must be in the same county. Section 34 of the Code of 1899, as amended and re-enacted in chapter 9, p. 79, Acts 1903, tells us as to service of process from a justice's court against corporations. It reads as follows: "Unless otherwise specially provided, such process or order, and any notice against a corporation, may be served upon the president, cashier, treasurer, or chief officer thereof, or, if there be no such officer, or if he be absent, on any officer, director, trustee or agent of the corporation, at its principal office or place of business, or in any county in which a director or other officer, or any agent, of said corporation may reside, or any officer or agent of said corporation in the county in which the property, land or other thing in controversy may be, or in any county where the cause of action arises. But service at any time may be made upon any corporation in the manner prescribed for similar proceedings in the circuit court." It is broad enough to cover a suit either in the county wherein is the principal office or the county in which the cause of action arose, because it declares that the process may be served in any county where the cause of action arose by serving it on certain persons, including an agent of the corporation, as in this case. When that section provides for service not only in the county of the principal office on certain officers, or, in default of them, on certain persons at its principal office, and then adds, in order to widen the scope of service, that it may be served on a director or other officer or agent in "any county where the cause of action arises," it is difficult to see how there can be any doubt of the right to sue in the county where the cause of action arose, as well as in the county of the principal office. We cannot think that the lawmakers would authorize a suit in both counties, as they did in section 16, and then, when making a statute for service of process to effectuate the jurisdiction given by that section 16, would fail to make it coextensive with the demands of section 16. We must look at both, and make section 34 of the same scope of section 16, as its words allow us to do so, in order to carry out the jurisdiction given by section 16. It is suggested that it is only when the president, cashier, treasurer, chief officer, or any other officer, director, trustee, or agent cannot be found in the county of the principal office, that suit can be brought in the county of the cause of action; but that would put a limitation upon jurisdiction contrary to section 16, which gives the plaintiff choice to sue either where the cause of action arose or the defendant resides. We cannot suppose that the Legislature designed, after giving the choice in either county, to condition that choice upon not finding certain officers in the county of the principal office.

Said section 34 is a remedial statute, designed to facilitate and further the remedy, not to narrow the jurisdiction given by the general grant in section 16. Suppose we give to section 34 the construction asked of us, and say that suit must be brought in Ohio county, if any of the officers named can be found. This would practically deny all jurisdiction in the county where the cause of action arises. Never could suit be brought there. That would compel one in Jefferson county having a contract with a corporation, and a cause of action growing out of it, to go to the other end of the state for relief. The corporation has sent its agent to Jefferson county, and made its contract there, and the Legislature thought that, as the corporation chose to make the contract there, it was nothing but right that it should be suable there. The corporation is not permitted to be sued in any county, but only in two counties. To sue it in the county of its act is not harsh. Section 2, c. 123, Code 1899, allows a corporation to be sued in the circuit court of a county in which the cause of action arises, if you can get service on it. So in a justice's court. The law in both cases points where and on whom service is to be. Why not allow it in one case as well as another? A corporation can be sued in the county where the cause of action arose, if you can get service there. The case of Harrow v. Ohio River Co., 38 W. Va. 711, 18 S. E. 926, supports this view in holding that section 34 authorizes service on an agent in the county where the suit is brought. All that this case requires us to decide on the record as it is, is as to the place for suit; all that we do decide is that there was jurisdiction before a justice of Taylor county under section 16, because the cause of action arose in that county, and that section 34 gives the means of service of the summons in that county. I will add, as it may not be without some benefit in the future, some thoughts or questions which have occurred to my mind touching section 34. Up to 1903, as the Legislature of that year thought, section 34 was defective, or not sufficiently broad. I am inclined to think at present that the first part of section

34, down to the words "or in any county in which," was designed to direct the service of process only in actions in the county of the principal office, and the balance in the county of the cause of action. The fact that a trustee is made a person for service under one clause and left out in the other tends to confirm this view. In other words, you might sue in the county of the principal office, and make service in that county on the president, cashier, treasurer, or other chief officer, or, if there were none such, or he be absent from the county, service might be made on a director, trustee, or agent at the principal office of place of business. Or the action might be brought in the county of the cause of action, provided a director or other officer or agent reside in that county, so that service could be made upon him; but he must reside in that county. No matter that the cause of action arose in that county. That would give jurisdiction; but you must also get a director, officer, or agent residing in that county for service of the summons. This was, in the opinion of the Legislature, too narrow a limitation on the right to sue in the county of the cause of action. It thought that, as the right was given by section 16 to sue where the cause of action arose, process was too much hampered by making it a condition of suit there that a director or other officer or agent must have his permanent residence there, and that the right of suit in that county ought to exist, though the director, officer, or agent was not a resident there; and in 1903 there were added to section 34, after the words "may reside," the words "or any officer or agent of said corporation in which the property, land or other thing in controversy may be, or in any county where the cause of action arises." My inclination is to think that before the act of 1903 an action could be in the county of its cause, if an officer residing in it could be found for service of process. Take detinue for a horse. I cannot think that it would be confined to the county of the principal office before the Acts of 1903. Suppose the horse was not in that county, but in another. The detention would give action in that other county, if you could get service in it on a person specified in section 34 residing in that county. So in case of a money demand. I cannot think the amendment of 1903 has really added anything to the jurisdiction, or given it in a county where there was none before; but it has authorized, in the county of the cause of action, service of process on "any officer or agent," though not residing in that county; it has dispensed with his residence there. I think that before the act of 1903 you could serve on an agent a summons in an action in the county where the cause of action arose, if he reside there; but under the act of 1903 he can be served in that county, though not residing in it. Anyhow, this act of 1903 gives the clear right to serve process in the county where the controversy of property is or the cause of action arose. The act makes that clear.

It is suggested that the act of 1903 has left section 34 just as it was before. I cannot think the act is without an effect. I am sure it has dispensed with residence in the county. I see no other change. Here we come across a question. It will be asked how this can be when the words, "or in any county in which a director or other officer may reside," are re-enacted in section 34. Are those words to be ignored? They are. Before the act of 1903 they were to be regarded and followed. They demand that the person served reside in the county. If we still regard those old words in the section, what becomes of those words coming last in the section, those latest enacted; that is, the words, "or any officer or agent in the county in which the property, land or other thing in controversy may be, or any county where the controversy arises"? Before 1903 the words demanded that the person served reside in the county, and in 1903 the Legislature amended by authorizing service on the same persons, so only that they be served in the county, leaving out all demand that they reside in it. There is irreconcilable conflict. We must look for the intent. Are we not justified in saying that the Legislature intended to allow service in the county where the cause of action arose, without requiring the person served to reside in that county? Was not that the intent? As the law allowed suit in that county, was it not the intent to make it effectual by making service on an agent there good, wherever he might reside? Would there not be as good reason to expect that the agent would let the corporation know of the suit, though he did not reside in the county, as if he did? I have said that these two clauses are inconsistent. Which shall prevail? The law answers: "Where there is an irreconcilable conflict between different parts of the same act, the last in order of position must control." 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 619. "So it has always been the rule that when different provisions of a statute, all passed at the same time, could not be reconciled, the one that came last in point of position must prevail. And this was upon the theory that effect should always be given to the latest, rather than to an earlier, expression of the legislative will, presumption being that the latter part of the statute was last considered." People v. Dobbins, 73 Cal. 257, 14 Pac. 860. See Bacon's Abridgment, 227; In re Richards, 98 Fed. 935, 37 C. C. A. 634. The words "may reside" were in section 34 before 1903. The words allowing service on "any officer or agent of said corporation in any county" were added in 1903, without any provision as to residence. So, not only for the reason that those words are last in the statute, but also because they were last enacted, are they to be controlling. The section is badly drawn. The draftsman of the act of 1903 may have erroneously thought that the office of that section was to fix the place of action, and that the section gave suit not only in the county of the office, but in any county whatever in which a director, officer, or agent might reside, and intended to let that remain so, and to add for a place of action any county wherein any such person could be served. The consideration as to residence of the party served is not material as to the county in which suit may be brought, that being fixed by section 16. It is only material in ascertaining whether the person served must reside in the county of service, and in ascertaining whether, under section 38, the return must show, if the action be elsewhere than in the county of the principal office, that the person served reside therein. I think the act of 1903 has repealed this. I will not say whether it has repealed the necessity of showing in the return the residence where the action is in the county of the office.

Another reason, suggested for the writ of prohibition is that the Constitution limits the jurisdiction of the circuit court to cases wherein the amount in controversy is over $50, and that section 118, c. 50, Code 1899, allowing a transcript of a justice's judgment to be lodged in the clerk's office of the circuit court, and execution to be issued from that office, is unconstitutional. The circuit court tries nothing. The case has ended in a final judgment before the justice. The only matter left is execution of the judgment, which is ministerial, not the exercise of judicial function. The Constitution refers to judicial action.

Prohibition denied.

NOTE BY BRANNON, J. The petition raises the question of Chaddock's agency by denying it, whilst the answer asserts it, and Speidel's affidavit denies it. The return of service states that Chaddock was an agent. The return cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding, if at all, for this cause. McClung v. McWhorter, 47 W. Va. 150, 34 S. E. 740, 81 Am. St. Rep. 785. Who is an agent for service? What must be the character of agency? These questions do not arise. As the return states that Chaddock was agent, the question really does not arise.

Prohibition refused.

POFFENBARGER, P. (concurring). Nothing in this case calls upon us to say the amendment to section 34 of chapter 50 of the Code of 1899 dispenses with the necessity of the agent's residence in the county in which service is to be had, for it is undisputed that the person served in this instance does reside in the county of Taylor. I do not think we ought to go beyond the case made. Hence I do not concur in so much of the opinion and syllabus as announces the proposition that section 38 of chapter 50 of the Code of 1899 is repealed by the amendment to section 34 of that chapter. My own views on that question are withheld, because I do not think it is before this court now for decision or discussion.

MOSSER et al. v. MOORE et al.*

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 13, 1904.)

TAXATION—SALE — VALIDITY—VACATING DEED —REDEMPTION—TENDER.

1. A list of lands delinquent for taxes and a list of lands sold for taxes, giving no specification or description whatever of a tract or lot of land sold for taxes—utterly blank therein—are void, and render a tax sale of such tract and deed under it void, and such defect is not cured by section 25, c. 31, Code 1899. Dent, J., dissenting.

2. When a tax deed is vacated for irregularity in the proceedings of record, where the land is chargeable with taxes, the owner must, as a condition precedent to the vacation of the deed, pay the purchaser what is required to be paid by Code 1899, c. 31, § 25.

3. Statutes for redemption from tax sales are to be liberally construed to attain the end.

4. If a tax purchaser refuse a redemption, not on account of the amount of money tendered, but claiming the validity of his purchase, and refusing a tender generally, the amount of money tendered, though too small, becomes immaterial.

5. A small deficiency in the amount of money tendered for redemption from a tax sale, attributable to mistake, will not vitiate the tender.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by J. K. Mosser and others against J. H. Moore and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Dalley & Bowers and A. Jay Valentine, for appellants. Conley & Smith and Talbott & Hoover, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. Eliza E. McMillen owned three town lots, numbered 189, 190, and 191, in the town of Parsons, Tucker county. The clerk of the county court of that county, O. S. Billings, made a deed, 10th January, 1903, conveying said lots to J. H. Moore and A. A. Dorsey, which deed recites that the sheriff of Tucker county, in January, 1902, sold to Moore and Dorsey the said lots for delinquency for taxes charged against them by the town of Parsons in the name of Eliza E. McMillen for the year 1899. These lots were once owned by Ruth N. Ryder, and she gave a deed of trust on them for debt, and afterward, while said deed of trust still rested on the lots, Ruth N. Ryder conveyed them to said Eliza E. McMillen. Afterwards the lots were sold under said deed of trust, and purchased by Thomas Keck for himself and as trustee for the benefit of J. K. Mosser and others. Then Mosser, Keck, and others, the owners of said lots, filed a bill in Tucker county against Moore and Dorsey to set aside the said tax deed, claiming that it was wholly void. They also say in their bill that, after said tax deed had been made, they tendered the tax purchasers the sum which was properly payable to them, and thus offered to make a redemption, but that said Moore and Dorsey refused to allow the redemption, and then said Mosser and others paid to the clerk of the county court $27.25 as the amount paid by the tax purchasers with 12 per cent. interest. The answer of the defendants admits this offer to redeem, but says that the sum offered was too little, as it did not include the cost of the surveyor's report and the clerk's fee for making the tax deed, which seems to be the fact. The cause was heard upon the bill and answer and exhibits, and a decree was entered holding the tax deed valid, and that whatever defect or irregularities existed in the tax sale were cured by the tax deed. From this decree J. K. Mosser and his associates have appealed.

The plaintiffs contend that the lots were never returned delinquent for the taxes of 1899; that the lots were never advertised for sale as delinquent for said taxes, as required by law and the ordinance of said town of Parsons; that such lots were never sold for said taxes, as recited in the tax deed; and that no proceedings were had or notice given that would have given notice to any owner of said lots, or any one claiming interests therein, of any purpose on the part of the town or any public officer to sell the same for taxes for 1899 or any other year. I suppose that no one will deny that there must be a delinquent list including the particular land sold for taxes. There can no more be a sale without delinquency and a delinquent list than there can be a sale without an assessment, because the statute requires such delinquency and delinquent list. I repeat that there can be no sale without delinquency, and delinquency, to sustain a tax sale, must be proven by that delinquent list. There can be no one thing pointed out as necessary to sustain a tax sale that is more essential than a delinquent list, because it is the only evidence of that without which no sale can be made; that is, nonpayment of the taxes assessed. If land is not on that list, Code 1899, c. 31, § 51, says that it shall be presumed the taxes were paid. In this case there appears a copy of a list of real estate delinquent for taxes in Parsons for 1899, certified by A. C. Scheer, State Auditor, having a first column headed "Names," and a second column headed "Real Estate," and a third column headed "Amt." In the first column are the names of 29 persons, including Eliza E. McMillen; and in the second column, intended for the specification of the real estate delinquent, there is not a mark, but it is entirely blank—in other words, not a tract or lot of real estate is mentioned. In the third column an amount of money stands annexed to each name; that annexed to the name of Eliza E. McMillen being $18.14. We suppose that the taxes chargeable to her amounted to that sum; but whether for real estate or personalty we could not say, except that the caption says that the list is for real estate; but for what real estate those taxes are charged and delinquent we are left utterly in the dark. It is just as though there were no delinquent list at all. That list is a nullity—vacancy. It leaves out that most essential element, specification and description of the land delinquent. In reference to the assessment list, Blackwell on Tax Titles, § 223, says: "An assessment that does not identify the land is void. A description sufficient to give notice to the taxpayer that his land is assessed, which the Legislature cannot dispense with, nor work a cure upon any proceedings defective in that regard. * * * The test is this: Is the description sufficient to identify the land and give notice to the owner of the assessment, or is it so defective that it might probably mislead the owner? Notice, or at least the means of knowledge, is an essential element of every just proceeding which affects rights of person or property. But how can the duty of payment of taxes be performed without the identity of the subject-matter of the duty be made known to him who is to perform it by name or description?" 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 683, says: "It is essential to the validity of an assessment of real estate that it contain a description of the property sufficiently accurate and certain to enable the owner readily to identify it as his, and to furnish a basis for the tax lien, and for proceedings in rem against the tract, should such become necessary to the collection of the taxes." See Black on Tax Titles, § 112. Of course, this law would apply to the delinquent list. This delinquent list did not suggest to the owner of these lots any delinquency, and therefore it would mislead; it would give no notice to them that the lots were delinquent. By law this list must be returned to the town council's office, and a copy thereof to the State Auditor. Persons have right, upon examination in those offices, to be informed distinctly by that list that their land is delinquent. This list, merely from the name of Eliza E. McMillen being found on it, suggests some delinquency; but that is not enough. It must tell what delinquency. We have the authority of section 25, c. 31, Code 1899, for saying that, if an irregularity appear on the face of the proceedings in said offices, and be such as to materially prejudice and mislead the owner of the real estate sold as to what real estate was sold, and when and for what year, it will vitiate the sale, unless it appear clearly that, but for the irregularity, it would have been redeemed. A delinquent list is an essential document in the "proceedings" in those offices under that section.

Furthermore, as to the sale, no sale list appears to prove the sale. If there had been such list, we presume it would have been furnished by the defendants. The bill says there was none, but the answer denies that allegation. Likely, as the deed recites that the lots were delinquent and sold, we have to say that some delinquent list and sale list were made and filed, as Code 1899, § 29, c. 31, makes it prima facie evidence of its recitals. Then, what is its character? Not only must there be such a list, because required by law, but it must have requisites of legal certainty, like assessment and delinquent lists. We can only surmise the character of that sale list, if it ever existed, from the advertisement in a newspaper by the sheriff of Tucker county of the sale for taxes under which the tax deed was made. In that section of it relating to the town of Parsons the name of Eliza E. McMillen is given in the column containing the names of persons charged with taxes, but in the column headed "Quantity of Land" there is nothing in connection with her name, nor is there in the column headed "Local Description," but they are both blank as to property and description, and only in the column showing amounts of taxes do we find anything connected with the name of Eliza E. McMillen—the sums $23.83 for amount necessary to redeem, and $24.30 for amount of taxes, costs, and fee for receipt. We are justified from this publication in saying that the sale list was totally defective in not specifying the property sold. We are further justified in this position by the sheriff's receipt given to the tax purchaser for $24.30, which gives the name of Eliza E. McMillen as a person charged with taxes and leaves blank the quantity of land. The receipt contains no further description or specification of the property sold than that it was in "Parsons Corp.,," which we take to mean in the town of Parsons. But what property in no way appears. So we say that those two essential things are entirely wanting—a delinquent list and a sale list. They are so utterly defective as to be no lists. There is vacancy where there must be colorable substance. There is utter voidness and emptiness where there should be body. Substantially there are no lists at all. Surely, we are bound to say that this want of record would mislead the owners, because it would give them no notice of delinquency and sale, and, this being so, the sale is not good by the Code and by cases cited below. Where an essential part of the proceeding is totally wanting, there is vacancy, and the proceeding is void. Forqueran v. Donnally, 7 W. Va. 114. We cannot say that the recital of the deed from the clerk will prove delinquency and sale; since, while these deeds may be prima facie evidence, the prima facie case is repelled by evidence showing those lists to be void, not voidable or merely defective. Total failure to file delinquent and sale lists does mislead. There is no warning in the place where warning ought to be found. We go to those lists in those offices to see whether our land has been returned delinquent and sold. Barton v. Gilchrist, 19 W. Va. 223; Simpson v. Edmiston, 23 W. Va. 675; Gerke v. Brewing Co., 46 W. Va. 93, 33 S. E. 122; McCallister v. Cottrille, 24 W. Va. 173. These lists gave no notice to the owners of the lots. The form of delinquent list given in section 12, c. 30, and of the sale list in section 18, c. 31, Code 1899, show that the lists in this case do not conform to law.

It appears from the Code that irregularity in the proceedings fixed by law leading to a sale for taxes will overthrow a sale, if it be of a kind to mislead those interested in the land, except as to defects cured by the Code. This follows from the language of Code 1899, c. 31, § 25, that the purchaser shall get good title "notwithstanding any irregularity in the proceeding under which the same was sold not herein provided for, unless such irregularity appear on the face of such proceeding of record in the office of the clerk of the county court, and be such as materially to prejudice and mislead the owner." From this two things appear, namely, that such defects as mislead are fatal, and, second, that some defects are cured by the statute. Having above seen that the defects in this case are such as to mislead, we must see whether they are cured by the statute. It is insisted that they are so cured by the clause of section 25 reading: "And no irregularity, error or mistake in the delinquent list or in the return thereof, or in the affidavit thereto, or, in the list of sales filed with the clerk of the county court, or in the affidavit thereto, or in the recordation of such list or affidavit, or as to the matter of laying off any real estate as sold, or in the plat, description or report thereof, made by the surveyor or other person, shall, after the deed is made, invalidate or effect the sale or deed." We hold that this does not cure the defect in the delinquent and sale lists above specified. Those defects are not merely irregularities within the meaning of that curative provision. That provision supposes lists not utterly void, mere nonentities, vanities, but lists which have substance, which contain enough to make them colorable lists under the law, but which have some defect in them. Surely the Code never meant to dispense wholly with a delinquent list or a sale list; and there are none in this case. We must not think that the word "description" in the statute above quoted dispenses with a description of the land in an assessment list or a delinquent or sale list. That refers to the description made by the surveyor in his plat or report, not the description of the land in those lists; since description in those lists is necessary as notice to the landowners. Therefore we hold that this deed is void.

The next question is whether the landowner must pay the taxes and costs prescribed by that clause of section 25 which says that no tax deed shall be set aside for any mistake or irregularity in the proceedings until the landowner shall pay purchase money paid for the real estate at the sale and subsequent taxes and costs of survey and report. We hold that such payment must be made as a precedent condition to the vacation of the deed. That clause of the statute is important. It is argued that, as the defects pointed out above make the proceeding null, not simply voidable, it logically follows that there is no duty to pay such taxes on the owners. This is a distinct clause in the statute. As the tax purchaser has paid taxes chargeable to the owner, equity calls upon the owner to repay the tax purchaser money which the owner should have paid, and which the tax purchaser had paid for him. I think the statute means just that. This follows from another consideration. We have seen that there be some defects cured by the statute where the sale stands good, and clearly this refunding provision does not apply to those cases. Therefore it must apply to cases not cured by the statute, where the defect causes the failure of the purchaser's title. In addition the bill offers to pay the purchasers the proper amount. It may be thought that this position is inconsistent with our holding on this point in State v. McEldowney, 54 W. Va. 695, 47 S. E. 650; but I distinguish that case from this because in it the land was assessed contrary to the prohibition of law, and sold contrary to another prohibition, whereas in this case it is not so. In this case the owners were chargeable with taxes; in that case Cassey L. Newsum was not chargeable with taxes by assessment, as the state had other means of getting omitted taxes from her. Cunningham v. Brown, 39 W. Va. 588, 20 S. E. 615.

Defendants resist the vacation of the deed because not enough money was tendered. But a tender was made. There was lacking only a small sum, which should not defeat relief. Wyatt v. Simpson, 8 W. Va. 394. Redemption statutes are to be liberally construed. Danser v. Johnsons, 25 W. Va. 381. Besides, the defendants refused redemption because too late, and this dispenses with the question of the amount. Koon v. Snodgrass, 18 W. Va. 320; Thompson v. Lyon, 40 W. Va. 87, 20 S. E. 812.

Therefore we hold that the tax deed is utterly void, and we reverse the decree of the circuit court of Tucker county, and send the case back to that court, with direction to ascertain the proper sum to be paid to Moore and Dorsey by the owners of the three lots, and then to enter a decree vacating the said tax deed on payment to Moore and Dorsey of the proper sum.

NOTE BY BRANNON, J. I add this note though likely not material: What property was sold by the sheriff belonging to Eliza McMillen? Judging by the record of the sale, he could not have cried the sale of any particular piece of her property. It has been suggested that the sale would apply to any piece of her property in Parsons. This cannot possibly be sound law. Assessment list, delinquent list, and sale list must describe it. In addition to authorities above cited, I add Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) 740: "In listing the land it must be described with particularity sufficient to afford the owner means of identification, and not to mislead him. * * * The result of the whole is that, where the assessment wholly fails to lead to identification, so that neither the owner nor the officer can tell that his land is taxed, the duty of payment cannot be performed, and the assessment is void." The suggestion that the sale might apply to any piece of property of Eliza McMillen is accompanied by the admission that this defect is such as would vitiate the deed, and is not cured by statute, and yet it is said that the sale is not void, but only voidable. How it can be that this defect is such as to mislead, and such as is not cured by section 25, c. 31, Code 1899, and yet be only voidable, not void, I do not see. I repeat that it is void, because of those lists, as to Eliza McMillen, being no lists at all; not colorable lists, even, but so radically defective as to be void as to her. It cannot be thought that those delinquent and sale lists can be aided by oral evidence to prove what property was meant to be returned delinquent and sold, or what property the sheriff actually cried out. The record is the sole test as to this. McClain v. Batton, 50 W. Va. 121, 40 S. E. 509.

DENT, J. (concurring). I concur in the conclusion in this case, but not in point 1 of the syllabus, nor the reasoning of Judge BRANNON'S opinion in relation thereto. Under chapter 31, Code 1899, there are four classes of cases in which suits can be instituted to set aside tax deeds:

First. Under section 25, when the owner has been misled by some irregularity in the proceedings as to what portion of his real estate was sold, and when for what year or years it was sold, or as to the name of the purchaser thereof, provided he would have redeemed the same had he not been so misled by such irregularity, and provided further that he pay the tax purchaser the amount of his purchase money and the subsequent taxes and costs paid and incurred. This is a mere avoidance of the sale by redemption, and it is not because the deed is void, but because it is voidable by reason of the misleading irregularity existing in the proceedings which prevented the owner from paying the taxes and redeeming the land before the deed was made. Gerke Brewing Co. v. St. Clair, 46 W. Va. 93, 33 S. E. 122.

Second. Under sections 26 and 27, when the taxes are not in arrear, but have been once paid. To avoid the deed under this head, suit must be brought within five years after the deed is made. Both these classes represent privileges reserved by the statute to the owner, and of which no other person can take advantage except by his authority. Hence the deeds by virtue thereof are rendered voidable, but not void. They are good against all others except the owner, his alienees, heirs, or devisees.

Third. Under section 9, when the officer making the sale is guilty of fraud in connection therewith; that is, holds an illegal interest therein. The cases of Phillips v. Minear, 40 W. Va. 58, 20 S. E. 924, and McClain v. Batton, 50 W. Va. 121, 40 S. E. 509, which properly come under this head, were both decided wrong, because they were improperly confounded with the first class of cases as above set forth. The sales were both set aside because of the fraud of the officer, when such fraud was neither alleged nor proven, but was conclusively presumed from a defective affidavit, contrary to both the rules of law and equity. Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 275, 23 S. E. 553; Billingsley v. Minear, 44 W. Va. 657, 30 S. E. 61; Trustees v. Blair, 45 W. Va. 812, 32 S. E. 203; First National Bank v. Bowman, 36 W. Va. 649, 14 S. E. 989; Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 469. The cases of McClain v. Batton and Phillips v. Minear and Johnson v. Minear, 40 W. Va. 160, 20 S. E. 926, are in hopeless conflict with Boggers v. Scott, 48 W. Va. 316, 37 S. E. 661; Gerke Brewing Co. v. St. Clair, 46 W. Va. 98, 33 S. E. 122; Stat. v. Sponaule, 45 W. Va. 415, 32 S. E. 283, 43 L. R. A. 727.

Fourth. Under ordinary equitable jurisdiction to remove cloud from title because the deed is void for illegality or fraud. Cases under the third class naturally fall under this head, but they are put in a separate class, because section 9 provides that the interest therein of the officer making the sale shall render it void. This fourth class includes all tax deeds which are for any reason void, and not merely voidable, and therefore covers all suits to set aside such deeds except those which come under the first and second classes. The following cases belong to this class: State v. McEldowney, 54 W. Va. 695, 47 S. E. 650; Holt v. King, 54 W. Va. 441, 47 S. E. 362; Totten v. Nighbert, 41 W. Va. 800, 24 S. E. 627; State v. Eddy, 41 W. Va. 95, 23 S. E. 529; State v. Tavenner, 49 W. Va. 696, 39 S. E. 649; Cunningham v. Brown, 39 W. Va. 588, 20 S. E. 615; Campbell v. Wyant, 26 W. Va. 702; Wyatt v. Simpson, 8 W. Va. 394. There are a line of cases in which tax deeds were held to be void under the law as it existed prior to the enactment of the present statute in 1882, and which have been superseded thereby, to wit, McCallister v. Cottrille, 24 W. Va. 173; Simpson v. Edmiston, 23 W. Va. 675; Barton v. Gilchrist, 19 W. Va. 223; Orr v. Wiley, 19 W. Va. 150; Jones v. Dils, 18 W. Va. 763; Dequasie v. Harris, 16 W. Va. 360; Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 108.

The reason for such holding is given in Simpson v. Edmiston, cited, and is, in short, that a tax purchaser is not in law a bona fide purchaser, but takes only such title as the deed gives him, and, it being void for defects in the tax proceedings is a nullity and passes no title, and creates no privity between the purchaser and the delinquent owner. These cases were so decided under the provisions of section 25, c. 31, Code 1868, and section 25, c. 117, p. 320, Acts 1872-73, which is in these words, to wit: "When the purchaser of any real estate so sold, his heirs or assigns, shall have obtained a deed therefor according to the provisions of this chapter and caused the same to be admitted to record in the office of the clerk of the county court of the county in which such real estate or the greater part thereof may lie, such estate shall stand vested in the grantee in such deed in and to said real estate as was at the commencement of or at any time during the year or years for which the said taxes were assessed, vested in the party assessed with the taxes for which it was sold, and in any other person or persons having title thereto who have not in his or their own name been charged on the assessor's books of the proper county or district with the taxes on said real estate for the year or years for the taxes of which the same was so sold, and actually paid the same as required by law, notwithstanding any irregularity in the proceedings under which the said grantee claims title, unless such irregularity appear on the face of the proceedings of record in the office of the clerk of the county court, and be such as materially to prejudice the rights of the owner whose real estate is sold. * * * In the cases aforesaid the court held that such prejudicial error existed, and no estate passed to the tax purchaser, but his deed was a nullity.

The present section 25, c. 31, Code 1899, provides that all the right, title, and interest of the delinquent owner of the land shall be transferred to and vest in the tax purchaser "notwithstanding any irregularity in the proceedings under which the same was sold not herein provided for, unless such irregularity appear on the face of such proceedings of record in the office of the clerk of the county court, and be such as materially to prejudice and mislead the owner of the real estate so sold, as to what portion of his real estate was so sold and when and for what years it was sold, or the name of the purchaser thereof; and, unless it be clearly proven to the court or jury trying the case that but for such irregularity the former owner of such real estate would have redeemed the same under the provisions of this chapter. * * * And no deed for any real estate sold under the provisions of this chapter shall be vacated or set aside in whole or in part by reason of any mistake or irregularity in the proceedings of record as aforesaid, unless and until the person entitled to have the same so set aside, shall pay or tender to the purchaser or his heirs, devisees or assignee, or the person holding under him or some one or more of them, the purchase money paid for the said real estate at the time of the sale thereof, and all the taxes since paid thereon for any year or years for which such person so claiming or those under whom he claims have not paid taxes thereon, and the costs of the survey or report made as hereinbefore required, with interest on each sum from the date of the payment thereof to the time of such payment by the person so claiming." Under these provisions, which cover every possible irregularity in a tax proceeding, the deed is not void, but is voidable on compliance by the owner with the stipulated conditions—that is, showing that he would have redeemed the land were it not for the misleading mistake or irregularity; and on payment of the sum necessary for the redemption thereof, and until this is done, the deed is valid to pass the title, and can in no wise or by no person be collaterally attacked for any irregularity, error, or mistake coming within the purview of section 25. The deed cannot be treated as void, but on a proper showing it may be vacated and annulled by the court. The errors or mistakes for which the deeds in the last line of cases mentioned were held void all come within the purview of, and are covered by, section 25. Hence those cases have ceased to be authority as to such questions. Jackson v. Kittle, 34 W. Va. 207, 12 S. E. 484. A void deed is a nullity, and may be treated as such in any proceeding in which it may be involved, while a voidable deed is one which may be set aside or vacated by proper showing in a direct attack thereon by the party interested. Under section 25, no irregularity, error, or mistake in the tax proceedings, however gross, is sufficient to render a tax deed void. Independent of such action, any irregularity which vitiates the power to sell will render such deed void. If there is no assessment of taxes, or it is for any reason illegal, if the land has not been returned delinquent, or has not been certified to the officer for sale or has not been sold, then the tax deed would be void, for all these elements are necessary to give the clerk authority to make the deed. But all mistakes, errors, or omissions in carrying on these essential steps are mere irregularities in the proceedings, none of which are sufficient to justify the setting aside or vacating the deed as voidable, unless it "be such as to materially prejudice and mislead the owner of the real estate so sold as to what portion of his real estate was so sold, and when and for what year or years it was sold, or the name of the purchaser thereof"; and not then unless the owner would have redeemed the same had it not been for such irregularity, and not then unless the owner pay or tender a sufficient sum to the tax purchaser or his representative to redeem the same. One of the errors in this case relied on to make the deed void is the failure to describe the real estate sold with sufficient explicitness. The delinquent list shows that it was the real estate of Eliza E. McMillen, and the amount of taxes due and unpaid thereon. Hence it was to all intent and purpose a delinquent list, although it failed to contain a description of the real estate sufficient for its identity. Mrs. McMillen, however, could tell from it that her real estate had been returned delinquent, and the amount of taxes due thereon. The omission of the description did not affect the legal authority to sell, but was only an irregularity or mistake in the proceedings "not otherwise provided for," which misled the true owner, not Mrs. McMillen, as to what portion of his real estate was sold and the name of the purchaser thereof, as it really furnished him no notice of these matters, and thereby prevented him from redeeming the same. Such irregularity rendered the deed not void, but only voidable, on payment of the sum necessary to redeem the same. This is virtually confessed in the opinion, which is confusing and contradictory. If the tax deed is void, the tax purchaser is not entitled to have his purchase money, taxes, and costs returned, for redemption is not required. State v. McEldowney, 54 W. Va. 695, 47 S. E. 650; Holt v. King, 54 W. Va. 441, 47 S. E. 362; Totten v. Nightbert, 41 W. Va. 800, 24 S. E. 627; Cunningham v. Brown, 39 W. Va. 588, 20 S. E. 615; Simpson v. Edmiston, 23 W. Va. 675. Yet the opinion holds the tax deed void, and requires the redemption of the land by repayment of the purchase money, taxes, and costs, as though the deed were only voidable on such repayment. The same omission in the return of the officer as to the lands sold is held in both the syllabus and the opinion to render the deed void in the very teeth of that clause of section 25 which provides: "But no sale or deed of any such real estate under the provisions of this chapter shall be set aside or in any manner affected by reason of the failure of any officer mentioned in this chapter to do or perform any act or duty therein required to be done or performed by him after such sale is made, or by the illegal or defective performance or attempt at the performance of any such act or duty after such sale." This is a most just and commendable enactment of the Legislature. There is no good reason founded in equity or justice why, after a sale is made, it should be set aside or affected in any manner by the failure of the state's agents to do or perform any duty required of them, or the illegal or defective performance on their part of any such duty. To allow the state or an individual to take advantage of any such failure on the part of its officers is to allow the grantor to annul its contract by reason of the unauthorized acts of its agents after the contract is fully made, and the purchase money paid, before consummation by deed.

In cases of individual sales no such power would for one moment be tolerated or recognized, and it is unjust to allow such power to exist in cases of public sales authorized by law for the benefit of the state. While the illegal neglect of duty on the part of its officer may not bind the state except by virtue of this provision, it should not bind innocent tax purchasers who have no control over the state's officers, and have no power to prevent the neglectful or illegal discharge of their duties. They are in no sense the agents of the tax purchasers. Their authority is conferred upon them by the state, and exercised for the state's benefit.

I am aware that this provision has been so construed by this court as to make it only effective after deed duly executed and recorded (Jackson v. Kittle, 34 W. Va. 207, 12 S. E. 484; Hays v. Heatherly, 36 W. Va. 631, 15 S. E. 223; Baxter v. Wade, 39 W. Va. 281, 19 S. E. 404; Winning v. Eagan, 19 W. Va. 44; Boggers v. Scott, 48 W. Va. 316, 87 S. E. 661), and even extended to embrace certain cases after the deed has been executed and recorded (Phillips v. Minnear and McClain v. Batton, heretofore cited). Where the matter is to end depends on the future decisions of this court. The reasons given by Judge Lucas for such holding in Jackson v. Kittle, 34 W. Va. 216, 12 S. E. 488, are as follows: "If this concluding paragraph is to be given the force of a sweeping indemnity against all defects in the return of the officer making the sale, then the preceding paragraph, which I have quoted, would be entirely useless or repugnant. Such a construction will be avoided, if possible. Conflict and repugnance in statutes should always be avoided by construction, if possible. Indeed, a statute ought, upon the whole, to be so construed that, if it can be prevented, no clause, sentence, or word should be superfluous, void, or insignificant. Where a general intention is expressed, and the act also expresses a particular intention incompatible therewith, the particular intention will be regarded as an exception, and will prevail." The preceding paragraph quoted is as follows: "And no irregularity, error or mistake in the delinquent list or the return thereof or in the affidavit thereto or in the recordation of such list or affidavit or as to the manner of laying off any real estate so sold or in the plat, description or report thereof made by the surveyor or other person shall after the deed is made invalidate or affect the sale or deed." The general clause before quoted is as follows: "But no sale or deed of any such real estate under the provisions of this chapter shall be set aside, or in any manner affected, by reason of the failure of any officer mentioned in this chapter to do or perform any act or duty herein required to be done or performed by him after such sale is made, or by illegal or defective performance or attempt at the performance of any such act or duty after such sale." There is no repugnancy or conflict between these two provisions. And, if they were repugnant or conflicting, the first must give way to the last, both in position and enactment. The supposed repugnant part of the first quotation was enacted in 1873, while the second quotation was not added until 1882. Yet the first is by such construction made to modify and amend the last. This is contrary to the usual rules of construction, for the last should prevail over the first. See the opinion in the case of Spidel Co. v. Warder (decided at this term), 49 S. E. 534, where such rule is stated and improperly applied. 26 Am. & En. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 618, 619. The first is not near as broad, and does not cover the same ground, as the last. The first only operates after the deed is made, while the second, according to its unequivocal language, operates on the sale before deed as well as after the deed, and no part of it is useless. Judge Lucas' construction in confining the second to the sale or deed after the deed is made renders a portion of the first useless as covering a small portion of the general ground covered by the second. Both these clauses are in perfect harmony with each other, except that the language of the latter makes its provisions apply to the sale before deed made, and to so construe them does not make any clause, sentence, or word superfluous, void, or insignificant that are not superfluous, void, and insignificant under the construction by Judge Lucas. Nor is the general intention, if it can be so called, to prevent the omission and neglect of duty or the state's officers after the sale from in any manner affecting or invalidating such sale in any wise, incompatible with the specific intention to prevent the same or other irregularities from invalidating the sale or deed after the deed is made. In truth the general intention of the section is to prevent the invalidity of the deed, while the specific intention of the last clause is to prevent the invalidity of the sale or deed by particular acts or omissions after the sale. Judge Lucas' argument is plainly fallacious, and has not a single rational foundation stone on which to rest. The decision results in the holding that a sale made void by the misconduct of one officer thereafter can be made valid by the illegal and unauthorized act of another officer or himself. Barton v. Gilchrist, 19 W. Va. 223; McCallister v. Cottrille, 24 W. Va. 173. Judge Lucas says, in effect, the clerk has no power to make the deed, yet, if he does illegally do so, it cures the defect that made the sale void. The Legislature never intended to enact such an absurd paradox. The language of the enactment is simple, and plainly expressive of the legislative intention, and requires no references to other clauses with which it is not in conflict, but to which it is only cumulative, to ascertain its proper construction. If the Legislature had intended to limit its operation until after deed made, it would have so expressed itself, as it had already so limited other clauses which were fresh in its mind. Not only has the Legislature so enacted, but it is right and just. Agents of the state should have no power to defeat lawful sales made by them after they are made, any more than private persons should have such power; otherwise the bona fide tax purchaser would be at the mercy of the state's agents after his purchase, unless he can obtain an illegal deed to cure a void sale.

Notwithstanding the fallacy of this decision, it appears to be the settled law of this state, and I only mentioned it here to emphasize the fallacious construction of the same clause in the present case, and to show to what extremes a fallacy once adhered to finally leads.

THIRD NAT. BANK OF CUMBERLAND, MD., v. LABORINGMAN'S MERCANTILE & MFG. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 13, 1904.)

CORPORATIONS—AUTHORITY OF PRESIDENT—RATIFICATION BY DIRECTORS—NOTES OF CORPORATION.

1. The president of a corporation has no inherent authority, by virtue of his office, to execute a negotiable note which will bind the corporation.

2. The directors of a corporation may ratify any act done or contract made by its president without authority, which they could have authorized him to do or make.

3. The authority of an officer of a corporation to do a particular act may be inferred from proof of his habitual doing of such acts, with the acquiescence of the directors of the corporation. And where no such acts are proven, if any act or contract of such officer, made without authority, is subsequently ratified by the directors upon full knowledge of all the circumstances of the case, the corporation will be bound thereby as fully as if the officer had been expressly authorized to do the act or make the contract.

4. M., as president of the defendant corporation, without authority, made the negotiable note of the corporation; had it discounted by the plaintiff bank, and the proceeds thereof credited to the bank account of defendant. The proceeds of the note so deposited were by direction of M. credited on the books of defendant to an account due it from another company, of which M. was manager, and for which indebtedness he was liable to defendant. Defendant then, by its checks drawn on this fund in bank by its manager in favor of various wholesale houses, its creditors, paid out the same; but all of these transactions were, at the times thereof, unknown to the directors of the company, but were afterwards brought to their notice. The defendant failed to return to the bank the money, the benefit of which it had thus received, when its receipt had become known to defendant's directors.

Held, that the failure of the defendant to return to the bank the money so received by it, when its receipt had become known to its directors, was a ratification of the execution and use of the note by Murphy as aforesaid.

5. It is a general principle, which applies without regard to the mode of ratification, that a voidable engagement, made by one assuming to act as agent, cannot be ratified in part, so far as it is beneficial to the principal, and repudiated so far as it is detrimental to him.

Error to Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by the Third National Bank of Cumberland, Md., against the Laboringman's Mercantile & Manufacturing Company and others. Judgment for defendant company, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Cunningham & Stallings, for plaintiff in error. C. O. Strieby and C. W. Dailey, for defendants in error.

MILLER, J. The Third National Bank of Cumberland, Md., a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, commenced its action in debt in the circuit court of Tucker county against the Laboringman's Mercantile & Manufacturing Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of West Virginia, P. M. Murphy, president, P. M. Murphy, N. B. Twigg, M. M. Phelps, W. E. Patterson, E. S. Muse, J. B. Guinard, F. M. Houser, J. W. Baker, Samuel Buser, B. A. Stuckey, and Geo. W. Everett, for the recovery of $1,000, debt, with $2.79, protest charges, and interest, and at the August rules, 1901, filed its declaration therein, in which it is alleged that the defendant company, by P. M. Murphy, its president, made its certain negotiable note in writing, dated the 29th day of March, 1901, and subscribed its name thereto, as follows, to wit, "Laboringman's Mer. & Mfg. Co.," by P. M. Murphy, president, thereby meaning the Laboringman's Mercantile & Manufacturing Company, whereby it promised, three months after date, to pay to the order of P. M. Murphy, president, $1,000, at the Third National Bank of Cumberland, Md., without defalcation, for value received; that said P. M. Murphy, president, before the maturity of the note, indorsed the same to P. M. Murphy, and in like manner Murphy indorsed it to Twigg; that all of the defendants indorsed the note in the order as above named; that said Geo. W. Everett indorsed it to the plaintiff bank; and that at its maturity the note was protested for nonpayment. At the November term, 1901, of the court, on motion of the plaintiff, the action was abated as to all of the said indorsers of the note, including P. M. Murphy, president, and was ordered to be proceeded in against the defendant the Laboringman's Mercantile & Manufacturing Company. The plaintiff at the January rules, 1902, filed in the clerk's office an amended declaration against the defendant corporation alone, but otherwise substantially in the language of its original declaration. At the March term, 1902, of the court, the defendant company entered its plea of nil debet, and it also filed two several special pleas in writing, both verified by affidavit. One of said special pleas avers that the defendant did not make or deliver for discount the note sued on and described in the declaration, and that said note was not discounted by plaintiff for defendant. The other plea avers that the defendant company did not make or deliver for discount the note sued on and described in the declaration, and that said note was not discounted by the plaintiff for the defendant; that P. M. Murphy never had the authority of the defendant to make or deliver the said note for discount to the plaintiff; that N. B. Twigg and the others named therein, whose names appear on the back of the note, never indorsed the same; that the plaintiff never discounted the note for defendant; and that the defendant never became liable to pay the plaintiff the sum of money in the said note specified. Issue was joined on each of the aforesaid pleas, and at the same term a trial of said action was had before a jury. At the conclusion of the evidence the defendant demurred thereto, in which demurrer the plaintiff joined, and the jury found for the plaintiff the sum of $1,042, if the law, upon the demurrer to the evidence, be for the plaintiff; but, if the law be for the defendant, they found for the defendant. The court sustained defendant's demurrer, and gave judgment against the plaintiff for costs. To this judgment the plaintiff excepted, and obtained from this court a writ of error and supersedeas to the same.

¶ 1. See Corporations, vol. 12, Cent. Dig. § 1641.

Upon the issues thus made, the burden was upon the plaintiff bank to prove the authority of Murphy to make said note for the company.

It appears from the record that the defendant did a general mercantile business at Davis, Tucker county, W. Va. Said P. M. Murphy was at the date of the note in controversy, and had been for some time prior thereto, president, W. E. Patterson, secretary and a director, and W. W. Golightly, general manager, of the company. Who the other directors were, is not shown. Its stockholders numbered about 100. There is no evidence in the record showing the extent of the authority of the president of the company, except a by-law in these words: "The president shall preside at all meetings of the stockholders and board of directors, call all special meetings, sign minutes of all meetings; all contracts made by the company, and all certificates of stock." Murphy, as it is shown, claiming to act as president, executed the note in controversy, payable to himself as president, and then indorsed as such, and also individually, and presented it, with the other names indorsed thereon, some of which on the trial proved to be forgeries, at the Third National Bank of Cumberland; had the same discounted, by the bank, and the proceeds thereof placed to the credit of the defendant. It is not shown that any of the directors or officers of the company had at that time any knowledge of the making or discounting of the note. Said W. E. Patterson, J. B. Guinard, and Geo. W. Everett, stockholders in said company, whose names appear on the back of the note, testified that they did not indorse and did not authorize any person to indorse or put their respective names upon said note for them, and that they had not seen the note until the day of the trial. H. E. Weber, president of the bank, testified that the note sued on came into possession of the bank through Murphy, as president of the defendant company; that it was discounted; that the proceeds thereof were placed to the credit of the defendant; that the bank then and prior thereto had an open account with the defendant; that the "note was signed by Murphy, president, brought to us by Murphy, president, and Mr. Murphy is the only person we ever saw or knew, of the company, until we came up here to try this case." He further testified that on May 19, 1898, Murphy came to the bank, represented himself to be the president of the defendant company, asked to open an account with the bank, and at the time deposited some money therein, and said that later he would probably want a loan of $3,000; that on the 28th day of May, a week later, and almost two years before the note in controversy was made, the bank discounted a $3,000 note for the company, and placed its proceeds to the credit of defendant. It further appears that the proceeds of the two notes and some deposits, amounting to $1,400 or $1,500, placed in the bank by Murphy and Golightly for the company, were checked out and paid to wholesale merchants who were creditors of the defendant, in checks in their favor drawn on said bank; but nothing is shown by the records of the company or otherwise to prove that the directors or other officers of the company, except Murphy and Golightly, had any notice or knowledge of the aforesaid transactions. It is also shown that at the time of the execution and discount of the $1,000 note there was another company at Davis, called the Davis Poultry Company, of which Murphy was manager; that this last-named company owed the Laboringman's Mercantile & Manufacturing Company about $1,044, for which said Murphy was liable; that Murphy told Golightly that he (Murphy) had deposited in the plaintiff bank, to the credit of defendant, $1,000 of his own money, which should be placed on the books of the defendant company to the credit of the Davis Poultry Company; and that the credit of $1,000 to the poultry company was accordingly made on the books of the defendant company, leaving a balance of $44.73 due to defendant from the poultry company. It also appears that Murphy told said W. E. Patterson that he had received some money from the estate of his (Murphy's) father; that he had deposited $1,000 thereof to the credit of defendant company, which was to be applied by defendant to its account against the Davis Poultry Company, and on Murphy's private account as manager of the last-named company. This information was communicated by Patterson to Golightly. It is further shown that one George Thompson loaned to Murphy for defendant company $200 on the 15th day of January, 1901, and $500 on the 2d day of February, 1901; that Thompson took no notes or other written evidence for these loans; that they were repaid to him with the checks of the defendant company, signed by Murphy, as treasurer, and countersigned by Golightly, as manager; that F. A. Cruikshank on the 12th day of February, 1901, loaned to Murphy $200 for the defendant company, for which Murphy gave the company's note, signed by him as president, which note was afterwards paid to Cruikshank, at his own house, in currency, by Murphy, but not until after the note had been placed in the hands of A. R. Stallings, an attorney, for collection, and after Murphy had been notified of that fact. Murphy then requested Cruikshank to take the note out of the lawyer's hands, and he (Murphy) would pay it. In December, 1900, or January, 1901, A. Thompson loaned $400 to Murphy, as the president of defendant company, and received its note therefor from Murphy, which has never been paid; the company having repudiated it. In May, 1901, J. W. Baker loaned to Murphy $300, and received for it the note of the defendant company, executed by Murphy, and payable at its office, which has not been paid. It is shown by the record book of the defendant, introduced in evidence, that the $3,000 note and loan obtained thereon were authorized by the company, and that the note of the company therefor, in pursuance of such authorization, was executed by Murphy, as president, and by Patterson, as secretary. There is no pretense that any officer of the company except Murphy had any knowledge of any of the other loans. After discounting the $1,000 note, and before it fell due, Murphy left the country; being largely in debt to the defendant. He was not served with summons in said action, and was not present at the trial thereof. The evidence further shows that the proceeds of the $1,000 note were credited by the bank on its books to defendant company, and by its checks drawn by W. W. Golightly, its manager, paid out through the bank to the creditors of the company.

The question presented is, did the court err in sustaining the demurrer of defendant to the evidence, and in rendering judgment thereon in favor of the defendant? It is conceded by counsel for the plaintiff in error that Murphy, as president of the Laboring-man's Mercantile & Manufacturing Company, had no inherent authority to execute the note for the company. In First National Bank v. Kimberlands, 16 W. Va. 579, Greene, J., says: "The president of a bank or of any other corporation has, except to the very limited extent which we have above indicated, no inherent authority by virtue of his office to enter into contracts or agreements which will bind the corporation." In Stokes v. New Jersey Pottery Co., 46 N. J. Law, 237, 241, it is held: "In the absence of anything in the act of incorporation bestowing especial power upon the president, he has, from his mere official station, no more control over the corporate property and funds than any other director. The affairs of corporate bodies are within the exclusive control of their boards of directors, from whom authority to dispose of their assets must be derived. The act of a president or other officer, unless it is shown to pertain to his official duty or to be within the scope of his employment, cannot be regarded as the act of the corporation, and is not binding upon it. The authority requisite to charge the company must therefore be derived from the board of directors." Cook on Corporations, vol. 2, p. 1506, note, says: "The president and secretary have no inherent power to execute notes in the name of the corporation." It is not contended by the bank that Murphy had express authority from his company or its directors to execute or discount the note in controversy.

Plaintiff in error contends that, notwithstanding the unauthorized execution and discount of the note by Murphy, the company ratified his acts by holding him out as its agent, and by retaining the proceeds of the note. Morawetz on Priv. Cor. vol. 2, p. 595, says: "The doctrine of ratification must not be confounded with the doctrine of estoppel by acquiescence or laches. Actual ratification of an act involves a voluntary adoption of the act. Full knowledge of the act assented to, and an intention to adopt the act as the act of the corporation, are therefore essential. A corporation can never be charged with an unauthorized act of its agents on the sole ground that the act has been ratified by the shareholders, unless the shareholders had full knowledge of the act." The same rule applies to a ratification by the directors of a corporation of the unauthorized act of an agent or officer. The case of National Bank v. Kimberlands (point 8 of syllabus) holds that "the directors of a bank may ratify any act done or contract made by the president without authority which they could have authorized him to do or make." On page 581 of the same case the court says: "Evidence of powers habitually exercised by a cashier of a bank with its knowledge and acquiescence defines and establishes, as to the public, those powers." And this principle is equally true when applied to the president. But as the inherent power of the president is so much more limited than that of the cashier, the evidence of this character, from which the right to exercise unusual powers can be inferred, should be much stronger in the case of the president than in the case of the cashier of a bank. Not only may the authority of an officer of a corporation, as a bank, to do a particular act, be inferred from proof of his habitual doing such acts with the acquiescence of the directors of the corporation, but, where no such acts are proven, if any act or contract of such officer made without authority is subsequently ratified by the directors upon full knowledge of all the circumstances of the case, the corporation will be bound thereby as fully as if the officer had been expressly authorized to do the act or make the contract. This ratification need not be shown by direct evidence that it was expressly approved by the board of directors, but such ratification may be inferred from their accepting the benefits of the act or contract; as, if under the contract so made by the president or other officer money is to be paid to the corporation, and it is received by the corporation and applied to its use, even without the knowledge of the directors, if it is not returned, when it becomes known to the directors that it has been applied to their use, such conduct would be a ratification of the contract of such president or other officer."

There is nothing in this record showing the existence of such facts as constitute a public holding out by the company that the execution and discount of the $1,000 note by Murphy was within the scope of his delegated authority, but the record book of the defendant company does show that Murphy was expressly authorized to negotiate the $3,000 note. It does not appear that the directors had knowledge at the time of any of the other loans obtained from the Thompsons, Cruikshank, and Baker. Murphy's conduct indicates an intention on his part to conceal his acts from the directors of his company. As soon as Cruikshank had placed his claim in the hands of an attorney for collection, Murphy went at once and paid the note, and took it up; fearing, no doubt, that suit might be commenced and summons served on the proper officers of the company if he did not do so, and that this might lead to an investigation of the affairs of the company. The stockholders and directors of the Laboringman's Mercantile & Manufacturing Company were bound to take notice of the entries in its books made in the due course of its business, but no entry relating to the $1,000 note or its proceeds is shown therein. Golightly says that his company had an account against the Davis Poultry Company and Murphy, its manager, for $1,044.73; that, on request of Murphy, that account was credited with $1,000 paid by Murphy as aforesaid. This entry on the books of the company certainly would not be notice of the execution and discount by Murphy of the $1,000 note. No person except Murphy and Weber, the president of the bank, is shown to have had any knowledge of the note transaction until after the protest of the note. Murphy had not been habitually executing and discounting notes, nor borrowing money in the name of the defendant, with the knowledge or acquiescence of its directors. Neither was the execution or discount of the $1,000 note expressly ratified by the said directors, with or without full knowledge of all the circumstances of the case. But its proceeds were actually placed to the credit of defendant on the books of the bank, and appropriated by the company to its own use, by checking the same out to its creditors in payment of its debts. A corporation, like a natural person, may ratify, affirm, and validate any contract made or act done in its behalf which it was capable of making or doing in the first instance. 10 Cyc. 1069. Where the president of a corporation executes in its behalf, and within the scope of its charter, a contract which requires the concurrence of the board of directors, and the board, knowing that he has done so, does not dissent within a reasonable time, it will be presumed to have ratified the act. Id. 1073. "A leading principle in the law relating to this subject is that where a contract is made by one assuming to act in behalf of a corporation, and for a purpose authorized by its charter, and the corporation, after knowledge of the facts attending the transaction is brought home to its proper officers, receives and retains the benefit of it without objection, it thereby ratifies the unauthorized act, and estops itself from repudiating it. The reason is that it must exercise its option of affirming or disaffirming in whole, and not in part; that it cannot disaffirm so much of the unauthorized act as is onerous, while retaining so much of it as is beneficial; that it cannot keep the advantage while repudiating the burden; that it cannot disaffirm the contract while keeping the consideration." Id. 1078. In the case of Bank v. Kimberlands, supra, in which the facts are somewhat dissimilar to the facts in the case under consideration, the court applied the above-quoted general principle, and held that "the acceptance of the benefits of a contract made by the president for the bank is an implied ratification of such contract, and, if money is received by its cashier for the bank under such contract, even when such receipt was unknown to the directors, it will be a confirmation of the contract, unless the money so received is returned when its receipt becomes known to the directors." The directors of the defendant company had, or should have had, notice of the execution of the note in controversy, and of its disposition to the bank by Murphy, by reason of the present action brought upon that note. But the company, having then received the benefit of the transaction, repudiated it, and did not, when sued, nor since that time, return to the plaintiff the money thus received and used by it. The failure of the defendant to return the money so received, when its receipt had become known to its directors, was and is a confirmation of the transaction.

It is suggested that, while there may be a recovery in such cases in an action of assumpsit for money had and received, this action in debt may not be maintainable, because it is alleged that defendant, by Murphy, its president, made its certain note—being the one in suit—but that the only evidence of the alleged contract of defendant is the unauthorized note upon which the action is predicated. "It is a general principle, which applies without regard to the mode of ratification, that a voidable engagement cannot be ratified in part so far as it is beneficial to the corporation, and repudiated so far as it is deleterious." 10 Cyc. 1072. Hence the receipt and use of the proceeds of the note, having been ratified by the company, by reason of its failure to return the money, when its receipt had become known to its directors, the note upon which the money was obtained from the bank was also thereby ratified.

For the reasons stated, we hold that there was and is a ratification by the company of the whole transaction, that this action in debt can be maintained by the plaintiff against the defendant company upon the note in controversy, and that the defendant is liable to the plaintiff thereon. We therefore reverse and set aside the judgment of the court below, and enter such judgment as that court ought to have entered. It is therefore considered that the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence be, and the same is, overruled, and that the plaintiff do recover from the defendant company the said sum of $1,042 found by the jury as aforesaid, with interest thereon from the 13th day of March, 1902, until paid, and its costs by it in the prosecution of said action expended.

Note upon Application for a Rehearing.

Defendant insists that plaintiff had no right of action on the note, if at all, until after its execution by Murphy had been ratified by the failure of defendant to return to plaintiff the money realized thereon, and that the defendant was not required to do this until its directors had full knowledge of the transaction.

It might be inferred from an expression in the above opinion that neither the defendant nor its director had any knowledge of the note sued on, or of the disposition of its proceeds, until after the action was commenced. That feature of the case was not sufficiently discussed in the opinion, and for that reason this note is appended thereto.

The record shows that on the 1st day of July, 1901, the date of the maturity of the said $1,000 note, it was duly protested for the nonpayment thereof against all of the indorsers thereof; and that written notices of protest were signed by the notary, and mailed on that day to the following named persons, informing them that the note had not been paid, payment thereof having been demanded and refused, and that they would be held responsible for the payment thereof. The said notices were under separate covers, and addressed to Davis, W. Va., to Laboringman's Merchantile & Manufacturing Company, N. B. Twigg, M. M. Phelps, W. E. Patterson, E. S. Muse, J. B. Guinard, F. M. Houser, J. W. Baker, Samuel Buser, B. A. Stuckey, and Geo. W. Everett.

Section 7 of chapter 51 of the Code of 1899 provides that the protest in the case of a negotiable promissory note shall be prima facie evidence of what is stated therein (or at the foot or on the back thereof, if signed by the notary) in relation to presentment, dishonor, and notice thereof. Section 8 of chapter 99 declares that the sending of a notice of protest or dishonor of any bill, note, or other negotiable instrument by or through the mails, properly addressed to the last known post office of any party, shall be deemed equivalent to personal service of the notice on such party.

J. W. Baker, whose residence was Davis, W. Va., W. E. Patterson, Geo. W. Everett, J. B. Guinard, and W. W. Golightly were witnesses on the trial, and said nothing as to the notices of protest. If the notices were not received by them, that fact could have been shown. Therefore, under the statute, without evidence to the contrary, we must hold that the above-named parties, to whom notices were mailed, had notice of the note and of its presentment and dishonor.

CARNEGIE NATURAL GAS CO. v. SOUTH PENN OIL CO. et al.*

Dec. 8, 1904.)

CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—OIL AND GAS LEASES—ASSIGNMENT OF RIGHTS— ELECTION—ENFORCEMENT.

1. When a contract is made for the accomplishment of one main purpose, as is usually the case, it is necessarily the purpose of both parties, the thing upon which their minds met, and as to which they are in perfect accord, and every provision of the instrument must be read in the light of such purpose. In other words, the whole instrument must be considered in seeking its true meaning.

2. Words and expressions in common use are to be taken in their natural, plain, obvious, and ordinary significations, unless a contrary intention clearly appears from the context of the contract.

3. No word or clause in a contract is to be treated as a redundancy if any meaning reasonable and consistent with other parts can be given to it. 9 Cyc. 583.

4. Carnahan, being the owner of a number of oil and gas leases, covering a large tract of land, assigned all the gas and gas rights to which he was entitled by virtue of them to another party by a written contract, retaining all the oil and oil rights, and at the same time entered into another contract with the assignee, containing this clause: "The parties hereto shall have the right to operate said territory under their respective interests, and should Carnahan in his operations for oil develop a gas well or wells, the Gas Company shall have the right or privilege of having any such well or wells transferred to it upon payment of the actual cost of drilling the same, together with the cost of the rig and casing, and should the Gas Company in its operations for Gas develop and oil well or wells, Carnahan shall have the right or privilege of having any such well or wells transferred to him upon payment of the actual cost of drilling the same, together with the cost of the rig and casing. Each party shall have Thirty (30) days from the completion of any such well or wells in which to exercise its option to so purchase a well from the other and make payment therefor, and during which time they shall have the opportunity of testing and inspecting any such well drilled by the other. Any Gas Well drilled by Carnahan, and any oil well drilled by the Gas Company which shall not be so purchased by the other party within the time above designated, shall together with the product thereof, be and become the absolute property of the party drilling the same. Either shall give immediate notice to the other of the completion of any well in which the other would have an interest or right to purchase under this paragraph." Held that, upon the development of gas in paying quantities in drilling for oil, and the election of the gas company within the time limited to pay the cost of drilling the well and of the rig and casing, the party drilling it must deliver possession of the well to the gas company, and cannot continue operations therein in an effort to find oil in a lower stratum.

5. Such election on the part of the gas company converts the option into an executory contract, specific performance of which will be enforced in equity.

6. Pending the suit for such enforcement, further operations in violation of the contract will be enjoined, to maintain the status quo, and obedience to the final decree may be compelled by prohibitory or mandatory injunction, or both, according to the exigencies of the case.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wetzel County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Bill by the Carnegie Natural Gas Company against the South Penn Oil Company and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hall & Hall and H. M. Russell, for appellant. R. F. & A. B. Fleming, T. P. Jacobs, and U. N. Arnett, Jr., for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, P. This case involves the rights of separate owners of the oil and gas in the same tract of land, as determined, not by principles of law governing the rights of separate owners of adjacent or superjacent strata, but by a contract entered into by them presumably to enable both to develop their territory and take out the substances belonging to them in the most practical, economical, and advantageous manner. J. E. Carnahan, being the owner of 37 oil and gas leases on lands in Wetzel and Doddridge counties, entered into two contracts with the Carnegie Natural Gas Company on the 23d day of October, 1899. By the first, he sold, transferred, and set over to said company, its successors and assigns, in consideration of $1, the gas and gas rights in said leases, together with all his "estate, right, title, interest and privilege in and to the gas and gas rights" in the land described in the leases. This left in Carnahan the title to the oil in the same land. By the other contract, made on the same day, and no doubt a part of the same transaction, he and the Carnegie Gas Company determined the rules which should govern their respective rights and powers while operating in the territory—the former for oil, and the latter for gas. By the first clause the gas company bound itself to commence a well on a certain tract within 60 days from the date of the agreement, and drill the same with due diligence "through the Gordon Sand, unless oil or gas be found in paying quantities at a lesser depth." Should this well prove to be a good producer of either oil or gas, as determined by certain standards fixed by the contract, a second one on another part of the territory included in the leases, covering nearly 3,000 acres of land, was to be put down in like manner by the gas company; and, if it should come up to the same standard, a third well was to be drilled; and, upon its measuring up to the requirements in production, a fourth one was to be drilled. These four wells were dealt with specially by the terms of the contract. Whether any terms used in reference to them shall be allowed to fix the meaning of the terms used in the clause relating to the general development of the territory by both owners will be discussed later on. That clause reads as follows:

"The parties hereto shall have the right to operate said territory under their respective interests, and should Carnahan in his operations for oil develop a gas well or wells, the Gas Company shall have the right or privilege of having any such well or wells transferred to it upon payment of the actual cost of drilling the same, together with the cost of the rig and casing, and should the Gas Company in its operations for Gas develop and oil well or wells, Carnahan shall have the right or privilege of having any such well or wells transferred to him upon payment of the actual cost of drilling the same, together with the cost of the rig and casing. Each party shall have Thirty (30) days from the completion of any such well or wells in which to exercise its option to so purchase a well from the other and make payment therefor, and during which time they shall have the opportunity of testing and inspecting any such well drilled by the other. Any Gas Well drilled by Carnahan, and any oil well drilled by the Gas Company which shall not be so purchased by the other party within the time above designated, shall together with the product thereof, be and become the absolute property of the party drilling the same. Either shall give immediate notice to the other of the completion of any well in which the other would have an interest or right to purchase under this paragraph."

Carnahan on the 14th day of February, 1902, conveyed all the interest and estate vested in him by these leases to the South Penn Oil Company. L. G. Robinson and others, having acquired some interest in them, joined in the conveyance. Both companies then proceeded with the work of development under the contract, each turning over to the other productive wells pursuant to the agreement, until the South Penn Company drilled a large gas-producing well, known as "Genine-Robinson No. 19." Upon striking the gas, the workmen withdrew their tools and notified the gas company; but, soon after the agents of that company appeared upon the ground, the gas company was informed by the agents of the South Penn Company that the latter intended to drill the well on down into the oil-bearing stratum, and would not then surrender it. Another large gas-producing well, known as "Die No. 1," was drilled by the South Penn Oil Company, and this it decided to drill deeper, and refused to surrender to the gas company. Thereupon the Carnegie Company instituted two suits in chancery against the South Penn Company; setting out in its bills in detail the facts hereinbefore substantially given, and praying injunctions. As to the Genine-Robinson well, the prayer is that the South Penn Oil Company, its agents and employes, be restrained and inhibited from in any manner interfering with the plaintiff in its works and effort to pack said well for the purpose of saving the gas, and that the plaintiff may be protected in its peaceable possession thereof. As to the Die well, the prayer is that the defendant be restrained from drilling said well any deeper, and that it be required and compelled either to close and case in the gas, or allow the plaintiff to do so, to the end that the gas may be preserved until the matters in dispute between the parties shall be settled by the court. The bills allege that the Carnegie Company has no immediate use for the gas, in consequence of which it desires to have the wells shut in, for the time being, in order to prevent loss by its escape. The demurrer of the South Penn Company having been overruled, it answered the bill, admitting all, or substantially all, the facts, but claiming the right under the contract to drill the wells into the oil-bearing sands below the "Gordon Stray" sand, in which the gas was found; denying that it was permitting the gas to escape, and alleging that it was possible to operate the wells for both oil and gas, saving both by proper casing and piping, and the use of certain appliances made for that purpose. Depositions were taken and filed by both parties, and upon the hearing the court decided that the South Penn Company had the right to continue its operations, but, in doing so, was bound to prevent the escape of the gas as far as the same could be avoided by the use of the best methods, means, devices, and appliances known to operators in the oil business. Accordingly a bond in the penalty of $20,000, with condition to take the precautions aforesaid for preventing the escape of gas, was required in each case, and the decrees provided that upon the execution of the bonds the injunctions should stand dissolved, without further order of the court. From this decree the Carnegie Company has appealed.

Nothing is said by counsel for the appellee in support of its demurrer. To avoid repetition and endeavor to make the opinion clearer on that phase of the case than it would be otherwise, as well as to put it in closer relation with the discussion of the propriety of the remedy sought, what is to be said about the demurrer is deferred until after the announcement of the conclusion respecting the main question—the right involved.

Whether the contract, rather than the principles of law, without reference to it, shall measure and determine the rights of the parties to this controversy, depends upon its interpretation. If it was their intention that the contract should affect, by way of surrender or curtailment, any right to oil or gas which the parties, or either of them, had, it must be given such effect; and, if their intention can be ascertained from the language of the instrument, without reference to any extrinsic facts or circumstances its terms alone can be resorted to for that purpose. The South Penn Company having taken its rights subject to this contract, and thereby adopted it as its own, its name may be inserted in lieu of that of Carnahan in reading the provisions of the contract. So read, it says that if the South Penn Company, in its pursuit of oil, shall "develop" a gas well or wells, the gas company shall have the right or privilege of having any such well or wells transferred to it upon payment of the actual cost of drilling the same, together with the cost of the rig and casing; and if the gas company, in its pursuit of gas, shall "develop" an oil well or wells, the South Penn Company shall have the right to have such well or wells transferred to it upon payment of actual cost of drilling the same, together with the cost of the rig and casing. It further says each party shall give immediate notice to the other of the "completion" of any well, and that each party shall have thirty days from the "completion" of any well in which to exercise its option to purchase. What is meant by the terms "completion" and "develop"? Do they mean the same thing? Counsel for appellant insist that they do, and that as soon as a gas well or an oil well is developed the well is completed, within the meaning of the contract. Counsel for appellee say it is not completed until the company drilling it has sunk a well to such depth as it may desire, notwithstanding gas or oil production may be found before that depth is reached. The order and connection in which the two terms "develop" and "completion" are used indicate that the latter is dependent for its meaning upon the interpretation of the former. The first part of the clause forms the basis of the contract, and that uses the word "develop." What follows is sequential in its nature. The last subdivision of the clause, using the word "completion," provides for notice of the happening of that contingency which gives the nondrilling company its option to take the well. The second subdivision, using the same word, limits the duration of that option. Neither of these two clauses can be said to have been intended to affect what precedes them by way of enlargement or curtailment. They simply relate to the rights of the parties called into existence by the development of a gas well when the oil company is drilling, or of an oil well when the gas company is drilling. Hence, when the meaning of the term "develop" is ascertained, it must control.

In seeking the intent of the parties, the court is not limited to the ascertainment of the meaning of the two words and their relation to each other, without reference to other considerations. The true rule of interpretation is that the whole instrument must be considered. From the terms of the contract, it is perceived that it relates to a large body of territory, supposed at the date of its execution to contain deposits of both oil and gas. To develop this territory, it would be necessary to sink a vast number of wells at great expense, many of which would prove to be worthless, while others would give up fabulous wealth. The great problem confronting the parties before and at the time of entering into the contract was the development of the territory. The location of the deposits must be ascertained. Some parts of the territory would prove to be, according to the experience of oil and gas operators, much more valuable than others. It was important, therefore, that test wells be drilled; and, the more numerous these should be, the sooner the extent, location, and character of the hidden wealth would be known, and the more rapidly it would be reduced to possession. This view of the situation, and the magnitude of the task confronting them at the time of the execution of the contract, is evidenced by the provisions of the first clause, which imposed upon the gas company, as part consideration for the assignment to it made on the same day, the burden of drilling four wells on different locations, provided the first three should produce in paying quantities, respectively, either oil or gas. Carnahan was willing that the exploration made by these four wells should cease upon the discovery and production of either oil or gas, for this clause did not require the gas company to drill through the Gordon sand, if at a lesser depth it should find oil or gas in paying quantities. In the event of finding gas in such quantity at a lesser depth, it had the right to cease drilling, but was not bound to do so. Clearly the object of the requirements of said first clause was exploration with a view to determining the value of the property, and indicating to Carnahan the location in which oil would be most likely to be found. It is not meant here to say that this interpretation of the first clause determines the meaning or shows the intent of the second clause, or defines, for the purposes of the contract, the word "develop." It is referred to merely as a circumstance, apparent upon the face of the contract, indicating in part the purpose for which it was entered into. Fortunes were to be spent in the development of that territory, much of which would be lost in the drilling of dry and unproductive wells. Operating separately and without any contract, the opening of a gas well in drilling for oil would impose upon the operator a great loss—the cost of drilling the well—for he could not take the gas, it being the property of the gas company. The opening of an oil well by the gas company in seeking for its deposit would subject it to the same loss. These were circumstances which presented themselves to the parties before they entered into the contract, and it was with a view to avoiding the risk of such great losses to themselves and waste of valuable deposits that they made this contract, providing for joint or concurrent operation; securing to each the preservation of what he intended to, and did, buy and retain. But for it, the development of a gas well, in drilling for oil, would give to the gas company great value as a result of the work and expense of Carnahan, if upon his abandonment the gas company could take charge of the well and market its product without paying the expense of drilling it; and the completion of a well by the gas company, non-productive in gas, but rich in oil, would give wealth to Carnahan, at the expense of the gas company, if he could take the product upon abandonment of the well by the gas company. Another clause provides indemnity in case of failure of the nondrilling party to exercise its option to purchase within the stipulated period. By such failure it forfeits the product of the well to the drilling party, by way of reimbursement for the expense of drilling the well. The contract says that in such case the well, "together with the product thereof," shall become the absolute property of the party drilling the same. This reflects the intent to make mutual concessions of rights and interests in aid of the general plan of development. It is an express concession or relinquishment of title under given circumstances. If further concessions are necessarily implied, or rather enforced, by compliance with an express agreement or stipulation of the contract, founded upon an adequate consideration, how can there be escape from it? Shall the court refuse to enforce the agreement because the effect of its performance is to deprive the party of title pro tanto? If the contract means what it says, in the clause providing that, "should Carnahan in his operations for oil develop a gas well or wells, the gas company shall have the right or privilege of having any such well or wells transferred to it upon payment," etc., how can that agreement be effectuated without an incidental relinquishment by Carnahan of any right he would have, in the absence of the contract, to go deeper with his exploration for oil? It is an utter impossibility. That right must be so extinguished, or the agreement remain unenforced, and it is the very soul of the entire contract. There is no principle of law under which the court can refuse to enforce a solemn agreement because by its execution a right not expressly agreed to be surrendered will be wrested from the party as a direct and inevitable result of compelling performance of his agreement. The result sought to be so avoided here is, moreover, so direct, immediate, certain, and apparent that the parties must have foreseen, contemplated, and intended it. The impossibility of knowing in advance of the drilling what any well would produce made it necessary, in entering into this contract, to provide for all contingencies. By the provisions which they decided to put into it, in view of them, they saw that there would result to each party great economy in the prosecution of the work of development, the prevention of immense losses, the better preservation of the property of each party, and the more rapid development of the territory. In view of all this, is it strange and unreasonable that Carnahan should have been willing to release or forego the production of any oil that might possibly be found below the point at which a paying gas production might be reached, or that the gas company should be willing to give up and release its interest in any deposit of gas lying below the point at which oil might be found in paying quantities? What was surrendered appeared to them then to be, as it is now, altogether uncertain. It had a mere possibility of existence. What each got in return was conditional indemnity against the certain loss of vast sums of money to be laid out in the drilling of wells which he knew might not, and many of which he knew would not, yield him any profit. Upon what better consideration could a contract, a surrender of property rights, or an abandonment of a right of exploration, be based? In seeking the intent of the parties and the purposes of the provisions of the contract, we must view it from the position in which the parties stood pending the negotiations and settlement of the terms of the contract they were about to make, so far as that position is disclosed by what the contract contains. As examined from that point of view, the contract discloses a plain intent that each party, upon its finding, in the course of its drilling, the deposit belonging to the other party in paying quantities, should allow such other party to take charge of the well upon paying the cost of drilling it, and the casing and appliances attached to it, within the time limited by the contract. Hence the well is completed, within the meaning of the contract, upon the development of either oil or gas in paying quantities.

Thus called into existence by the contingent exigencies, foreseen by the parties, while endeavoring to agree, by contract of sale, upon a division between them of the two substances in the land, and enter upon and carry on the work of extracting their respective deposits, without increasing the risk or loss always attendant upon the prosecution of such enterprises, this covenant forms an important element of the consideration of the two companion contracts simultaneously entered into. It is the inducement that overcame a seemingly otherwise insurmountable obstacle to the effectuation of the relations to the property and to one another which the parties were endeavoring to bring about. It is an offspring of what they at the time deemed a necessity. Even upon the theory of counsel for the appellee, something must stand in the place of it to enable the concurrent operation to be prosecuted on the premises without damage, loss, and hardship. Hence the willingness of their client to take upon itself the burden of endeavoring to save and care for, at its own expense, a product that does not belong to it. The necessity calling for the mutual covenant under consideration, or a similar one, leaves no doubt that it was inserted upon mature deliberation, and for the express purpose of determining the rights of the parties under the circumstances presented by this case. Therefore the position that the parties did not intend what the word "develop," in its ordinary acceptation, as applied to oil and gas operations, means, cannot be sustained. It would perhaps be difficult to find a word that would more clearly express the manifest intention of the parties, or indicate with a greater degree of certainty their respective rights upon the happening of the contingencies they contemplated.

This method of interpreting the contract may, to some extent, seem to go beyond its terms, in dealing with them in the light of the subject-matter, the situation of the parties, the purpose of the contract, the attending circumstances and conduct of the parties, but, when the terms of an instrument are uncertain or indefinite, it is proper to do so. 9 Cyc. 587; Devlin on Deeds, § 83; Magers v. Edwards' Adm'r, 13 W. Va. 822; Caperton's Adm'r v. Caperton's Heirs, 36 W. Va. 479, 15 S. E. 257; Scrags v. Hill, 37 W. Va. 708, 17 S. E. 185; Shrewsbury v. Tufts, 41 W. Va. 212, 23 S. E. 692. But is not all that has been said collected from the face of the contract? And is not its true meaning that which results from consideration of it as an entirety?

In this discussion of the contract, everything relied upon by counsel for the appellee seems to have been noticed, except the introductory words of the second clause, saying, "The parties hereto shall have the right to operate said territory under their respective interests." Upon this is predicated the contention that the instrument does not contemplate any relinquishment of rights. The language is clearly introductory to the main provision, upon which everything else hinges, as already shown, and is qualified by what immediately follows; else what follows is practically meaningless and wholly non-effective, according to its terms. The sentence relied upon does not say they shall operate to the extent of their respective interests, but under them, and then the manner and extent of operation are expressly limited and regulated. Upon what principle can any word of this contract be allowed to remain noneffective, there being no irreconcilable contradiction? That every word shall have effect when it is possible is an inviolable canon of the law of interpretation and construction. An extrinsic circumstance relied upon is the alleged possibility of operating the wells for gas and oil at the same time without damage or loss to either party. This is denied, and the evidence respecting it is very conflicting; but, if it were conclusively shown, the contract, on its face, plainly discloses an intent to forego the privilege of that experiment.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to discuss the case in the light of the principles which would determine the rights of the parties in the absence of a contract, unless it be assumed that their knowledge of these principles in some way bears upon the question of intent to be ascertained from the terms of the contract. Enough has already been said to show that it was very much to their interest to avoid the effect of these principles. By their relation, unrestrained by contract, the very contingency of loss, averted by the provisions of the contract, would have resulted to both parties from an effort to develop. It was not the case of a man operating under a lease which gave him both oil and gas, for, in the event of the production of either, his venture is profitable. Loss ensues only when he fails to find either deposit. But where one man owns the oil and the other the gas in the same land, the risk of each is much greater, as has already been shown, and this necessitates a contract to limit it.

Coming now to the demurrer, it is to be observed that, if there is any question of title, it is one purely of law; turning upon the construction of the contract, and involving nothing proper for determination by a jury. The principles announced in Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 164, 59 L. R. A. 556, 94 Am. St. Rep. 895, do not preclude equity jurisdiction of the whole case, when its extraordinary preventive jurisdiction is called for by acts working irreparable injury, if the circumstances of the case do not give the right of trial by jury on the question of title. Mr. Story says that if the relief is dependent upon a question of fact, first to be tried by a jury, the equitable jurisdiction for relief should be altogether declined, or the bill should be retained only pending a trial at law. Story's Eq. Jur. § 72. In Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 8, 43 S. E. 164, 59 L. R. A. 556, 94 Am. St. Rep. 895, the opinion says: "And the decisive test seems to be the necessity of a trial by jury of disputed questions of fact necessary to the ascertainment of the legal right involved." The limitation, by the decision in Freer v. Davis, of the doctrine announced in Bettman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 433, 26 S. E. 271, 36 L. R. A. 566, does not deny equity jurisdiction in that case. See 52 W. Va. 8, 43 S. E. 166. We have here no hostility of title, nor any question of fact upon which relief is dependent, but only one of law—the construction of the contract. The bill is in the nature of one for specific performance. Oil and gas in situ are real estate. The wells are avenues or conduits through which the oil and gas are brought to the surface and severed. They constitute the means of reaching appellant's property, and are analogous to ways, appurtenant to the property, and indispensable to its enjoyment. Carnahan bound himself, as hereinbefore shown, to sell them, under certain conditions, to the gas company, as part of the consideration, moving the entire agreement, in case he should drill any. Upon tendering payment, the gas company's option to purchase became an executory contract. An action at law for damages for the breach is as inadequate here as in the case of a contract of sale of real estate. The gas company is entitled to take out through the wells in controversy such of its gas as will flow from them, and there is no certainty that all of it can be obtained in any other way. A new well a few feet distant from one of them might be wholly unproductive. To require property to be involuntarily given up in exchange for money is contrary to the policy of the law. Hence it provides detinue for the recovery of specific personal property, unlawful entry and detainer for the possession of real estate, and ejectment for title. When the property is of such nature that none of the legal remedies will protect it, there is no adequate remedy at law, and ground for equity jurisdiction is shown. Withholding the wells in question here, prevents the appellant from obtaining its property, for, in violation of the contract, the means of procuring it are withheld. The covenant in question lies at the very foundation of the two contracts. To refuse enforcement of it would impair the value of the lease as a whole. No remedy in a court of law is broad enough to cover the extent of the inquiry, nor, to state a more technical ground, to give the appellant its specific property. Neither unlawful entry and detainer nor ejectment lies, for the appellant's right is under an executory contract, which will give him the right to possession by performance only. Appellant has not been put into possession and then ousted. Its right is as yet an equity, not a perfected title in the eye of the law. But two remedies are open to the gas company—an action at law for breach of the covenant, and a suit in equity for specific performance. The latter only can give the means of access to appellant's property, and is therefore the only adequate remedy, viewed from the standpoint of the nature of the right involved, and the only one that can directly maintain the value of the leasehold interest under the contracts. Equity has jurisdiction to enforce specific performance of a lease. West Va., etc., Co. v. Vinal, 14 W. Va. 637 (point 5, Syl.); Oil Co. v. Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 84, 102, 34 S. E. 923; Bettman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 433, 26 S. E. 271, 36 L. R. A. 566; McCarger v. Rood, 47 Cal. 138; Smith v. Church, 107 N. Y. 610, 14 N. E. 825; Ryder v. Robinson, 109 Mass. 67; Robinson v. Perry, 21 Ga. 183, 68 Am.

Dec. 455; 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (Old Ed.) 972. "Equity assumes jurisdiction, however, for specific performance of contracts, over all manner of rights and interests connected with real estate—for example, in addition to contracts which relate to fee-simple interests in land, leasehold estates, life estates, easements, expectancies, riparian rights, and, indeed, any interest or estate, legal or equitable, which arises out of real property." 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 104.

Thus it appears that the case arises under the ordinary equity jurisdiction, and not upon facts calling only for the exercise of the extraordinary jurisdiction by injunction. In such case the injunction becomes a mere process in the exercise of ordinary equity jurisdiction. It is a means or agency used to preserve the status quo pending the determination of the rights of the parties in equity, and process for executing the final decree, and in the latter instance may be either prohibitory or mandatory, according to the exigencies of the case. 20 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 518; Wharton v. Stoutenburgh, 39 N. J. Eq. 299.

For the foregoing reasons, the two decrees complained of will be reversed, the injunctions perpetuated, and the causes remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary to give the appellant full relief upon its said bills, according to the principles herein stated, and the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

STATE v. EMBLEM.*

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 1, 1904.)

DISORDERLY HOUSE—RENTING PREMISES—EVIDENCE.

1. Upon the trial of an indictment for leasing and letting a house to be used as a house of ill fame, a written instrument, signed and acknowledged by the parties, purporting to be a contract for the sale of the property, relied upon as a defense, may be shown by the state to be a collusive, fraudulent paper, executed for the purpose of evading the statute, and, although on its face a contract of sale, to be only a colorable and sham sale, not precluding the existence of the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties.

2. To avoid the effect of such a paper, the state need not establish by direct evidence a separate verbal or written contract of lease. It may be inferred from facts and circumstances showing the fraudulent intent and purpose of the parties in the execution of the pretended contract of sale.

Dent, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Elizabeth Emblem was convicted of misdemeanor, and brings error. Affirmed.

Dovener & Coniff, for plaintiff in error.
F. W. Nesbitt, Atty. Gen., for the State.

POFFENBARGER, P. In the criminal court of Ohio county Elizabeth Emblem was convicted on a charge of unlawfully, willfully, and knowingly leasing and letting a certain house to one Minerva Martin, to be used or kept as a house of ill fame, and subjected to a fine of $200, and of that judgment she complains.

She rested her defense upon an alleged executory contract of sale of the property to the person using it as aforesaid, and as evidence thereof introduced what purports to be a written contract, whereby she agreed to sell, and the other party to buy, the property, for and in consideration of the sum of $7,500, on the following terms: $40 cash, the receipt of which was thereby acknowledged, and the balance in equal payments of $312.09, payable every quarter, all to be fully paid on or before the 1st day of October, 1906. It further provided for the payment of interest on all deferred payments in advance at the rate of 8%, and that the said Martin should pay all taxes and assessments of every kind that should be levied on the property after the date of the agreement. In addition to the foregoing provisions, the contract contained the following clauses: "It is expressly agreed by and between the parties to this agreement that if any one of said installments, or the interest accrued thereon, shall not be paid within three days after falling due, then all of said installments remaining unpaid shall at once become due and payable, at the election of the said first party." "And the interest paid on such purchase money shall be retained by the party of the first part, for the use and occupation of said property by the said second party prior to said default; and, in case said interest is not paid in full up to the time of said default, then the first party shall have the right, and it is hereby expressly agreed, that the personal property of the said second party now on said premises, or put on said premises during the time of this contract, shall be subject to a sale by the said first party to pay the balance of said interest up to the time of said default, the proceeds of which sale shall be retained by said first party for the use and occupation of said property." "Now, therefore, if the said party of the second part, her heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, shall well and truly pay the said purchase money, interest, taxes, and assessments named in this agreement as it becomes due, the party of the first part, or her heirs, will well and truly make, execute, and deliver unto the party of the second part, or her legal representatives, a good and sufficient deed of the land aforesaid. But on failure of the party of the second part to pay the purchase money, or any part thereof, or the interest, taxes, and assessments, as above mentioned, then this agreement shall be void, as it regards the party of the first part, at her option."

The evidence fixes the value of the property at $3,200 or $3,300, and the rental value at $22 or $23 per month. Minerva Martin applied for the house as tenant, but was informed by Mrs. Emblem it was for sale, but not for rent. She then inquired about the terms, and Mrs. Emblem responded by asking how much she could pay down. She said $15, which she paid, and was let into the property, and has since paid $12.50 per week. The contract was not signed until about four weeks later, when she was called in for the purpose by Mrs. Emblem. They both signed and acknowledged it before a notary public, and later Mrs. Emblem had it recorded in the county court clerk's office. The weekly payments were called "interest," and no demand had ever been made for payment of any part of the principal. When she made application for the house, Minerva Martin was a stranger to Mrs. Emblem, and no inquiry as to her ability to pay for it was made, nor was the value of the property discussed, nor the price. Nothing was discussed but the interest. Mrs. Emblem asked how that was to be paid, but did not even mention the price of the house. Mrs. Emblem resided in another building, standing close to the house in question.

At the instance of the defendant the following instructions were given: "(2) The court instructs the jury that if they believe, from the evidence, that the contract introduced in evidence between the defendant, Elizabeth Emblem, and Minerva Martin, for the property mentioned in the indictment, was a bona fide contract of sale, and that under said contract the said defendant parted with the ownership and control of said property, then the jury must find the defendants not guilty. (3) The court instructs the jury that if they believe, from the evidence in this case, that the contract of sale introduced in this case operated between the parties thereto as a bona fide sale of the property mentioned in the indictment, then, even if they believe that the defendant knew that the property was to be used as a house of ill fame, the jury must find the defendant not guilty. (4) The court further instructs the jury that the contract introduced in this case is upon its face a contract of sale between Elizabeth Emblem and Minerva Martin for the sale of the property named in the indictment, and that it is a question for the jury whether such contract was bona fide or not."

The court refused to give the following instructions requested by the defendant: "(7) The court instructs the jury that if they believe, from the evidence, that the defendant, Elizabeth Emblem, and Minerva Martin, made and entered into the contract of sale, introduced in evidence, of the property named in the indictment, and further believe that said Minerva Martin occupied said property under said contract of sale, then the jury must find the defendant not guilty. (8) The court instructs the jury that paper writing introduced in evidence is by its terms and in legal effect a contract of sale, and not a lease, and that if Minerva Martin occupied said property under said contract of sale, then the jury must find the defendants not guilty. (9) The court instructs the jury that, if they believe that the contract of sale introduced as evidence in this cause is such a contract as would bind the defendant, or such as the law would enforce between them, then the contract is bona fide, and they should acquit the defendant."

From an examination of the instructions given and refused, it is apparent that the ruling in State v. Emblem, 44 W. Va. 521, 29 S. E. 1031, does not govern this case. Here the jury have been instructed that the paper writing introduced is on its face a contract of sale. See instruction No. 5. This instruction and others given submitted to the jury the question whether it was a bona fide contract of sale. Instructions Nos. 7 and 8, refused, were so framed as to exclude this inquiry. Taken as a whole, these instructions are not open to the objection pointed out in State v. Emblem, 44 W. Va. 521, 29 S. E. 1031. On the contrary, they submit the very question which the court in that case said was proper to be submitted to the jury, namely, whether the contract was a sham and a device. The jury were told, by instructions Nos. 2 and 3, that if they believed, from the evidence, that the contract had been entered into in good faith as a contract of sale, they should find for the defendant, even if they believed she knew the property was to be used as a house of ill fame. If the contract was never intended to be enforced, nor to effect a change of ownership or control of the property, but only to be used as a protection from prosecution for violation of the statute, it was not a bona fide contract; and, if the evidence was such that the jury could find that it had been executed for that purpose, and no other, the court properly gave these instructions, and refused instructions Nos. 7 and 8. Said last-mentioned instructions are inconsistent with the others. They say mere occupancy of the property under the contract, without regard to the intent of the parties or the function the contract was to perform, entitled the defendant to an acquittal. If given, they would have amounted to a direction to find for the defendant, and this would have been irreconcilable with the submission by the other instructions of an inquiry as to a fact upon the result of which the finding was said to be dependent. Instruction No. 9 seems to have been framed for the purpose of obtaining from the court, for the guidance of the jury, a definition of the term "bona fide contract," used in some of the other instructions; and, if it had properly defined the term, it should have been given. But it did not do so. On the contrary, its effect would have been to confuse and mislead, instead of to enlighten. Whether a contract is binding and enforceable by law is a much broader and more difficult question to answer than whether the parties entered into it with honest and lawful intentions. Moreover, it is a question of law, and not of fact, and one for the court, and not for the jury. The manifest purpose in asking this instruction was to nullify other instructions given, by obtaining from the court a construction of them that would preclude any inquiry on the part of the jury as to the intent of the parties to the contract and the purpose for which it was executed.

It remains now to say whether the evidence is such as warranted the giving of the instructions and is sufficient to sustain the verdict. If not, instructions Nos. 7 and 8 should have been given, and the others refused, and the verdict set aside. The ostensible purchaser was a strange woman, who came with the pittance of $15 in her possession to rent a property worth about $3,300. Without any previous inquiry as to her ability to pay for it, or any discussion of price or terms, except the payment of $50 per month, to be known as "interest," the property was sold on the spot to this strange, penniless woman at the price of $7,500, and she was let into possession of it. In addition to the $50 per month interest, she was to pay $312.09 of the principal every quarter, besides taxes and all other assessments, making more than $154 per month to be paid under the contract. Where did Mrs. Emblem suppose the money was to come from? Did she expect it to be earned in washing, sewing, teaching, clerking, or any other honest vocation, such as could possibly have been followed by the woman who applied to her for the property? On the payment of $15, the woman was let into the house four weeks before the contract was signed. Is it customary or consistent with business principles to put a purchaser under an executory contract of sale in possession of real property without payment of any of the purchase money and prior to the execution of the written contract? It sometimes occurs between parties having confidence in each other; but are rank strangers so let into property as purchasers? The woman used the house from October, 1900, until she was indicted in July, 1901, and was still occupying it at the time of the trial in November, 1901, and no part of the purchase money was ever paid or demanded; but the interest was paid every week. This circumstance, standing alone, would signify little, if anything; but, considered in connection with what transpired at the inception of the arrangement between these parties, it has force and weight. Nothing was of sufficient importance then to merit discussion but the "interest." Subsequently nothing was collected or demanded but the "interest." This imports that the contract was never intended to have any effect or to be enforced. Did Mrs. Emblem know the purpose for which the house was to be used? The rent stipulated for under the designation of interest was double the rental value of the property for ordinary purposes. She took a contract which she knew was impossible of performance, except as to the weekly payments of "interest," and which no responsible party would have executed. She declined a rental contract which would have been consistent with the ability of the applicant. All these unusual, extraordinary, and apparently unreasonable acts, taken in connection with the close proximity of her residence to the property, and the fact that it was used for the illegal purpose aforesaid for about four weeks before the contract was signed, were amply sufficient to warrant the finding that she knew, at the time she executed the paper, what use was to be made of it. This unusual and extraordinary conduct does not emanate from imbecility, and can hardly be regarded as merely fortuitous. Presumably there is method and a purpose in it, something different from, and beyond, an ordinary sale of real estate. These circumstances plainly indicate that it was not in fact intended to be a contract of sale; and, as they support the hypothesis of an arrangement to give legal color to an illegal transaction, it was competent to direct an inquiry by the jury as to whether that was the actual arrangement.

It is insisted that, in order to sustain a conviction, there must be evidence of a secret verbal or written agreement for a lease of the property, contrary to, and inconsistent with, the alleged contract of sale—something in the nature of a defeasance, by which control of the property is retained by the alleged vendor. This is wholly unnecessary; for the jury have found that the written instrument never was intended to have any force or effect as between the parties, but is a mere collusive arrangement between them, and against the public, to prevent the enforcement of the statute. They have found from the circumstances, the only kind of evidence obtainable in such cases, that it was understood and agreed between these parties that, notwithstanding the contract, the ostensible vendee was never to pay, nor the vendor to collect, anything but the $50 per month, and that, although that was called interest on purchase money, it was in fact nothing but rent. The power to ascertain the intent of parties, and deal with them accordingly, where an attempt is made to evade the criminal law, is well settled. Even the records of courts may be overturned on the ground of fraud, and the criminal, attempting to hide himself thereunder, brought forth and punished. "A judgment of acquittal upon a verdict procured by fraud will not bar a second trial for the same offense. Even if a third person fraudulently manages to be put upon the jury to acquit a prisoner, the latter will not be deemed in jeopardy from the panel so constituted, though himself innocent of the fraud, and the judge may direct the juror's withdrawal." Bishop, Cr. Law, § 119. "If one procures himself to be prosecuted for an offense which he has committed, thinking to get off with a slight punishment and to bar a real prosecution in the future; if the proceeding is really managed by himself, either directly or through the agency of another—he is, while thus holding his fate in his own hands, in no jeopardy. The plaintiff state is no party in fact, but only such in name. The judge, indeed, is imposed upon, yet in point of law adjudicates nothing. All was a mere puppet show, and every wire moved by the offender himself. The judgment, therefore, is a nullity, and is no bar to a real prosecution." Bish. Cr. Law, § 1010.

A familiar maxim of the law is that fraud vitiates everything. It binds neither the state, the courts, nor individuals, whatever the form of its covering may be. The intent to cover and hide the offense here charged by this alleged contract of sale, and to set up a sham, shift, and device under which the forbidden acts may be done with impunity, is so apparent that to permit it to stand, by denying the right of the courts to go under it and dig up the intent of the parties with which to condemn it as a glaring and brazen fraud upon the public and an attempted obstruction to the administration of the criminal law, would be a travesty upon justice and a capitulation on the part of the courts and the Legislature to the powers of darkness, as well as a violation of legal principles. Whether Mrs. Emblem is liable is not determined by her declaration of non-liability in respect to the transaction, nor does her notice thereof to the public by the recordation of the contract avail anything. Whether she is guilty is a question of law, dependent upon the facts found from all the evidence; and a self-serving act or declaration, forming a part of it, if competent, has only such weight as the jury may deem it entitled to under all the circumstances. The recordation of the contract is a self-serving act, condemnatory in its effect, if it has any weight. She could have no purpose in it, other than that of attempting to give her fraudulent evasion of the law an appearance of fairness. It was not notice of any lien or title in her for the protection of which recordation of the paper was necessary.

The admission and subsequent exclusion of certain improper evidence is assigned as error for which there should be a reversal. Upon this question the authorities are divided. Thomp. Trials, §§ 351, 723. In Specht v. Howard, 16 Wall. 564, 21 L. Ed. 348, and the decisions of a number of the states, it is held not to be reversible error, if error at all. Of course, inadmissible evidence, or rather that which is not evidence, but relates to the parties or the subject-matter of the controversy, should not be stated in the hearing of the jury; but errors will occur in all courts, and they are allowed to correct their own errors in proper time, and, when they have done so, the injury ought to be deemed to have been cured and repaired. To say it is not accomplished by the instruction of the judge to the jury not to consider the condemned and excluded evidence, and his rejection of it, because it is not evidence, is to impute to the jury a stupidity and lack of intelligence and mental powers incompatible with the solid qualities which the law accredits to jurors.

Mrs. Emblem was convicted on another indictment for leasing or letting another house to Gene Edwards for the same unlawful purpose. Upon the trial of it, the evidence and rulings of the court were in all substantial respects the same as in this case, and the foregoing rulings and observations render it unnecessary to write a separate opinion in it.

As the two judgments complained of are free from error, they will be affirmed

DENT, J. (dissenting). William and Elizabeth Emblem entered into conditional contracts of sale of their separate properties to separate grantees, and placed them in possession, and the contracts, which were in writing, on record. Some time afterwards they were indicted, charged with renting or leasing their properties and permitting them to be used for the purpose of maintaining houses of ill fame. They were found guilty and obtained writs of error to this court.

The evidence shows that at the time of the contracts they surrendered all ownership and control of the properties to their grantees, and there is no evidence tending to show that they claimed or were exercising ownership or control over the properties at the time the indictments were found. A similar case, founded on a similar contract against the same parties, was heretofore determined by this court. State v. Emblem, 44 W. Va. 521, 29 S. E. 1031. The sole question submitted to and determined by the jury was whether the conditional contracts of sale were mere shifts or devices to cover up the leasing of the property for the unlawful purpose aforesaid, and not a parting with the ownership and control of the property. The jury answered in the affirmative, and this court is now called upon to say whether the evidence was sufficient to justify such finding. There was no evidence at all showing that the defendants exercised any acts of control or ownership over the property, and the jury was left to infer, from the nature of the contracts and the uses to which the property was being put, with the knowledge of the defendants, that the contracts, though on their faces conditional contracts of sale, were mere shifts and devices to cover up a leasing or renting of the property with knowledge of the purposes to which it was being put. This finding, in my opinion, is not justified by the evidence, for the reason that the defendants had the right to sell their properties and surrender control and ownership thereof, to avoid liability under the statute before such liability arose or attached. And it matters not that this was their object in so doing, so they surrendered complete control and ownership, they could thus relieve themselves from future liability. The owner and controllers of the property could be held liable, but not those who had disposed of their ownership and control, though it be only conditionally done. The statute is only intended to cover the leasing of the property by the owner and controller thereof, and not sales thereof, either conditional or absolute. Such statutes are strictly construed, and strictly confined to those who are plainly included in the language thereof. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 693; Mitchell v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 311, 30 S. W. 810; Lamar v. State, 30 Tex. App. 693, 18 S. W. 788.

It may undoubtedly be inferred from the evidence that the defendants entered into the contracts to avoid liability under the statute. This they had the same right to do as any person has the right to avoid being guilty of a crime or being responsible therefor. If, however, it had been shown that the contracts were entered into, not for the purpose of avoiding guilt, under the statute, but for the purpose of doing the thing forbidden by the statute, under the guise of a sale, and that the defendants still continued to exercise ownership and control over the property, they could have been justly convicted. There is no evidence justifying such conclusion, at least beyond a reasonable doubt; but the state's case is wholly lacking in this respect. The question is whether the defendants, acting in good faith, had the right to shift all future liability, before the same attached, as owners and controllers of their property, to the shoulders of their grantees, who were willing to assume such liability as owners and controllers of the property for the time being. They had probably been advised that they could do so. The statute does not so forbid. They executed the contracts in good faith, and had them recorded where they gave notice to the public; thus shifting all ownership and control of the property and right to possession thereof to their grantees, who assumed the same for a full consideration therefor. Their object in doing so was, not to evade the law, but to comply with it—to surrender their ownership and control and avoid the liability. This was not to prevent or hinder the enforcement of the criminal law, but to prevent themselves from being classed as criminals by reason of their ownership and control of the property. This in no wise prevented the state from prosecution of those who were in actual occupancy, ownership, and control of the property, or from closing and abating the property as a nuisance.

The plain intent of the Legislature was to render the property, through those who owned and controlled it, liable for the offense, and was not intended to effect those who were remotely interested, but who were not owners and controllers thereof. The statute, being derogatory to the common law, and an evasion of the rights of individuals not personally guilty of crime, should be confined to those mentioned in it by a strict construction thereof, and not extended to cover those who were endeavoring in good faith to avoid being guilty of offending against its express meaning. To extend its purpose and meaning by play upon the words "shift, device, and evasion," to include those not within its terms, is to legislate and not construe. Courts should confine themselves to construction, and should not usurp legislative powers, unless the demand for so doing is imperative. In this case no such imperative demand exists, as the state is all-powerful to close all such houses without resorting to the doubtful expedient of punishing an old man and woman, who are guilty of no criminal intent to evade its law, while hundreds who are actually guilty of participating in the offense, and patronize and uphold its evil, are permitted the freedom of the city. I may be wrong, owing to my limited information on the subject; but to such injustice I cannot assent, although I have no sympathy with wrong of any kind.

WHISENHANT v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

MASTER — INJURY TO SERVANT — NEGLIGENCE — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — PROXIMATE CAUSE OF INJURY — JURY QUESTIONS.

1. Where a freight train on which plaintiff and other laborers of a railroad were riding home was given a sudden increase of speed and a violent jerk by the engineer putting on steam in response to a signal from the conductor when the slowing train was naturally expected to be about to come to a full stop to let the laborers off, there was negligence on the part of the railroad.

2. In an action against a railroad for injuries to a servant, evidence examined, and whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence held a question for the jury as against a motion for nonsuit.

3. Whether the negligence of the defendant or the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, if any, was the proximate cause of the injury, was, under the evidence, also a question for the jury as against a motion for nonsuit.

Montgomery, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Burke County; Neal, Judge.

Action by Joseph Whisenhant against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Avery & Avery and Avery & Erwin, for appellant. S. J. Ervin, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiff, with other laborers working on the defendant's road west of Morganton, was daily hauled to his work, and returned home, on the work or gravel train. This train stopped at Morganton daily in the evening, in order that the plaintiff and other laborers living at that place might get off. There was evidence tending to show the following to be the facts on this occasion: The train was returning from work, and was running backward, the caboose in front; then four flat cars, on which the laborers sat on the floor, there being no seats nor railing; then the tender and engine. The caboose was locked so the laborers could not enter it. The train slowed up for Morganton, whereupon the plaintiff got up and went to the platform of the rear end of the caboose, it not being safe to stand up on the flatcar, and stood on the top step to be ready to get off when the train stopped. There were no steps to the flat car by which he could get off. The engineer, instead of stopping as usual at that point in response to a signal from the conductor, suddenly put on steam, which caused a sudden and violent jerk, which threw the plaintiff on the track, broke his skull, and otherwise injured him.

This sudden increase of speed and violent jerk, when the slowing train was naturally expected to be about to come to a full stop to let the laborers living in Morganton get off, was negligence on the part of the defendant. The plaintiff could not safely have stood up on the flat car, and in stepping upon the rear platform of the caboose car, to be ready to get off more readily and promptly, the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, unless it was shown that this was a more unsafe place. Whether it was more unsafe was a question for the jury. This is not the case of one sitting in a passenger coach getting up and going out to stand upon the platform. Here the plaintiff could not get into the caboose. He could not stand up on the flat car. Whether, in going upon the platform of the caboose, he took a greater risk and thus incurred contributory negligence, and whether, if he did, the subsequent negligence of the defendant in unexpectedly increasing speed (instead of stopping as usual), and the sudden and violent jerk which threw the plaintiff off the train, injuring him, were not the proximate cause of the injury, were eminently questions of fact which only a jury could determine. It was therefore error to nonsuit the plaintiff, for by so doing the judge passed upon the issues of fact which should determine this cause—(1) whether or not the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; (2) if that was true, was such contributory negligence, or the subsequent negligence of the defendant by increasing speed and causing the plaintiff to be thrown off, the proximate cause of the injury? If the plaintiff could have escaped unhurt but for the jerk, the negligence of the conductor in signaling at that point for an increase of speed, instead of stopping as usual for the plaintiff and others to get off, as from custom they had a right to expect, and the negligence of the engineer in suddenly turning on steam, thus causing a violent and unexpected jerk, was the proximate cause. Upon a nonsuit, the evidence must be taken in the most favorable light for the plaintiff. The cause should have been submitted to the jury, with appropriate instructions upon the different phases of the evidence. The plaintiff is entitled to have a jury pass upon his allegations and proofs, as guaranteed by the Constitution.

Error.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff through the alleged negligence of the conductor on one of defendant's trains. The negligence complained of is, in substance, as follows: That the defendant owed the plaintiff, who was employed by defendant as a laborer engaged in the repairing of the railroad track, the duty of carrying the plaintiff to and from Morganton on his going to and returning from his work; that the habit and custom of the defendant was to slow down the rate of speed of the engine and train upon reaching a cross street in Morganton near to station, so that the plaintiff could alight and go to his home; that on one of these return trips the plaintiff, while standing on the platform of the caboose when the train had slackened its speed and he was ready to alight, was suddenly hurled to the ground through the negligent conduct of the conductor, who, suddenly and without warning to the plaintiff, gave a signal to the engineer which resulted in a violent jerk. The evidence did not make good the allegations of the complaint. The plaintiff's evidence was to the effect that it was the habit and custom of the conductor to stop the train at the cross street in Morganton, and that the plaintiff always got on and off after the train had been stopped. The plaintiff's evidence was further that, as the train approached Morganton and had slowed to a low rate of speed—that is, as he said, from three to five miles an hour—he went out on the platform with a bundle and bucket in one hand, and holding with the other to an iron rod attached to the platform, and just as he was about to alight was thrown off and to the ground, through a sudden jerk and motion of the cars, and badly hurt. His testimony further was that if he had been sitting down on the flat cars he would have been perfectly safe.

The much-discussed question, in the oral arguments and in the briefs, on the subject of contributory negligence, is not necessary for us to discuss from the view we have taken of the case. We cannot see in what particular the defendant had been negligent. There cannot be culpable negligence in any case where the party charged with the negligence owes no duty to the other. In Carter v. Lumber Co., 129 N. C. 203, 39 S. E. 828, the court approves of the definition of negligence given by Alderson, B., in Blythe v. Water Works, 25 L. J. Ex. 213, which is as follows: "The omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a provident and reasonable man would not do; and an action may be brought if thereby mischief is caused to a third party not intentionally." Another good definition of negligence is found in volume 7, A. & E. Enc. of Law, p. 370, which is in these words: "Actionable negligence is the inadvertent failure of a legally responsible person to use ordinary care, under the circumstances, in observing or performing a noncontractual duty implied by law, which failure is the proximate cause of injury to a person to whom the duty is due." Now, under the evidence in this case (we mean the plaintiff's evidence), the duty of the defendant was to furnish the plaintiff safe transportation to Morganton, to stop the train at or near the station, at the usual place where the plaintiff got off, that he might alight in safety. The conductor did not stop the train as he ought to have done; but that was not the cause of the injury. The cause of the injury was the sudden jerk of the train by which the plaintiff was thrown off the car and injured. If that jerk had occurred at the stopping place, and after the train had stopped, or was nearly (almost) to a full stop—that is, very slowly and slightly and gently creeping along—that the plaintiff might alight, the defendant would have been negligent. Nance v. Railroad, 94 N. C. 619; Denny v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 340, 43 S. E. 847. But the train in our case was moving at from three to five miles an hour, and the defendant had been standing some little time on the platform. The defendant did not owe him the duty to keep a lookout for the plaintiff on the platform. The conductor had a right to suppose that he was in a place of safety which had been provided for the laborers on that train. A jerk of the cars, therefore, while the train was in motion, was not negligence in the conductor so far as this plaintiff was concerned, who was standing on the platform. The defendant owed the plaintiff no duty to look out for him and to care for him in that unusual place—that place of danger. Of course, if the conductor or engineer had seen the plaintiff in the situation in which he placed himself, the sudden jerk of the cars, if it had occurred then, would have been evidence of negligence; or if the plaintiff had been where he ought to have been, in a safe place by his own admission, and had been injured by the sudden jerk, then that fact would have been evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. Denny v. Railroad, supra.

I think there was no error in the dismissal of the action as by nonsuit.

GRIFFIN v. GRIFFIN et al.

SUBROGATION—PURCHASER AT VOID FORECLOSURE—PLEADING.

1. Where a purchaser at a void sale under a mortgage sues to subrogate himself to the rights of the mortgagee, the complaint should allege that the purchaser bought with the belief that he was obtaining the legal title, and should set forth the amount of the price.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; Leroy F. Youmans, Special Judge.

Action by Samuel W. Griffin against Joseph D. Griffin and others. From an order overruling a demurrer, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The following is the complaint:

"The complaint of the above-named plaintiff respectfully shows to this court:

"(1) That on the 16th day of January, A. D. 1883, the defendant Joseph D. Griffin made and delivered to Moses Levi his bond, bearing date on said day, conditioned for the payment of the full and just sum of $2,585 on or before the 8th day of December, 1883, with interest from date at the rate of ten per cent. per annum until paid in full.

"(2) That on the 19th day of January, 1883, the said Joseph D. Griffin, to secure the payment of said bond, executed and delivered to Moses Levi his deed, and thereby conveyed, by way of mortgage, to Moses Levi, his heirs and assigns, the following lands and tenements, situated in the said county of Clarendon: 'My individual share as an heir of John Griffin, deceased, of the real estate owned by the said John Griffin at the time of his death, and five separate shares of said real estate of five other heirs of the said John Griffin, which have been conveyed to me and which I am the owner. The real estate of which the said six shares are hereby granted, bargained, sold and released (being six-elevenths thereof) is situate in said county and state, on Jack's Creek, contains 183 acres, and is bounded south and west by lands of J. J. Holliday, east by lands of L. N. Richbourg, and north by lands of D. W. Brallsford. The run of Jack's Creek being the line on the southeast corner.'

"(3) That the said deed was what is commonly known as a 'Scotch mortgage,' and contained a condition, in substance, that if the said Joseph D. Griffin should pay or cause to be paid to the said Moses Levi all his indebtedness to him then existing or thereafter contracted, as well as the sum of money evidenced by the said bond, with interest thereon, if any shall be due, according to the true intent and meaning of the said bond, then the deed of bargain and sale should cease, determine, and be utterly null and void. But in case of nonpayment of the indebtedness then existing, or of any debt thereafter contracted, or of the said bond, the said Joseph D. Griffin empowered the said Moses Levi, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to grant, bargain, sell, and convey the said premises at public auction, make a conveyance in fee of the said premises to the purchaser at such sale, and after deducting from the proceeds of sale all taxes paid by the mortgagee, the principal and interest due on the said debt or debts, and all counsel fees and costs of sale, then to pay the overplus, if any, to the said Joseph D. Griffin, who further agreed that, upon the completion of said sale by conveyance, the purchaser should be entitled to immediate possession, and any holding thereafter by the said Joseph D. Griffin, or other person holding under him, shall be as tenant of the said purchaser, at a rent of $30 per month, payable monthly, and giving the purchaser the right to terminate such tenancy and obtain possession of the premises.

"(4) That on the 20th day of January, A. D. 1883, the said mortgage was delivered to the register of mesne conveyances of said county, to be by him entered on record, and was recorded.

"(5) That default having been made in the payment of the debt secured by said mortgage, the said Moses Levi, under the power contained in said mortgage, on the 4th day of February, 1884, sold the shares and interest covered by and described in the said mortgage; and by his deed containing all necessary recitations, bearing date the 13th day of February, 1884, the said Moses Levi conveyed the premises so sold to Ferdinand Levi, who, by his deed bearing date the 14th day of February, 1884, conveyed such premises to the said Moses Levi.

"(6) That by his deed bearing date the 16th day of January, A. D. 1891, the said Moses Levi sold and conveyed all his right, title, and interest in and to the said 183-acre tract of land to said Samuel W. Griffin; that the interests and shares of, in, and to said land so conveyed by said Moses Levi covered the six shares thereof which were embraced in the mortgage executed by said Joseph D. Griffin, referred to in the second paragraph of this complaint, and acquired by said Moses Levi under the foreclosure sale referred to in the fifth paragraph of this complaint, as well as such shares and interests in the said 183-acre tract of land as were otherwise acquired by said Moses Levi.

"(7) That the aforesaid conveyance from Moses Levi to Ferdinand Levi, bearing date the 13th day of February, 1884, is invalid, in law, by reason of the fact that the same was not signed in the name of the mortgagor by the mortgagee.

"(8) That the said sale and invalid conveyance from Moses Levi to Ferdinand Levi, and the said conveyance from Ferdinand Levi to Moses Levi, and the said conveyance from Moses Levi to Samuel W. Griffin, the plaintiff herein, had, however, the effect of transferring and assigning the said bond and mortgage, and the debt thereby secured, and all the right, title, and interest of the said Ferdinand Levi and the said Moses Levi therein, to the plaintiff, Samuel W. Griffin, who by operation of law is subrogated to all the rights of the said Moses Levi and of the said Ferdinand Levi, acquired by, through, and under said mortgage.

"(9) That the condition of said bond and mortgage, as hereinbefore alleged, has long been broken, and there is due and remaining unpaid upon said bond and mortgage the sum of $2,585, with interest thereon from the 16th day of January, A. D. 1883, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, until fully paid.

"(10) That the defendants William H. Griffin, Richard M. Griffin, and Lawrence Griffin have been for a number of years, and are now, occupying, using, holding, and receiving the rents and profits accruing from the aforesaid mortgaged premises, alleging that such occupancy and holding is in behalf of and for the benefit of the defendant Joseph D. Griffin.

"Therefore, the plaintiff demands judgment: First, that the defendant Joseph D. Griffin, and all persons claiming under him, be forever barred and foreclosed of all right, title, interest, and equity of redemption in the said mortgaged premises, or any part thereof; second, that the mortgaged premises be sold under the order and direction of this court, and the proceeds of sale, after deducting the costs and expenses of this action and of such sale, and any taxes that may be a lien upon the premises, be applied to the payment of the amount due upon the bond and mortgage hereinbefore set forth, with the interest thereon to the time of such payment; third, that judgment be entered up in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant Joseph D. Griffin for the sum of $2,585, with interest thereon from the 16th day of January, A. D. 1883, at ten per cent. per annum, and that the net proceeds of sale be credited upon said judgment."

The defendant Joseph D. Griffin demurs to the complaint, "and, for cause of demurrer, alleges that the same does not allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action: (1) In that it does not allege facts showing that the plaintiff herein is the legal or equitable owner of the debt, bond, and mortgage mentioned therein, or either of them; (2) that the complaint does not allege facts sufficient to show that the plaintiff owns any interest, either legal or equitable, in either the debt, bond, or mortgage mentioned therein."

From circuit order overruling demurrer, defendants appeal.

Wilson & Durant, for appellants. Jos. F. Rhame and W. C. Davis, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The circuit court overruled the demurrer to the complaint, and the defendants appeal.

It is well established that a purchaser who buys at a void sale purporting to be made under the power contained in a mortgage, with belief that he will obtain a good title, is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, and may foreclose the mortgage. As we understand, the objection to this complaint is that there is no allegation that the purchaser bought, and paid the purchase money, honestly believing that he would obtain a good title. In Sims v. Steadman, 62 S. C. 300, 40 S. E. 677, followed in Chambers v. Bookman, 67 S. C. 454, 46 S. E. 39, the equity of subrogation is placed on the ground that the purchaser bought under the honest belief that by the sale he would be clothed with the legal title. Perhaps cases may arise presenting peculiar features justifying the court in applying the doctrine of subrogation even when the purchaser did not feel confident of his title, but was impelled to bid at the sale to protect his own interests, rather than take the risk of the court holding a sale valid which he himself regarded invalid or of doubtful validity. No such peculiar circumstances are alleged in this case, and the demurrer must be sustained.

It is held in Givins v. Carroll, 40 S. C. 413, 18 S. E. 1030, 42 Am. St. Rep. 889, that the subrogation of the purchaser to the rights of the mortgagee is ordinarily limited to the amount of the purchase money, and for this reason the payment of the purchase money and its amount should usually be alleged. We do not say, however, that a purchaser might not have equities, as between himself and the mortgagee, which would take the case out of the ordinary rule. As the mortgagee has not been made a party, and he, and not the mortgagor, is primarily interested in this question, we express no opinion as to whether the facts alleged in the complaint make this case an exception to the rule laid down in Givins v. Carroll, supra.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the demurrer be sustained, with leave to the plaintiff to move to amend as he may be advised.

PARROTT et al. v. BARRETT et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 23, 1904.)

WILL—CONSTRUCTION—DEATH OF LIFE TENANT —PARTITION—RIGHTS OF REMAINDERMEN
—ESTOPPEL—FAMILY SETTLEMENT.

1. Testator devised lands to A. for her natural life for her sole and separate use, and on her death to the heirs of her body living at the time of her death, share and share alike. Held, that at the death of the life tenant the fee passed to the children and grandchildren then living, per capita.

2. A father joined in a deed of partition of lands devised to his mother for life, and at her death to the heirs of her body, but died before the life tenant. Held, that his children were not estopped on the death of the life tenant from claiming under the will, though they remained in possession as heirs at law of their father after his death.

3. In a suit by grandchildren of testator to enforce a trust deed executed by their father, of lands set apart to him under partition deed between his mother, as life tenant, and his brothers and sisters, they are not estopped by the judgment from suing for general partition between themselves and their uncles and aunts under the will of their grandfather.

4. Where children do not claim from their father, but directly under the will of their grandfather, they are not affected by a family settlement to which their father was a party.

Woods, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County.

Action by Nettie F. Parrott and others against George McD. Barrett and others for partition. From the decree, all the parties appeal. Modified.

The circuit decree is as follows:

"This is an action for partition. The subject-matter thereof is a parcel of land containing 889 acres, and referred to in the muniments of title as the 'Green Tract.' The testimony shows the land to be of unusually fertile character, and the market value high. The issues of law are few, and there are practically no issues of fact.

"A history of the case is this: The land belonged to Capt. James Rembert, who died testate many years since. He devised it to his daughter, Jane Rembert Barrett, 'to and for the natural term of her life and no longer, to her sole and separate use * * * and at and immediately upon her death * * * I give and devise and bequeath the said tract of land to the heirs of her body who may be living at the time of her death, share and share alike, to them and their heirs and assigns forever.' This Jane lived for many years after the death of her father—probably fifty—and only died in the year 1901; but on the 22d day of December, 1874, Jane and her children, Charles, Elizabeth, George, Caleb, Samuel, Albertus, and Martha, entered into a paper writing whereby they undertook to anticipate the time for partition set in the will, and actually effected a division of the Green tract betwixt them. Thereafter the son Charles died about the year 1880, and the plaintiffs herein are his children. As will be conjectured by this time, the plaintiffs contend they were heirs of the body of Jane at the time of her death, and are now entitled to share the Green tract alike with Jane's children. The paper writing above referred to is in the handwriting of the late Hon. Thos. B. Fraser. It was stated in argument that he drew it. Annexed thereto is an elaborate plat of the Green tract, divided into twelve parcels. Some of the parcels so set off to the children of Jane have come into the possession of other persons, and some have become incumbered by strangers, and of some strangers are warrantors. All such new persons are parties hereto. The defendant Mary L. Barrett is the widow of Charles S. and mother of the plaintiffs, and she has become the owner by purchase of two parcels of land, containing together 103 acres, assigned in the first instance to Samuel J. Barrett.

"I am of the opinion that, under the will of James Rembert, the daughter, Jane, took a life estate, and that at her death in 1901 the title was then divisible in equal shares betwixt the six children of Jane and the plaintiffs, her grandchildren; that is to say, each was entitled to have one-tenth of the whole.

"It was argued at the bar (by Mr. Livingston) that the testator intended the share of each child of Jane to go to the children of each child, and that he did not use 'heirs of her body' and 'share and share alike' in a technical sense. And to give strength to that contention, other parts of the will were cited, wherein the testator directed a distribution 'among my heirs according to the provisions of the act generally termed the statute of distributions'; but, on the other hand, the use by the testator of different language for different devises goes to show he had different purposes, and not one purpose. The language of the will is too plain for construction, strong as the argument is. Kerngood v. Davis, 21 S. C. 207.

"I am, however, of the opinion that the paper writing above referred to, together with the things that have been done thereunder, have modified the direction of the will. It is not worth while to state the law of estoppel and of confirmation by minors, for it rests on sound principles of justice and equity.

"In the case at bar, Jane was entitled to enjoy the entire 889 acres from the death of the testator, James Rembert, in 1858, until her own death, in 1901, and to the exclusion of her children and their children. But in 1874, twenty-seven years before the time was ripe, she and her seven children made the paper writing 'in anticipation of the period prescribed in the said will, and for the natural love and affection which she bore to her said children.' If that paper can be sustained and be made the rule of division now, it ought to be done. It goes without saying, had the plaintiffs and those acting for them ignored the paper writing and held their hands until 1901, they could now demand that the letter of the will be enforced. But the family division was so just, so reasonable, and so for the benefit of all concerned, that it deserved the most serious consideration at the hands of a court of equity. The parties cannot now be put in statu quo. Each of them has used and enjoyed his or her share for more than a quarter of a century. In 1887 the plaintiffs and their mother recovered in this court the share which Charles S. Barrett had accepted, and which one W. A. James, Sr., has a short time therefore fraudulently gotten from them. They have ever since enjoyed that parcel and claimed it as their own. The plaintiff Nettie reached her majority in 1893, Janie in 1896, Lila in 1897, and Chariton 25th August, 1899. This action was begun in July, 1901. The plaintiffs knew their rights under the will of James Bembert, and they knew them before Jane's death, and while they enjoyed the rents and profits. They therefore have not begun an action to recover a newly-discovered right. Mrs. Mary L. Barrett testified: 'We have always thought that at the death of Mrs. Barrett they would act according to her will, and there would be a new division. Q. Is that the reason why you and your children have not improved it? A. Yes.' I am of the opinion the plaintiffs have waited too long to undo so just a family arrangement, and I am of the opinion their silence will be taken as a confirmation of it.

"Looking, therefore, to the paper writing for a chart of the rights of the parties, what does it provide? In my opinion, the shares set aside for all the children of Jane must stand intact, in whosoever hands they now be. But one parcel, No. 5, containing 168½ acres, was set aside for the mother, Jane, '[a] for her life, according to the terms of the said will; [b] and that in case there should be any persons living at her death who may be heirs of her body and not parties to this deed, and entitled to an equal share in the said tract of land under the terms of the said will, then that lot No. 5 shall be [1] held as a common fund out of which the interests of said heirs, not parties hereto, shall be paid and satisfied; or [2] for the reimbursement of any of the parties to this deed of settlement whose possession may be disturbed, for any loss from such disturbance by such heirs not herein provided for; [3] or the reimbursement of any purchasers from any of the parties to this deed who may be subjected to loss by such heirs not herein provided for by the parties hereby confirmed.' The letters and numbers in brackets are my own, and are not in the paper writing.

"How shall the 168½ acres of land left by Jane in 1901 be disposed of? Along with the paper writing, it ought to be inferred that the division at that time into seven shares for the children was one of equality.

The testimony so shows, as well. Had all the seven children lived until 1901, then only that portion of the above-quoted parts of the paper writing marked 'a' would have been operative, and the 168½ acres would in that event have gone in equal shares to the seven children who signed the paper. But so much of the quotation as is marked 'b' refers to a condition which has arisen since the paper was executed. There were in fact persons living at Jane's death who answered the description of heirs of her body, and not parties to the paper, and entitled by the will to an equal share of the 889 acres. That is the event on the happening of which further provision was made.

"I cannot concur in the view of defendants' counsel (Mr. Haynesworth) that the maker of the paper contemplated other children to be born to Jane. The paper was drawn by counsel of especial learning in the law, and he saw the manifest peril which lurked in the partition ahead of the allotted time. The words of the paper are apt and comprehensive and plain. I am of the opinion the very condition has arisen which the scrivener had in mind. Under the paper writing, the plaintiffs have received together only one-seventh of 720½ acres, and they have each received only one-twenty-eighth of 720½ acres, whereas in 1901 they were each entitled to one-tenth of the whole 889 acres by the will. The paper writing has provided how the deficiency of these new heirs of the body should be made good. Not in full, perhaps, but so far as the funds set aside for that purpose would go. The clauses 2 and 3 were practically the same thing. One has reference to the reimbursement of a child of Jane; the other, to a reimbursement of a purchaser from such child. The clause 1 is, in effect, not different from the clause 2. Under both the 168½ acres is the trust fund, either to make good what the six children might be called on to pay to the four grandchildren, or for payment direct to the four grandchildren. The 168½ acres was also the only fund set aside by the settlement for equality of division. The paper writing provides, 'and it is further covenanted and agreed that at the death of the said * * * Jane * * * and all heirs of her body not parties hereto shall be satisfied. Anything which remains of lot 5 shall go as directed by the said will for the whole tract.' If, therefore, it takes the whole of the 168½ acres to make the plaintiffs equal under the family settlement with the children of Jane, then the whole must so go. If anything remains after such equality has been effected, then that balance must itself be equally divided amongst the heirs of Jane's body, share and share alike. It may be assumed, under the family settlement, and under the testimony, too, that one acre of the land was and is practically as good as another acre, so that the unit or value for division is one acre. Under the environment of 1901, each heir of the body of Jane is entitled to have, by the will, 89 acres, or a fraction less. Excluding the 168½ acres, the children of Jane have each received, on an average, 101 acres of land, and the grandchildren, the plaintiffs, have each received 26½ acres. If the 168½ acres be given entirely to the plaintiffs, their share will not then be equal to a tenth of the whole; but, under the terms of the family settlement, they can get no more. I am therefore of the opinion that the 168½ acres of land marked 'No. 5' on the plat is of right the sole property of the plaintiffs, and it is so decreed.

"It was stated at bar that no notice of lis pendens had been filed in the action, and that, since action began, the interests of Charlton S. Barrett had been purchased by A. B. Stuckey, Esq. It was further stated that there were questions betwixt Mannes Baum, creditor, and Geo. M. Barrett, and betwixt T. R. McGhan, creditor, and Margaret A. Phillips, which questions are reserved for future and further considerations. It is further ordered, that the costs of this action be paid as follows, to wit: the costs of plaintiffs by the plaintiffs, and costs of defendants by the defendants."

From this decree all parties appeal.

A. B. Stuckey and Johnstone & Cromer, for plaintiffs. Haynesworth & Haynesworth, Lee & Moise, and Knox Livingston, for defendants.

JONES, J. Plaintiffs seek partition of a tract of land, 889 acres, formerly in Sumter, now in Lee, county, among the remaindermen under the will of James Rembert, deceased, admitted to probate May 11, 1858. The second clause of the will provides: "Second. I will, devise and bequeath to my beloved daughter, Jane Barrett, all of that tract of land lying towards the south of my plantation, known as the Green tract of land, to and for the natural term of her life and no longer; to her sole and separate use, to be in no way subject to the debts, contracts or control of her present or any future husband; and at and immediately upon the death of my said daughter, Jane Barrett, I give, devise and bequeath the said tract of land to the heirs of her body who may be living at the time of her death, share and share alike; to their heirs and assigns forever. To be esteemed and regarded as of the value of five thousand dollars." Jane Barrett died in April, 1901, and this action was commenced on 22d July, 1901. The plaintiffs are the children of Charles S. Barrett, who was the son of Jane Barrett, and died in April, 1880, before the death of the life tenant. The defendants are the children of Jane Barrett and those in privity with them. Partition as claimed was resisted mainly on two grounds: (1) That "heirs of the body who may be living at the time of her death, share and share alike," means children of Jane Barrett living at the time of her death, and therefore excludes plaintiffs, who, as grandchildren, do not answer that description. (2) The plaintiffs, by their ratification thereof or estoppel to deny, are bound by a partition of said lands made in 1874 among the life tenant, Jane Barrett, and her children, including Charles S. Barrett, the father of plaintiffs. The circuit court, in a decree herewith reported, held that under this will—there being six children and four grandchildren answering the description "heirs of the body," etc.—each of the four plaintiffs was entitled to one-tenth of the land, but that their right was modified by the partition of 1874, which he held plaintiffs had confirmed. It was therefore decreed that plaintiffs, in addition to the tracts Nos. 1 and 3, containing 106½ acres, set apart to Charles S. Barrett, plaintiffs' father, in said partition, should receive tract No. 5, containing 168½ acres, which had been set apart to Jane Barrett, life tenant, in said partition agreement, which contained this stipulation: "And it is hereby further agreed by the said parties, that the said lot No. 5, assigned to Mrs. Jane Barrett, shall be held by her for her life, according to the terms of the said will, and that in case there should be any person living at her death, who may be heirs of her body and not parties to this deed, and entitled to an equal share in the said tract of land under the terms of the said will, then that said lot No. 5 shall be held as a common fund, out of which the interest of such heirs, not parties hereto, shall be paid and satisfied, or for the reimbursement of any of the parties to this deed of settlement, whose possession may be disturbed, for any loss from such disturbance by such heirs not herein provided for, or the reimbursement of any purchasers from any of the parties to this deed who may be subjected to loss by such heirs not herein provided for by the partition hereby confirmed. And it is further covenanted and agreed that at the death of the said Mrs. Jane Barrett and all heirs of her body not parties hereto shall be satisfied, anything which remains of lot No. 5 shall go as directed by the said will for the whole tract." In reaching this conclusion, the circuit court held that, under the testimony, one acre of land was practically as good as another, and therefore took one acre as the unit of valuation, so that the plaintiffs, under the will being entitled to four-tenths of the 889 acres or 355 acres (omitting fractions) and having received 106 acres through their father under the partition of 1874, were entitled to 249 acres; but, having confirmed the partition agreement, their further recovery was limited to tract No. 5, containing 168 acres, the stipulated fund for equalization.

Both sides appeal; the plaintiffs contending that they had not confirmed the partition of 1874, and were not estopped thereby, and were each entitled to one-tenth of the whole 889-acre tract; the defendants contending that plaintiffs, having ratified the partition of 1874, must be held as satisfied therewith, and that if entitled to any relief as "heirs of the body," etc., of Jane Barrett, they should be restricted to a partition of tract No. 5, in accordance with the terms of the will, share and share alike with defendants.

We agree with the circuit court in the construction of the will. The plaintiffs, as children of Charles S. Barrett, the son of Jane Barrett—their father having died before Jane Barrett—answered the description of heirs of the body of Jane Barrett; and, the will expressly directing that the heirs of her body living at her death should share and share alike, the plaintiffs take per capita, and not per stirpes, and so are, under the will, each entitled to one-tenth of the tract of land in question. This conclusion is fully sustained by the cases of Kerngood v. Davis, 21 S. C. 206; Dukes v. Faulk, 37 S. C. 265, 16 S. E. 122, 34 Am. St. Rep. 745.

We do not think that plaintiffs have done anything with reference to the partition of 1874 which should prevent the assertion now of their rights under the will. The first matter which is relied on as an estoppel against plaintiffs to assert their present claim is that plaintiffs, with their mother, Mary L. Barrett, after the death of the father, Charles S. Barrett, continued to use the land set apart to Charles S. Barrett as his heirs at law. We see nothing in this inconsistent with plaintiffs' claim under the will. Jane Barrett, the life tenant, had the absolute disposal of her life estate. In her motherly affection and unselfishness, she chose to share her life estate with her children. But the plaintiffs were in no wise parties to the partition agreement, at which time three of them were unborn, and the eldest was only about two years old. The legal effect of the partition agreement or deed, so far as plaintiffs are concerned, was merely to convey the life estate of Jane Barrett to the persons designated. Plaintiffs' right to use the estate which Jane Barrett conveyed to their father and his heirs was cast upon them by law, and as the result of Jane Barrett's generosity, not by any agency of defendants. If plaintiffs received any benefits, the benefits did not come from defendants, nor were defendants misled thereby, nor was any action thereby induced to defendants' prejudice. If plaintiffs, on coming of age, during the life of the life tenant, had repudiated the partition and reconveyed to Jane Barrett, no interest of defendants could have been favorably affected. We see no element of estoppel in pais in this.

It is suggested that the facts that the plaintiffs continued to occupy the lands set apart to their father on coming of age during the life of the life tenant, without some act in repudiation of the partition, was holding onto an advantage, inasmuch as it was possible that plaintiffs might (1) not survive the life tenant, and so would lose all interest in the 889-acre tract; or (2) in the event of one or more of the other children of Jane Barrett dying before her, leaving children, plaintiffs' interest might be less than what they might take under the partition. These were possible contingencies, but the conduct of plaintiffs would still not work an estoppel. The general rule of estoppel in pais is that "when one person, by his statements, conduct, action, behavior, concealment, or even silence, has induced another, who has a right to rely upon these statements, etc., and who does rely upon them in good faith, to believe in the existence of the state of facts with which they are incompatible, and act upon that belief, the former will not be allowed to assert, as against the latter, the existence of a different state of facts from that indicated by his statement or conduct, if the latter has so far changed his position that he would be injured thereby." 4 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 258. To work an estoppel, the matter relied on must have induced the party claiming estoppel to assume a position which he otherwise would not have taken. Draffin v. Charleston, C. & G. R. Co., 34 S. C. 464, 13 S. E. 427; 4 Am. & E. Dec. in Eq. 281. It follows that an act done after the party's position has been taken or changed will not avail as ground for estoppel, because it cannot have been relied upon. 4 A. & E. Dec. in Eq. 286. Whatever position defendants were induced to take was taken in 1874. It does not even appear that defendants have made any expenditures by way of improving the premises set apart to them in the partition, either before or after the plaintiffs attained their majority.

It is further contended that plaintiffs are estopped by record in the case of Mary L. Barrett and the plaintiffs, by their guardian ad litem, against William A. James, Sr., resulting in a decree adjudging Mary L. Barrett and plaintiffs here entitled to the tracts which had been set apart to Charles S. Barrett in the partition as his heirs at law, and entitled to judgment against James for rents and profits during his occupancy of said premises. It appears that on January 26, 1876, Charles S. Barrett mortgaged the said parcels of land to Thos. J. McCutchen & Co. to secure a debt of $608.44, which mortgage had been foreclosed, and said parcels sold to Holmes & Durham, who afterwards conveyed to James. In 1887 the widow and children of Charles S. Barrett commenced the action against James, alleging that Holmes & Durham had bought said parcels under an agreement with Charles S. Barrett to convey to Mary L. Barrett and her children as soon as the loan for the purchase money was repaid; that said James had bought with knowledge of said agreement; and that Mary L. Barrett and her children owned said land as tenants in common, and as heirs at law of Charles S. Barrett. The decree of Judge Kershaw, dated September 15, 1887, directed James to convey said parcels of land to Mary L. Barrett and the plaintiffs here, as heirs at law of Charles S. Barrett, and to pay them $859.88, excess of rents and profits during his possession, 1882 to 1887, over payments by him to Holmes & Durham, etc. In February, 1888, James made the conveyance as ordered by the court, and plaintiffs have been in possession ever since. That suit was not between the same parties and does not involve the same cause of action as the present suit. No right under the will was asserted in that suit. As already stated, their claim of the premises during the life of Jane Barrett, as heirs at law of Charles S. Barrett, was perfectly consistent with the present claim under the will. Judge Kershaw expressly refrained from expressing any opinion upon the proper construction of the will of James Rembert or the effect of the partition.

The foregoing are the only matters relied on to show any confirmation of plaintiffs of the partition, or estoppel to assert rights under the will. The partition, in so far as plaintiffs are concerned, cannot be sustained on the ground that it was a family settlement, as plaintiffs had no voice therein, and their rights under the will could not be varied in such a settlement unless they were properly represented in it. Plaintiffs have been diligent in the assertion of their rights, as no cause of action accrued to them until the death of the life tenant, and they brought this action within a few months of the life tenant's death.

In the settlement of this case the court is disposed, as far as possible, consistently with plaintiffs' rights, to preserve the possession of defendants, or their privies, of the parcels set apart to them in said partition, as they are bound, as among themselves, to abide by the same. The court, however, is not quite satisfied with the rule adopted by the circuit court, in holding that each acre is practically as good as another, and in making one acre the unit of value, as the testimony is very meager on that subject. We therefore think that each parcel as set apart in the partition of 1874 should be valued by appraisers appointed for that purpose, and that plaintiffs should first be allotted tracts 1 and 3, now occupied by them; then, to the extent necessary to give them four-tenths of the value of the whole tract of 889 acres, they should be allotted from tract No. 5, containing 168½ acres; then, if this be still insufficient, any deficiency remaining should be made up to them by an assessment for equality of partition upon each parcel assigned to defendants in the partition, in the proportion which the value of their respective parcels bears to said deficiency, to be paid by defendants or their privies within such reasonable time as the circuit court may fix, and, in default of such payment, plaintiffs to have leave to apply to the circuit court for the proper relief. After plaintiffs shall have thus received four-tenths of the whole tract of 889 acres, the defendants shall be entitled to the parcels respectively assigned to them in said partition. If the whole tract No. 5 be not required to give plaintiffs four-tenths of the whole 889 acres, the remainder should be partitioned according to law among the defendant children of Jane Barrett.

The judgment of this court is that the decree of the circuit court is modified in the particulars named, and the cause is remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views above announced.

WOODS, J. (dissenting). I concur in the construction given to the will of James Rembert in the opinion of Mr. Justice JONES—that his daughter, Jane Barrett, took a life estate, with remainder to such persons per capita as should answer the description of heirs of her body at the time of her death. But I cannot agree that the plaintiffs are not bound by the terms of the deed for the partition of the land. Mrs. Barrett left surviving her, as the heirs of her body, six children, and the plaintiffs, the four children of Charles Barrett, a son who died before his mother. Under the will, therefore, the plaintiffs would be entitled to four-tenths of the land devised. The question is whether they have bound themselves by election to a different family arrangement. Obviously neither Charles Barrett, in his lifetime, nor the plaintiffs, as his heirs, were entitled to any portion of the land until the death of the life tenant, Jane Barrett. But during his lifetime, and by an agreement between Mrs. Barrett and her children, which was also a mutual conveyance, all the land was actually partitioned among the children, except a tract of 168½ acres, known as lot No. 5, which it was covenanted "should be held by Mrs. Jane Barrett for her life, according to the terms of James Rembert's will; and in case there should be any persons living at her death who may be heirs of her body and not parties to the said deed, and entitled to an equal share in said tract of land under the terms of said will, then that said lot No. 5 shall be held as a common fund, out of which the interest of such heirs not parties to said deed shall be paid and satisfied, or for the reimbursement of any of the parties to said deed of settlement, whose possession may be disturbed for any loss from such disturbance by such heirs not in said deed provided for, or the reimbursement of any purchasers from any of the parties to said deed who may be subjected to loss by such heirs not in said deed provided for by the partition by said deed confirmed; and further, that at the death of Mrs. Jane Barrett, and all heirs of her body not parties to said deed shall be satisfied, anything which remains of lot No. 5 shall go as directed by said will for the whole tract."

Charles Barrett died in April, 1880. Since his death the plaintiffs, together with his widow, as his heirs at law, have used and enjoyed the land set apart to him, actively claiming title to it as their own by heirship from Charles Barrett. Mrs. Jane Barrett, the life tenant, died in 1901. The eldest of the plaintiffs attained her majority in 1893, and the youngest in 1899. The plaintiffs took the full benefit of the family settlement for some years after they attained their majority, by claiming and holding the land derived from their father under it. As his heirs they were his privies, and they elected to hold the benefits which accrued to them as such heirs. These benefits came through the deed. "No rule is better established than that one cannot claim under and against a deed or will." Bailey v. Boyce, 4 Strob. Eq. 91. It is true, the brothers and sisters of Charles Barrett would not have been entitled to the land set off to him even if the plaintiffs, as his heirs, had repudiated the family settlement, and given notice that they would not hold the land set apart to their father under that instrument. But Mrs. Barrett had, by the family contract, surrendered and conveyed away her life interest in the lands therein set apart to her children for the benefit of each and every one of them. The consideration paid by the mother for each of the children was as good, and inured as much to their benefit, as if each had surrendered an interest in the land set apart to Charles Barrett. This consideration paid by her to each child was sufficient to bind each of them and all who took the benefit of the consideration paid by her under or through any of them. The plaintiffs partook of the consideration by holding the land after the death of their father until the death of Mrs. Barrett, the life tenant. Having elected to take the benefits of the deed of conveyance of the life estate of their grandmother, the plaintiffs should not be allowed to hold those benefits, and after her death disavow the deed. The plaintiffs answer the description of the class of persons provided for in the family settlement who might be living at the death of Mrs. Barrett, and be heirs of her body, and not parties to the deed, for whom the tract of 168½ acres was provided, and to this and to the land set apart to Charles Barrett I think they should be limited.

I think the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

JONES v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. R.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 24, 1904.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF CIRCUIT COURT
—MAGISTRATE'S JUDGMENT.

1. The finding of the circuit court, on appeal from a magistrate, that the judgment is not supported by the evidence as to one cause of action, is not reviewable on appeal.

2. Where a general verdict is rendered before a magistrate, and the evidence does not support the second cause of action, it was proper to order a new trial as to both causes, there being no means to ascertain how the verdict should be apportioned.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Gary, Judge.

Action in magistrate court by Swinton J. Jones against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad. From circuit order reversing judgment of magistrate, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. D. Jennings, for appellant. Mark Reynolds, for respondent.

JONES, J. This was a suit in a magistrate court in Sumter county for damages, and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff for $40. On appeal therefrom, the circuit court granted a new trial in the following order: "This case, which was tried before a magistrate without a jury, came up on exceptions to the rulings of the magistrate, and his judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $40. The complaint states two causes of action, and the magistrate rendered a general verdict, not stating upon which cause of action, or how, the same was to be apportioned. After hearing all the testimony and the arguments pro and con, I find and conclude that there is no evidence to sustain the second cause of action in said complaint, and it being impossible to apportion the verdict, or to ascertain upon which cause of action the same was based or its component parts referable, it is ordered that the judgment of the said magistrate be, and the same is hereby, reversed, and a new trial granted. Lampley v. Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co., 63 S. C. 462, 41 S. E. 517."

The complainant sought to recover damages (1) in the sum of $67.70 for loss of a box containing tools and material for repairing watches, clocks, and sewing machines, and (2) in the sum of $30 for failing to stop the defendant's passenger coach at Mayesville station, in Sumter county, so that plaintiff might reboard the same as passenger, he being a passenger from Lynchburg, S. C., to Sumter, S. C., and having got off near Mayesville, an intermediate station, to attend to some business, on the statement and assurance of the conductor that there would be sufficient time, and that the passenger coach would be pulled up to and stop at the station proper for passengers. It is excepted, substantially, that the circuit court erred: "(1) In finding that there was no testimony to sustain the second cause of action, whereas there was sufficient testimony to sustain said cause of action. (2) Because there being sufficient evidence to sustain the first cause of action, which was for a sum greater than the verdict, the verdict should have been referred to and sustained under the first cause of action. (3) In granting a new trial where the verdict was supported by the greater weight of the evidence."

The exceptions must be overruled. This court has no jurisdiction to review the findings of fact by the circuit court in a law case heard by that court on appeal from a magistrate's court. Redfearn v. Douglass, 35 S. C. 569, 15 S. E. 244.

The circuit court having found that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the second cause of action, it was competent to order a new trial thereon. The verdict in this case having been a general one, and there being no means to ascertain in what manner the verdict should be apportioned, it was proper to order a new trial as to both causes of action. Lampley v. R. R. Co., supra.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

CLOWNEY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 24, 1904.)

TRUSTS—DEED BY TRUSTEE—VALIDITY—RIGHTS OF BENEFICIARIES—NOTICE TO ATTORNEY.

1. Where a trustee has power of sale for reinvestment, a deed executed by him without payment to him of the purchase money is voidable, but not void.

2. Knowledge by an attorney that a trustee with power of sale for reinvestment is selling to his own wife is knowledge to his client.

3. Where a trustee with power of sale for reinvestment sells the trust property to his wife, the sale is voidable at the option of the beneficiaries.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Fairfield County; Allen J. Green, Special Judge.

Action by the Scottish-American Mortgage Company against Margaret M. Clowney and others. From the decree, plaintiff and certain of the defendants appeal. Modified.

The circuit decree is as follows:

"This action was commenced May 7, 1901, and is brought by the plaintiff against the defendants for the purpose of removing a cloud upon its title, and, failing therein, to be subrogated to the rights of an alleged purchase-money mortgage, which it is alleged was paid with its money. The defendant M. M. Clowney made default. The other defendants, who are the children of W. J. Clowney, the beneficiaries under the trust deed hereinafter mentioned, answered; the last named, Boyd C. Clowney, an infant, by his guardian ad litem. The cause was referred to James G. McCants, Esq., referee, to take the testimony upon the issues raised by the pleadings, and came on to be heard before me at the special November term, 1903, of the court of common pleas for Fairfield county upon the pleadings and testimony so taken. There is no controversy as to the facts. The issues raised and argued are as to the proper conclusions to be drawn from the facts and the principles of law applicable thereto.

"The facts are as follows: On the 1st of January, 1877, Samuel B. Clowney, by his deed dated on that day, reciting 'in consideration of the sum of $2,500, secured to be paid to me by William J. Clowney, trustee,' conveys with full warranty to said 'W. J. Clowney, as trustee, his successors or assigns,' a tract of land in Fairfield county, fully described therein, containing 649 acres, more or less, in trust 'to and for the use, benefit, and behoof of the children of the said William J. Clowney now living, and of them which may hereafter be born and living at the time of the death of the said William J. Clowney; and if all of the children of the said William J. Clowney shall die in his lifetime, leaving no issue, or if he shall die without leaving an issue living at the time of his death, then it is agreed by and between the parties to these presents that said tract of land shall revert to the said Samuel B. Clowney, his heirs and assigns forever, discharged and free from all trusts whatsoever; and the said William J. Clowney is hereby authorized and empowered to sell or otherwise dispose of the said tract of land whenever, in his judgment, it may be expedient for his said children, and to reinvest the proceeds upon the same trusts and subject to like reversion to the said Samuel B. Clowney, his heirs and assigns forever, as is hereinbefore provided as to said tract of land.' On the same 1st day of January, 1877, the said W. J. Clowney, as trustee, mortgaged the said premises to the said Samuel B. Clowney to secure his bond of even date, conditioned to pay $2,500 in one, two, and three equal annual installments, computing from date, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum, payable annually, until the whole debt and interest be paid. After the description of the premises in the mortgage appears these words: 'And being the same tract of land as was conveyed to me as trustee by the said Samuel B. Clowney by deed bearing even date with these presents.' The deed and mortgage is witnessed by the same witnesses, probated by the same officer on the 8th day of February, 1877, and recorded the same day. The bond and mortgage were assigned to Smythe & Adger by S. B. Clowney on the 17th day of March, 1877, and by them to George W. Witte on the 6th day of February, 1878.

"On the 26th of April, 1886, proceedings were commenced to foreclose the said mortgage by an action in which George W. Witte was plaintiff, and William J. Clowney, as trustee, alone was defendant. This action proceeded to judgment for foreclosure and sale of the premises, the amount found due being $2,131.58, with interest from September 22, 1886, and $50 costs, and was dock eted accordingly on the 8th day of October, 1886, in the proper office. In the meantime, pending this action, to wit, on the 9th of August, 1886, William J. Clowney, trustee, executed a deed conveying the said premises to his wife, M. M. Clowney, subject to the above mortgage, which deed was probated and recorded on September 16, 1886. This deed purports to be made 'in consideration of the sum of $3,700 in hand paid at and before the sealing of these presents,' and 'in pursuance of the power conferred upon me, the said W. J. Clowney, trustee,' by the deed of January 1, 1877. Before the record of this deed W. J. Clowney handed Mr. H. A. Gaillard an application signed by M. M. Clowney to J. B. Palmer & Son, the investing agents of plaintiff, for a loan of $2,000, offering a mortgage of the premises as security. Mr. Gaillard was the attorney of W. J. Clowney in the Witte foreclosure suit, and also the attorney of J. B. Palmer & Son in negotiating the loan, and forwarded them the application, made the abstract of title, and upon the consummation of the transaction received in checks from them the sum of $1,922.50, the net proceeds of the loan, and applied the same in extinguishment of the judgment of Witte v. Clowney, trustee, on June 27, 1887. Subsequently the balance of the judgment was paid, and it was satisfied of record. The loan is evidenced by five notes dated November 15, 1886, signed by M. M. Clowney and W. J. Clowney, secured by a mortgage of the premises of the same date, executed by Mrs. M. M. Clowney alone. The mortgage was recorded on the 28th of January, 1887. On September 29, 1894, the mortgage was foreclosed, and the premises sold under the proceedings on November 5, 1894, and bought by the plaintiffs, who received the deed therefor, and have been in possession since.

"The cestui que trustents under the trust deed were not made parties to either of the foreclosure proceedings. At the reference Mrs. M. M. Clowney testified, under objection of plaintiffs' counsel, that she had no knowledge of any deed to her of the premises; did not know that there was such a deed; that no money passed to her from Mr. Clowney, nor from the mortgage company to her. She did not know that she was the owner of the land, never claimed the land or exercised any acts of ownership over it, and never had anything to do with getting money from plaintiffs. The mortgage was folded down, and she signed where directed. Did not read it, or know what was in it, and could not see from the manner in which it was folded. W. J. Clowney, the trustee, died March 12, 1903, leaving the three last named defendants, his living children. These have answered, the two adults setting up five defenses as follows: 'Under the trust deed the trust was a naked trust, and the statute executed the title in them, and plaintiff has no title.' 'That they not having assented to the mortgage of W. J. Clowney to Samuel B. Clowney, the same is void for lack of power in the trustee to make. (3) That said bond and mortgage, if valid, has been foreclosed, and the judgment satisfied in full. (4) That the deed of W. J. Clowney, trustee, is void for want of power as a breach of trust of which the grantee had full notice. (5) That the notes and mortgage of M. M. Clowney to plaintiff from the foreclosure of which plaintiff derives title were taken by plaintiff with full notice of the breach of trust on the part of W. J. Clowney, trustee, as aforesaid.' And ask for the recovery of the land, and an accounting by the plaintiffs for the rents and profits thereof since January 1, 1895.

"The trust under the deed of 1877 is not a naked trust. Under the deed the trustee had power to sell. This, under the authorities, is sufficient to prevent the operation of the statute. Carrigan v. Drake, 36 S. C. 355, 15 S. E. 339. It is equally clear under the authorities in this state that the power to sell for reinvestment contained in the deed does not include the power to mortgage. As said by McIver, C. J., in Allen v. Ruddell, 51 S. C. 366, 29 S. E. 198, such power to sell for reinvestment negatives the power to mortgage; citing Salinas v. Pearsall, 24 S. C. 184. But I think the circumstances in relation to the bond and mortgage by W. J. Clowney, trustee, to Samuel B. Clowney, coupled with the fact that there is an entire absence of testimony to show that W. J. Clowney ever had any trust funds in his hands impressed with the trust mentioned in the deed, shows unmistakably that this transaction was the creation of the trust, and the mortgage was given to secure the purchase money, and hence it falls within the principle of Elliott v. Mackorell, 19 S. C. 238, and cases there cited. It follows, therefore, that the mortgage was a valid lien upon the premises paramount to the interest of the cestui que trustents.

"The testimony of Mrs. Clowney is competent. It is always competent to show that the consideration expressed in a deed was not in fact paid; and even the grantor may maintain an action to recover it, notwithstanding his deed. 2 Whart. Ev. No. 1042. Besides, the object of the testimony was to show a breach of trust, a fraud upon the beneficiaries under the deed; and the charge of fraud renders competent all testimony necessary to sustain it. Burch v. Brantley, 20 S. C. 503. This testimony is uncontradicted, and clearly shows that the transaction evidenced by the deed to Mrs. Clowney to plaintiff was an attempt on the part of the trustees to mortgage the trust property; that the alleged execution of the power of sale for reinvestment was pretentious, and no money ever passed to or was received by the trustee; and I hold the deed is absolutely void. The deed, being void, is a nullity, and carries with it the mortgage of plaintiff and his title under the foreclosure based thereon, for no amount of lack of notice can vitalize a null-

ty. In my view, it is therefore unnecessary to decide the question of notice, for, conceding the plaintiffs to be without notice, the defendants are entitled to all the relief that the equities of the case would warrant. There are no intervening incumbrances. The case is thus: the trust estate is subject to the payment of the Witte judgment. The corpus to which the beneficiaries are entitled is, and never has been more than, the difference between the incumbrance and the value of the land. The plaintiffs lent their money on the faith of the deed of the trustee to Mrs. Clowney, which, as we have seen, is void, and have become the purchasers of the premises under a foreclosure sale based upon a mortgage by Mrs. Clowney, which is also void, because based on the deed.

"The testimony shows that $1,922.50 of the money lent was applied in extinguishment of the paramount lien. This, I think, brings the case within the principles of Farr v. Sims, Rich. Eq. Cas. 133, 24 Am. Dec. 396, wherein it is said: 'That, although a third person should not be punished for the fraud of another, he shall not avail himself of it * * * by setting up his purchase under a fraudulent sale to the detriment of the complainant.' And of Hunter v. Hunter, 63 S. C. 78, 41 S. E. 33, 90 Am. St. Rep. 663, where says the court: 'The doctrine of subrogation as applicable to this case rests upon the principles that where persons have in good faith bought the lands of decedent, and it turns out that the sale is void for want of authority to make it, then as a matter of equity and good conscience those who have purchased the property have a right to retain the property until the amount of the purchase money paid by them which has been applied to the removal of burdens resting on such property shall be refunded to such purchasers.' Therefore, plaintiffs cannot maintain their title acquired at this sale against the defendants, but are entitled to be subrogated to the Witte judgment to the extent of $1,922.50, the amount of their money, the testimony shows, was applied in extinguishment of it.

"The plaintiffs have been in possession of the land under their purchase under the foreclosure of their mortgage, which, as we have seen, is void, and are accountable for the rents and profits received by them from the land since their occupancy. A statement of rents, taxes, and insurance received and paid by the plaintiffs is in evidence, and there is also some testimony tending to show that they have cut and sold timber from the land during their occupancy, which may amount to waste, and, if so, should be accounted for. The case therefore will be referred back to the referee, to take testimony and state the account between plaintiff and defendants, and to report the amount, if any, and to whom the same is due.

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants are entitled to recover the possession of the premises described in the complaint from the plaintiffs upon the payment to them of the amount that may be found to be due to them upon the statement of account herein ordered. Further ordered, that it be referred to J. G. McCants, Esq., as referee, to take the testimony and state the account between the plaintiff and defendants, under the principles announced in Givens v. Carroll, 40 S. C. 414, 18 S. E. 1030, 42 Am. St. Rep. 889, charging the defendants with the sum of $1,922.50 as of November 5, 1894, the date of the deed from Jennings; and upon the coming in of his report either party has leave to apply to the court for such further orders as may be necessary to carry this decree into effect. The costs of this action to be paid by plaintiff."

A. C. Douglass and W. D. Douglass, for plaintiff. Buchanan & Hannahan and J. E. McDonald, for defendants.

GARY, A. J. The facts of this case are fully stated in the decree of his honor the special judge, which will be set out in the report of the case. This court is satisfied with the conclusions announced in the circuit decree, except that in the matter of the $1,922.50 applied to the extinguishment of the judgment of Witte against Clowney, the interest should be calculated from the 27th of January, as the record shows that the money was applied to the satisfaction of the judgment on that day, instead of the time mentioned in the decree. The reasons for our concurrence are, however, not the same in all respects as those upon which the special judge bases his conclusions, as will herein-after be shown.

The pleadings raise the question whether the plaintiff was a purchaser of the land for valuable consideration without notice of such facts as rendered its title null and void. A plaintiff as well as a defendant may assert this right. McGee v. Jones, 34 S. C. 146, 13 S. E. 326. The circuit judge finds as a fact that the transaction evidenced by the deed to Mrs. Clowney and the mortgage to the plaintiff was an attempt on the part of the trustee to mortgage the trust property, and that the alleged execution of the power of sale for reinvestment was pretentious, and no money was received by the trustee. After thus finding, he says: "I hold the deed is absolutely void. The deed, being void, is a nullity, and carries with it the mortgage of plaintiff and his title under the foreclosure based thereon, for no amount of lack of notice can vitalize a nullity. In my view, it is therefore unnecessary to decide the question of notice, for, conceding the plaintiffs to be without notice, the defendants are entitled to all the relief that the equities of the case would warrant. There are no intervening incumbrances." The first exception assigns error in the ruling that the deed to Mrs. Clowney was absolutely void, and as a nullity carries with it the plaintiff's mortgage and the title based thereon under the foreclosure proceedings. The authorities cited in the argument of the plaintiff's attorneys fully sustain the position that the deed was not absolutely void, but only voidable. This exception should be sustained.

The third exception assigns error in not finding that the plaintiff did not have notice of any breach of trust on the part of the trustee or Mrs. Clowney, which affected the validity of the deed executed by the trustee to Mrs. Clowney. The defendant's attorneys served notice that they would ask this court to sustain the decree in this respect upon the additional ground "that it was contrary to the law and public policy, and a breach of trust on the part of Wm. J. Clowney, trustee, to execute a deed of trust property to his wife, the said Margaret M. Clowney, of all of which facts the plaintiff had notice before and at the time of taking its mortgage from the said Margaret M. Clowney.

The plaintiff's attorneys contended that the deed of W. J. Clowney, trustee to Margaret M. Clowney, does not show on its face that the grantee was the wife of the grantor, and the fact that she was his wife cannot affect plaintiff's rights as a mortgagee or purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. It is, however, a fair and reasonable inference from the testimony that H. A. Gaillard, the plaintiff's attorney, had notice that Mrs. Clowney was the wife of the trustee, especially as it appears in the record that he was a subscribing witness to the execution of this deed. Knowledge of this fact on the part of the attorney is attributed as notice to his principal, the plaintiff herein. Blackwell v. Mortgage Co., 65 S. C. 105, 43 S. E. 395. We are thus squarely confronted with the solution of the proposition whether the conveyance of the land by the trustee to his wife was in itself a breach of trust which public policy demands should have the effect of rendering the transaction voidable. The authorities are in accord as to the general principle that a trustee cannot buy at his own sale. The doctrine, with its limitations, is clearly stated in Anderson v. Butler, 31 S. C. 183, 9 S. E. 797, 5 L. R. A. 176. The court says: "It is a well-established principle that a trustee cannot buy at his own sale. He cannot be vendor and vendee at the same time of trust property; that is, he cannot make a binding contract with himself in the purchase of the trust property under his control. On the contrary, all such purchases are subject to be vacated and set aside by the cestui que trust at his option, and this, too, without regard to the fact whether such purchase was made in good faith, at full price, or was fraudulent and delusive. This doctrine has been long settled, both in England and in this country, and it is a wise and wholesome principle. It strikes at once at the root of danger, and destroys it. It removes from the trustee the temptation to do wrong, and guarantees the faithful execution of his trust in the sale of the property of his cestui que trust." Does a sale by the trustee to his wife of the trust property come within the spirit of this principle, which strikes at the root of danger, and removes the trustee from temptation to sell the property in such a manner that he will thereby receive a benefit either directly or indirectly? The husband and the wife sustain towards each other a highly confidential and fiduciary relation; and transactions between them are to be scrutinized with great jealousy, especially when it is made to appear that advantage was taken of the wife. Way v. Ins. Co., 61 S. C. 501, 39 S. E. 742. So sacred is this relation that acts which would be champertous between third parties are not violative of law as between husband and wife. In Ex parte Eilers, 67 S. C. 108, 45 S. E. 140, this question of champerty was considered, and this court said: "In many respects the husband and wife are still regarded as one in law. It would be against public policy for the courts to hold that when a dutiful and confiding wife renders her husband financial aid in securing those rights accorded to him by law she should be held to be guilty of champerty." As a rule, the husband expects and realizes a pecuniary benefit either directly or indirectly from property acquired by the wife. This question as to the right of the trustee to sell the trust property to his wife, although new in our state, has been adjudicated elsewhere. In Bassett v. Shoemaker, 46 N. J. Eq. 538, 20 Atl. 52, 19 Am. St. Rep. 435, it was held that, where a trustee sells the trust estate to one who, by previous agreement, purchases for the wife of the trustee, the sale will be set aside on the application of a cestui que trust; nor is evidence that the sale was fair and for the best price obtainable admissible. Also, that where a husband sells as trustee his wife is excluded from purchasing at the sale directly from him. If she desires to become a purchaser, she must apply to the court, and obtain an order that the sale be conducted by and under the supervision of a master. The court says: "The exclusion of the wife as a purchaser where the husband sells as a trustee is not so much for the reason that he may subsequently become entitled to some interest in her lands as on account of the unity which exists between them in the marriage relation. The case falls clearly within the spirit of the principle which excludes the husband himself." The court quotes as follows from the case of Romaine v. Hendrickson's Ex'rs, 27 N. J. Eq. 162: "So jealous is the law of the interest of the cestui que trust that it will not tolerate the slightest antagonism on the part of the trustee. The object of the rule is to prevent the trustee from using his information and power to the prejudice of the cestui que trust." See, also, Davoue v. Fanning, 2

Johns. Ch. 252; Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. (U. S.) 503, 11 L. Ed. 1076; and 1 Perry on Trusts, § 195. This doctrine, so wholesome in its nature, grows out of the principles of equity, and is not affected by the laws of our state relating to the rights and powers of married women. We are the more willing to apply these principles to the case under consideration, as the effect is to bring about substantial justice to all parties concerned. The sale made in breach of the trust is thus avoided, and the plaintiff is enabled to get back its loan, with interest.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed, except in the particular hereinbefore mentioned, and that it be modified in that respect.

MORROW v. GAFFNEY MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 24, 1904.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—EVIDENCE—NONSUIT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. An amendment of a complaint in an action for personal injuries, alleging the acts to have been done willfully and maliciously, is admissible under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 194, allowing amendments "by inserting other allegations material to the case."

2. The question put by plaintiff's counsel to plaintiff as to whether, if he did not obey his employer, he would be turned off and kicked out, though objectionable to the nice proprieties of the court, was not prejudicial to defendant.

3. Where, in an action by a minor, he is permitted to testify as to his financial condition and that of his father, as well as to the number and ages of his brothers and sisters, like evidence by the father of plaintiff is admissible.

4. Where plaintiff, a child, in an action for personal injuries, is of weak mind, and had testified what his wages were, and defendant had testified that servants of his class received less pay in the mill, what servants of his class generally receive may be shown.

5. In order to locate objects in the room in question, a photograph of another room may be used by a witness.

6. Evidence as to whether a witness could have seen an object at a certain time in a certain place is inadmissible as opinion evidence.

7. Where there is some material evidence supporting plaintiff's case, a nonsuit was properly refused.

8. Where the evidence was conflicting as to whether plaintiff was of sufficient mental capacity to be guilty of contributory negligence, the question was for the jury.

9. One who attempts work exposing him to an obvious danger, though he may not appreciate the whole of it, assumes the risk if it is ordinarily incident to the employment.

10. Where a servant fails to comply with the rules of the master, of which he has knowledge, and such failure is the proximate cause of his injury, he is guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Cherokee County; James P. Carey, Special Judge.

Action by George Nicholls Morrow, by guardian ad litem, against the Gaffney Manufacturing Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. H. O. Cabell and J. C. Jeffries, for appellant. Evans & Finley and Butler & Osborne, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. The plaintiff brings suit to recover $15,000 damages for a personal injury from defendant. Both compensatory and exemplary damages are alleged. Trial had before Judge Dantzler and a jury. Verdict for $6,000 was rendered in favor of plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was denied. After entry of judgment, defendant appealed on the following grounds:

"(1) Because his honor erred in allowing the complaint amended by inserting therein the proposed amendment, which was as follows: '(9) That the defendant company, through its agent, Patterson, plaintiff's boss, willfully, wantonly, recklessly, and negligently ordered the plaintiff to clean off the spinning frame, stating that it was standing, while the said Patterson knew or should have known said frame was not standing, but that the cylinder therein was revolving, and plaintiff, having explicit confidence in the word and intelligence of said Patterson, not knowing that said cylinder was running and [proceeded to clean the same], without any warning of the extra hazard being given by defendant or its agents, by reason whereof the right hand of the plaintiff was caught in said revolving cylinder and the fingers thereof mashed and lacerated and torn off, so that it was necessary to amputate all of them on said hand, causing him great pain, suffering, and mental anguish, to his great damage in the sum of $15,000.' The error complained of being that the said amendment was a new cause of action, and one that was totally and wholly inconsistent and contradictory to the previous allegations of the complaint."

The "case" shows that a motion to amend, together with a copy of paragraph 9, was duly served upon the defendant before the trial, and that such motion to amend was called up and heard before the action was called for trial. A comparison of the original complaint and the proposed amendment shows that both grew out of the alleged injury of the plaintiff by the defendant; all the allegations show that plaintiff had his hand crushed in a machine operated in defendant's factory on or about the 14th March, 1902, while plaintiff was in the employment of the defendant and under the direction of its officers. Section 194 of our Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 authorizes the circuit judge to allow amendments "by inserting other allegations material to the case." We are satisfied that there was no error as here complained of. The act of 1895, now embodied in section 186 of our Code, is in point. This exception is overruled.

"(2) Because his honor erred in not requiring plaintiff's counsel to examine witness George Nicholls Morrow in proper manner, and to instruct counsel not to make such remarks as 'and kicked you out.' The error complained of being that the tendency of such remarks was to prejudice the defendant's case with the jury."

An examination of the "case" for appeal will show, we think, this ground of appeal suggests too serious a view of the language of counsel for respondent. Here is the connection in which the language occurred, as well as a quotation of the exact language complained of. The plaintiff was being examined by his counsel: "Georgie, to whom did you look for your orders? Witness: To Mr. Patterson. Q. Mr. Patterson? A. Yes, sir. Q. Were you required to do what Mr. Patterson said? A. Yes, sir. Q. If you didn't do what Mr. Patterson said, Georgie, what would be the result? A. Turned you off. Q. Turned you off and kicked you out? A. Yes, sir." Then defendant's counsel objected to such remarks. The court merely said, "Proceed with the examination, gentlemen, and let the witness answer." Of course, the question of counsel, "and kicked you out," was objectionable to the nice propriety usually characterizing counsel in their examination of witnesses in court, but no injury was wrought to the defendant. This being the case, we cannot sustain the exceptions. It is overruled.

"(3) Because his honor erred in allowing, over the objection of appellant's attorneys, the following question: 'Georgie, don't you know he is a poor man?' meaning Georgie's father. The error complained of being that such question was not relative to any of the issues by the pleadings, was not a competent question, and was leading.

"(4) Because his honor erred in allowing the witness Morrow, the father of the plaintiff, to testify as to his financial condition, over the objection of appellant's counsel, to the following questions: 'State, Mr. Morrow, what are your circumstances as to the property, ownership of land, or anything like that.' 'Well, state your condition, Mr. Morrow, as to this world's goods.' The error complained of being that the financial condition of the father of this boy was incompetent and irrelevant to the issues raised in the pleadings, and would tend to prejudice the case in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant.

"(5) Because the court allowed the witness Morrow, the father of the plaintiff in this action, to testify, over the objection of the appellant's attorney, to the following questions: 'Those children, the ages of them, Mr. Morrow?' (meaning witness' children). The error complained of being that the family of the witness outside of the plaintiff, the number and ages, had nothing to do with the issues raised in this pleading, and that allowing such matters brought out in form of evidence, in connection with the witness' poverty, tended to bias the defendant's case before the jury."

We will presently copy what testimony the plaintiff was allowed without objection to give. The plaintiff was a poor boy—a minor; hence, when he testified as to his own circumstances, those of his father and sisters and brothers that he was helping to support, without objection from the defendant, there was presented an issue that made his father's testimony on that line competent. Here is the plaintiff's testimony: "Q. Have you had to work, in addition to what your father gives you, for support? A. Yes, sir. Q. You do? A. Yes, sir. Q. Is your father a wealthy man, or is he a man of very moderate means—poor man—is he a poor man or rich man? A. He is sorter poor man. Q. Georgie, don't you know he is a poor man? Mr. Jeffries: Your honor, I do not think that is proper evidence. The Court: I think it is relative to the issues. Mr. Evans: Well, sir, are you dependent for your living— Witness: Yes, sir. Q. —For what you work for and what your father works for? A. Yes, sir. Q. Your father does what? A. Weaves. Q. He weaves down in the mill here? A. Glendale. Q. He does not own any land, does he? A. No, sir. Q. So you had to work for your living? A. Yes, sir. Q. With your hand? A. Yes, sir. Q. In the mill? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that is all you have got, isn't it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Well, Georgie, have you ever had any education? A. No, sir. Q. Have you gone to school much? A. No, sir. Q. You have had to work— A. Yes, sir. Q. —Instead of going to school? A. Yes, sir. Q. Is that it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you any brothers and sisters? A. Yes, sir. Q. How many? Can't you name them, Georgie? Now, how many have you got? A. Got five. Q. Got five? A. Yes, sir. Q. Yes, sir; how many older than you, and how many younger than you? A. I have got a sister older than I am— Q. That is all? A. Yes, sir. Q. All the rest younger than you? A. Yes, sir. Q. What is the age of the youngest one, Georgie? Mr. Jeffries: May it please your honor, that is not a proper way to question the witness. The Court: I do not see what the size of the family has to do with it. Mr. Evans: I want to show that it is a poor family, and he had to contribute to the support of the family. The Court: Well, I have allowed you to go to that extent. Mr. Evans (to witness): Where did your wages go? To support yourself and to help your parents and your brothers and sisters? Witness: Yes, sir. Q. Are you able to earn as much now as you did then, Georgie? A. No, sir." Under these circumstances, the testimony was not improperly given. These exceptions are overruled.

"(6) Because his honor erred in allowing the witness Morrow, father of the plaintiff, to testify to the following question, over the objection of appellant's counsel: 'Mr. Morrow, you are a man that has been working in the mill yourself—do you know the wages generally paid to sweepers?' The error complained of being: (a) That it was only competent to show what the plaintiff in this action was getting as a sweeper, unless it could be shown that he was getting the same as ordinary sweepers, and such evidence was never adduced. (b) Error because such testimony tended to contradict the plaintiff, who himself testified that he was getting fifty cents a day."

The mind of the young man was not considered very bright. He had spoken in his testimony of receiving 50 cents as a sweeper. Under the circumstances, it was legitimate to ask such questions to test this condition of his mind. A witness for the defendant testified that wages for a sweeper was from 25 to 35 cents a day. From this standpoint the testimony was not objectionable, and this exception is overruled.

Seventh and eighth exceptions:

"(7) Because his honor erred in allowing the appellant's witness Brannard Good to explain, over appellant's objection, the arrangement of spinning room from a photograph other than the one of the place in which plaintiff was injured. The error complained of being that there was no proof showing that the arrangement of the machinery was similar to that in the room in which plaintiff was injured."

We have examined with care the testimony relating to a spinning room in a factory. Great care was taken to explain that the photograph was not the picture of defendant's spinning room. The circuit judge said: "I will admit the testimony as a picture that the witness might go down there and draw himself. I simply admit it as a demonstration made by the witness himself. You may except to that ruling if you want to." The witness merely pointed out the location of objects with reference as to windows, etc. This exception is overruled.

"(9) Because his honor erred in overruling plaintiff's question to Geo. Smith, which was as follows: 'By taking down the lids of that machine that day, what could you have seen?' The error complained of being: (a) That the question propounded to witness was directly in reply to testimony brought out by plaintiff that he could not see the wheels of the machinery on account of the darkness of the day. (b) That it was competent for the witness to testify that he could have seen, if anything, by taking down the lids of the machinery."

An examination of the testimony fails to disclose such alleged error. The exception is overruled.

"(10) Because his honor erred in overruling the question asked by the defendant's attorney of defendant's witness John Graham, which was as follows: 'Now, under the condition of light in that room that day, could you have told whether the wheels in a frame were revolving, or a wheel seven inches in diameter was revolving, placed in same conditions?' (the witness having previously testified that he had been through that room that day). The error complained of being that this was directly in reply, and upon the knowledge of the witness of the condition of the weather that day, on which he would be entitled to give his opinion."

The circuit judge had to avoid the expression of opinions from witnesses who were not experts. He did right in this matter. Exception is overruled.

Eleventh and twelfth exceptions: These exceptions relate to the refusal of his honor to grant a nonsuit. We have examined the testimony, and find some testimony on material points in plaintiff's case. Hence no error. Exceptions are overruled.

"(13) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'That it is for you to say, under all the testimony, whether the plaintiff in this case had sufficient age, intelligence, and capacity to render him guilty of contributory negligence.' The error complained of being, it is respectfully submitted to this court, that, from the evidence adduced of the knowledge and experience the plaintiff had in the work he had been engaged in, the jury had a right to assume that he had sufficient capacity and intelligence to render him guilty of contributory negligence, without having to pass on that point."

Both sides had offered testimony bearing upon this issue. Such testimony was for the jury, and not the judge, to pass upon. This exception is overruled.

"(14) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Now he [meaning the servant] does not assume the risk of working with dangerous machinery or with machinery that was not kept in repair, because the law says that he has a right to expect the employer to furnish him with suitable machinery, and to keep that machinery in repair.' The error complained of being: (a) That there is no allegation of defective machinery in the complaint. (b) That there is no allegation in the complaint of the machinery being out of repair. (c) That such charge is practically on the facts that the machinery was out of repair, and this especially in connection with that portion of the charge explanatory of appellant's first request to charge, which was as follows: 'One who attempts to do work which exposes him to an obvious and appreciated danger, even though he should not appreciate the whole extent of the danger, assumes the risk of injury. However his knowledge may have been acquired, there is no obligation upon the employer to give the workman warning of a known danger.' I charge you that, gentlemen, adding the words, "risks ordinarily incident to the employment," as I have already explained to you in my general charge.'"

We cannot see how the charge, which embodies a correct principle of law, could have injured the defendant. The general charge of the circuit judge very admirably and ably presented the law. This exception is overruled.

"(15) Because his honor erred in charging appellant's second and third requests, which were as follows: '(2) It is the duty of the servant to obey reasonable rules adopted by the master for his benefit and protection, and, if injured while acting in violation thereof, this will constitute such contributory negligence as to bar recovery, if the observance of the rules would have prevented the injury. (3) If a servant is conscious of the dangers, the fact that he for a moment forgets their existence and thereby sustains an injury will not make the master liable'—by adding the following: 'I charge you that. I charge you the other one which I have just read, with the qualification which I have just given in my general charge as to contributory negligence; that is, as to whether the boy in this case was capable of being guilty of contributory negligence, and whether the contributory negligence operated or contributed as a proximate cause to the injury.' The error complained of being that, with the knowledge the appellant had of respondent's experience and work in the line in which he was engaged, it had a right to assume that he was capable and had sufficient intelligence to do his work, and that it was improper to submit the question of capacity of contributory negligence to the jury."

We think the circuit judge committed no error where he attempted to charge the law governing this branch of this case, for if the plaintiff was too weak-minded to know what he was doing as a moral or intellectual being, of course he was not amenable to the law relating to contributory negligence. Both plaintiff's and defendant's testimony was before the jury. It was the province of the jury to pass upon this issue. The circuit judge was anxious that his charge should not only be full, but also just. We therefore fail to find error, as here complained of. This exception is overruled.

"(16) Because his honor erred in submitting to the jury the capacity of respondent to be guilty of contributory negligence, in modifying appellant's sixth request to charge, which was as follows: 'In an action to recover, if the plaintiff knew or had been told about the rules which, if he had followed in the performance of his duties, he would not have been injured, but acts in violation of such rules and is injured by not obeying the same, he cannot recover'—by adding the words: 'If the plaintiff was of sufficient age, intelligence, and discretion to be guilty of contributory negligence.' The error complained of being: (a) That in failing to comply with the rules, and going contrary thereto, would not be a case of contributory negligence. (b) That if it was contributory negligence, that the proof of experience and knowledge that this plaintiff had in the business in which he was engaged, it was wrong to submit to the jury the question of his capacity of being guilty of contributory negligence."

This exception is unjust, unintentionally, of course, to the circuit judge. The whole charge shows very plainly that the circuit judge relied upon his previous definition of contributory negligence in his general charge, in which he had quoted the exact language of this court in the case of Rosemand v. Railroad, 66 S. C. 91, 44 S. E. 574. Therefore, if a lad knew the rules of the defendant and failed to comply therewith, and such failure to comply with such rules was a proximate cause of his injury, he would be guilty of contributory negligence. It was not error to submit an issuable fact to the jury, as we have before remarked.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be, and the same is, affirmed.

WOODS, J., concurs in the result.

VIRGINIA PORTLAND CEMENT CO. v. LUCK'S ADM'R.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 12, 1905.)

DEATH OF SERVANT — ACTION — DECLARATION — SUFFICIENCY AS AGAINST DEMURRER — INSTRUCTIONS — REVIEW — CARE REQUIRED OF MASTER — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

1. Where, in an action for the death of a servant, each count of the declaration alleged that defendant had failed to perform the duty which it owed to deceased to keep its premises in reasonably safe repair, stating in what respect the duty existed, and wherein defendant had failed to perform it, and either charged that defendant had notice of the unsafe condition, or set out facts from which it was necessarily to be inferred that defendant was aware of the condition, and in all the counts it was alleged that deceased was without fault, the declaration and each count were sufficient as against a demurrer.

2. The correctness of an instruction is to be determined on appeal by taking it in connection with the other instructions given.

3. Where a servant is employed in working outside of the regular line of his employment under the direction of the master, greater care is required of the master toward the servant than if the servant had been working in his regular employment.

4. A servant, employed in trucking cement in a factory, on coming to a place in the floor where a large screw revolved in a trough, which was not covered, saw a board which seemed to fit the opening, and laid it on the same, but when passing over the board it slipped, and the servant was injured by his foot passing into the screw. Held, in an action for the death of the servant from the injury, that the fact that a hammer and nails were lying close by the opening, with which the board might have been nailed down, was a circumstance to be considered in determining whether deceased was guilty of contributory negligence.

5. Where a servant was injured by his foot passing into an open trough in the floor in which a large screw was revolving, held, that the question of the servant's contributory negligence was one for the jury.

Keith, P., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Augusta County.

Action by the administrator of William Luck, deceased, against the Virginia Portland Cement Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the instructions referred to in the opinion:

"Defendant's Bill of Exception No. 1.

"Be it remembered, that on the trial of this cause the plaintiff asked the court to give the following instructions:

"Instruction for Plaintiff No. 1.

"The court instructs the jury that it was the duty of the defendant company to use all reasonable care to provide and maintain suitable structures, instrumentalities, machinery, and appliances, and not to expose its employes to risks beyond those incident to the employment, and not to expose them to risks beyond those risks in contemplation at the time of the contract of service; and its employes had the right to presume that these duties had been performed; and for injuries to its employes resulting from a breach of this duty the defendant company is liable in damages. And if the jury believe from the evidence in this case that the breach of this duty of the defendant company was the proximate cause of the injuries that resulted in the death of William Luck while in the employment of the said defendant company, then the said company is liable in damages in this cause. N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 117, 25 S. E. 226, and authorities cited.

"Instruction for Plaintiff No. 2.

"The court instructs the jury that, although they may believe from the evidence in this case that William Luck knew that the passageway on the premises of the defendant company, under which the conveyancer that did the mischief ran, and that this conveyancer had been exposed by the company for the purpose of unclogging it, and that this passageway was on that account in an unsafe condition, yet, if they believe from the evidence that the danger occasioned thereby was not so imminent that a reasonably prudent man would not have attempted to go over it as William Luck did in doing the work that he was directed to do by the defendant company, and further believe from the evidence that the use of the said passageway by Luck in doing the work that he was directed to do by the defendant company was natural and necessary, and that said Luck in going along said passageway and over the said conveyancer used such reasonable precaution as a reasonably prudent man would have exercised in so doing, and was injured, and from which injuries he died, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages in this case. N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 117, 25 S. E. 226, and authorities cited.

"Instruction for Plaintiff No. 3.

"The court instructs the jury that William Luck is presumed to have exercised due and proper care at the time he was injured; and the burden of proving that he was negligent is upon the defendant, unless such negligence appears from the plaintiff's evidence.

"Instruction for Plaintiff No. 4.

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, that then, in ascertaining and fixing the damages in this case, they should find the same with reference—

"First. To the pecuniary loss sustained by Mrs. Minnie Luck, widow of Wm. Luck, deceased, and her child, by the death of Wm. Luck, fixing the sum at such sum as would be equal to the probable earnings of the said Wm. Luck, taking into consideration the age, business capacity, experience, habits, energy, and perseverance of the deceased, during the lifetime of the said Mrs. Minnie Luck and child, if he had not been killed.

"Second. By adding thereto compensation for the loss of his care, attention and society to his wife and child; and "Third. By adding such further sum as they may deem fair and just by way of solace and comfort to his said widow and child for the sorrow and suffering and mental anguish occasioned to them by his death."

"Instruction for Defendant No. 1.

"The court instructs the jury that the burden of proving his case is upon the plaintiff, and that he must prove it by a preponderance of evidence in order to entitle him to a recovery.

"Instruction for Defendant No. 2.

"The court instructs the jury that, even though they may believe from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of negligence, yet if they shall further believe from the evidence that the injury to the plaintiff's intestate was the proximate result of his own negligence, he cannot recover. Sexton & Houston v. Turner, 89 Va. 341, 15 S. E. 862.

"Instruction for Defendant No. 3.

"The court instructs the jury that contributory negligence on the part of an employé injured through the employer's negligence is the want of ordinary care and prudence without which the injury would not have occurred; and that, if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate, Luck, was guilty of contributory negligence in running the truck over the conveyor at the time of the accident, then the plaintiff cannot recover. 7 Am. & Eng. Encyc. Law, 371, note 3.

"Instruction for Defendant No. 4.

"The court instructs the jury that where a person voluntarily enters the service of another he assumes all the risk usually incident to such employment, and is presumed to have contracted with respect thereto. And if the jury believe from the evidence that the risk in this case was of this character, and that it was open and obvious, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover and the jury must find for the defendant. Big Stone Gap Iro. Co. v. Ketron (Va.) 45 S. E. 741.

"Instruction for Defendant No. 5.

"The court instructs the jury that where an employé is confronted with two methods of performing work, the one safe and the other dangerous, he owes a positive duty to his employer to pursue the safe method, irrespective of the degree of danger which may be involved in the unsafe method, and any departure from the path of safety will prevent his recovery in the event he is injured. So that if the jury shall believe from the evidence that it was safe for the plaintiff's intestate to wheel his truck over the covering across the conveyor, and that it was unsafe for him to lay down a board across the conveyor and wheel his truck over said board, and that the plaintiff's intestate adopted the latter course, and was thereby injured, then the plaintiff cannot recover. Street's Adm'r v. N. & W. Ry. Co. (Va.) 45 S. E. 234.

"Instruction for Defendant No. 6.

"The court instructs the jury that an employé who knows the unsafe condition of the place in which he is working is not compelled to continue the work; but, if he does continue it, without exercising ordinary prudence and care for his own safety, then he must be held to have assumed not only the risks ordinarily incident to the service when he entered upon it, but such as became known to him during the progress of the work, or which were readily discernible to a person of his age and capacity in the exercise of ordinary care. So that, if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate knew of the unsafe condition of the conveyor, then he was not compelled to continue his work about said conveyor; and if they shall believe that, so knowing, he continued his work without ordinary prudence and care for his own safety, then he assumed not only the risks incident to his work there, but also the risks which became known to him during the progress of his work or which were readily discernible to a person of his age and capacity in the exercise of ordinary care. Russell Creek Coal Co. v. Wells, 96 Va. 416, 31 S. E. 614; Ches., etc., v. Sparrow, 96 Va. 644, 37 S. E. 302, and cases cited.

"Instruction for Defendant No. 7.

"The court instructs the jury that if they shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate, William Luck, was in the employment of the defendant as a teamster on the yard, and that his duties as such did not require him to truck cement across the conveyor, but that the trucking by him of cement across the conveyor was a voluntary act on his part, and if they shall further believe from the evidence that while engaged in the performance of such voluntary act he received the injury complained of, then the plaintiff cannot recover, and the jury must find for the defendant. Shen. Val. R. R. v. Lucado's Adm'r, 86 Va. 390, 10 S. E. 422; Va. Mid. R. R. Co. v. Roach, 83 Va. 375, 5 S. E. 175.

"Instruction for Defendant No. 8.

"The court instructs the jury that, where the employé's own voluntary act has placed him in perilous position, he must, in general, bear the consequence of his own recklessness or negligence. And if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate, knowing the open conveyor to be a dangerous place, voluntarily undertook to pass over it on a temporary passway constructed by himself, and in consequence was injured, and died from such injury, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. Watson on Damages, 107."

Patrick & Gordon, for appellant. Curry & Glenn and Brayton & Wayt, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. The administrator of William Luck, deceased, brought this action in the circuit court of Augusta county to recover damages of the Virginia Portland Cement Company for the death of the deceased, caused, as alleged, by the negligence of the defendant.

The action is predicated on the negligence of the defendant in keeping in unsafe repair its premises where the deceased, in the discharge of his duties, was required to work, the specific negligence alleged being the failure of the defendant to keep sufficiently covered up and protected a conveyor which crossed a passageway over and along which the deceased, on the occasion of the injuries from which he died, was required to work. At the trial the plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment for $6,000, and this judgment is before us for review upon a writ of error awarded the defendant.

The declaration contains four counts. In the first it is clearly stated that the defendant company knowingly, etc., failed and neglected to keep said conveyor securely covered so as to furnish a reasonably safe and proper place for the plaintiff's intestate to work, and that the said intestate exercised due and proper care, and was wholly without fault or neglect on his part. The second count states that the defendant company tore up the covering over the conveyor, and the company itself, having put the conveyor in that condition, left it open and in a dangerous condition until after the accident to the deceased. In the third count, as in the first and second, the business conducted by the defendant is stated; that in the conduct of its business the defendant used a conveyor, which is described; that the deceased was engaged in trucking cement across the conveyor; that it was the duty of the defendant to provide a safe place for the deceased to work in handling the cement, etc.; and it is charged that the company was notified of the condition of the conveyor, and that it promised to put it in proper condition, and failed to do so, etc. And in the fourth count the allegations as to the business conducted by the defendant are repeated, and it is averred that the company knew of the unsafe condition of the conveyor, and failed to put it in repair, etc., in consequence of which the deceased received the injuries from which he died. So that in each of the counts it is alleged that the company had failed to perform the duty which it owed to the deceased to keep its premises in reasonably safe repair, stating in what respect the duty existed, and wherein the company had failed to perform the duty, and either charges that the company had notice of the unsafe condition of its premises in the respect stated, or sets out such facts from which it necessarily was to be inferred that the company was aware of the unsafe condition of its premises in the particulars stated in the several counts, and in all of which it is averred, though unnecessarily, that the deceased was without fault in the premises.

We are of opinion that the declaration and each count thereof was sufficient to inform the defendant of the nature of the demand made upon it; states sufficient facts to enable the court to say upon demurrer, if the facts stated were proved, whether the plaintiff would be entitled to recover; and therefore the demurrer to the declaration was properly overruled. Hortenstein v. Va.-Car. Ry. Co., 102 Va. 914, 47 S. E. 996.

The circumstances under which the deceased received the injuries from which he died are as follows: The defendant company is engaged in the manufacture of cement in the county of Augusta, and in its business it is necessary to use a large amount of machinery and employ a large number of men, some of the machinery used being of a more or less dangerous character. The plant is organized into different departments, and a separate force of men are employed in these several departments, though it seems that they are not required to work in and confine themselves to the departments in which they are employed. One department is known as the "operating department," another as the "construction department," and there are several others; but it is only necessary to refer to the two departments named in this opinion.

In the operating department the cement is manufactured, and in this department is what is known as the "stockhouse," in which the cement is packed in bags and barrels for shipment. The construction department has charge of the work of making the roads, constructing buildings, and other things necessary to equip the plant and keep it in working order. The stockhouse referred to is a large building, about 250x250 feet, in which there are a number of large bins for storing cement, and in the center is a space in which the cement is handled. At either end of this building, between the bins and the outer walls, runs a passageway 4 or 4½ feet wide, and across the building at either end, at the inner line of this passageway, about 4 or 4½ feet from the outer wall, runs a large screw, about 9 inches in circumference, and known as a "conveyor." The screw runs in a trough about 14 inches square on the outside and 10 inches on the inside, and its motive power is obtained from a room in the stockhouse known as the "motor room." The cement and plaster is put in this 10-inch trough from the bins and from other openings along and over the screw, and the revolutions of the screw convey it from one point to another in the house. Between the motor room referred to and one of the bins, numbered 13, is a space from 4 to 6 feet 2 inches (as variously stated in the testimony) wide. In passing from the center of the stockhouse through this space into the 4 or 4½ foot passageway at that end of the house, from which the cement is loaded onto a wagon at the door, the conveyor has to be crossed. The conveyor is covered by boards nailed down flush with the floor of the building, but it is necessary frequently to take up sections of this covering to get at the conveyor in order to repair it, as it is very frequently clogged up, and often prizes up the covering over it, and when it becomes choked it is often relieved by putting plaster in the cement, as some forms of cement require a mixture of plaster. On the day before the accident out of which this suit arises about 14 inches in length of the covering of the conveyor had been removed in the passageway between the motor room and bin No. 13 in order to repair the conveyor by putting in at that point what is known as a "hanger," and the conveyor was thus left exposed until after the accident on the following day.

Among other employes engaged in the stockhouse are men whose business it is to carry various materials—cement, plaster, etc.—from one point to another in the house on hand trucks, which are from 20 to 24 inches wide.

The deceased, William Luck, was a teamster on the yard of the defendant company, in charge of a two-horse wagon and team, and was assisted by one Samuel Webb in connection with the construction department. His duty was to haul the materials of various sorts used in that department. The foreman of the company over the deceased was a Mr. Teabo, and on the occasion of this accident one Cooper Irving was in charge of a gang of hands making cement work on the yard of the company. The deceased had general orders from Teabo to always go and haul cement from the stockhouse whenever called on to do so by Irving or the person in charge of the concrete work, and Irving had, just prior to this accident, put in an order with the boss of the stockhouse, Clifton, for a large amount of cement, and it was the deceased's duty, with his team, to haul it to Irving as needed.

On the morning of the accident the deceased and his helper, Webb, had been hauling staves on the yard, and had finished hauling staves between 11 and 12 o'clock. When they finished Irving said to the deceased that he wanted 10 sacks of cement as quick as he could get it, and told deceased to go to the stockhouse for it. The deceased drove immediately to the stockhouse door with his wagon and team, and he and Webb went into the stockhouse and told Clifton, who was in charge of the stockhouse, that they wanted 10 bags of cement for the concrete work, and Clifton, stating that his men were engaged, and did not have time to truck the cement out, instructed the deceased and Webb where the cement was, and directed them to go and get it and truck it out; he (Clifton) knowing at the time that the conveyor across the passageway was uncovered, and that the cement had to be trucked out through this passageway; whereupon the deceased took a truck, went to where the cement was, and Webb loaded the truck. They proceeded along the passageway, the deceased pushing the truck, until they reached the conveyor, and, seeing that they could not get across it without some covering over the opening in it, and seeing sitting near by a board which seemed to fit the opening, and appeared to have been used for that purpose, they laid it in the opening, which it fitted, and passed successfully over the conveyor with that load of cement, but when crossing the conveyor with the second load the board moved and left the opening into which the deceased's foot passed, and his leg was ground off below the knee, resulting in a few hours afterwards in his death from the shock.

At the trial four instructions were given for the plaintiff and eight for the defendant, and exception is taken to the giving of all of plaintiff's instructions, but objection is more particularly made to the first and second, on the ground that they were misleading. It is insisted on behalf of the plaintiff that this court cannot review the instructions, because of the insufficiency of the bill of exceptions taken by the defendant to the giving of the instructions; but we do not deem it necessary to consider this objection, nor to review the instructions at length, as the court is of opinion that the objection to them is without merit. The instructions given for the plaintiff, read in connection with the instructions given for the defendant, could not have misled the jury, and fully and fairly submitted the case to the jury.

The remaining assignment of error is to the refusal of the court below to set aside the verdict of the jury as contrary to the law and the evidence.

It is contended that upon three grounds the verdict should have been set aside: First, that the deceased was a volunteer, and assumed the risk incident to the work which he volunteered to perform on the occasion of his injuries; second, that the danger of attempting to truck over the conveyor was incident to his employment, and open and obvious; and, third, that the conveyor was sufficiently covered for him to have passed over it in safety.

There is some evidence tending to show that the deceased, at the time of his injury, was doing work outside of the line of his regular employment; but the defendant's evidence admits that what he was doing he was doing under orders from Clifton, who was in charge of the stockhouse. Clifton himself testified that he directed the deceased to get the cement and truck it out; and Irving, another witness for the defendant, says that he told the deceased to go to the stockhouse and get the cement as quickly as he could. In addition to this, it clearly appears from the uncontradicted evidence in the case that the deceased was under general orders to get and haul cement whenever needed for the construction department, and that it was the well-known and recognized practice, as well as the duty, of teamsters to go into the stockhouse and truck out cement when told to do so. So that, if the deceased was working outside of the scope of his employment, he was working under the direction of the defendant, and for its benefit, and greater care was required of the defendant toward him, under these circumstances, than if he had been working in the regular line of his employment.

On the one hand, the defendant claims that the danger to which the deceased was subjected when obeying the orders of Clifton to truck out the cement was an open and obvious danger; while, on the other hand, the claim is as earnestly made that there was no danger at all, but that the trough of the conveyor was covered up amply sufficient for the deceased to have trucked over, and that it was absolute recklessness in him in trucking over the place that was open. It is not pretended that it was not the duty of the defendant to keep this trough closed, as its own witnesses say that it was to be kept closed, and that it was in fact usually kept closed; while there is nothing in the evidence to justify the conclusion that the deceased knew that, in order to make it safe to pass over it, it was necessary to nail down and securely fasten its covering. As has already been stated, Clifton, in charge of the stockhouse, knew that the conveyor was exposed on the day before, and he knew it had not been closed up at the time he directed the deceased to get the cement and truck it out, for it is testified to that Clifton and a witness examined in the case passed over and along this passageway over the opening in the conveyor within five minutes before the deceased received his injuries. Yet he said nothing by way of warning to the deceased of the unsafe condition of the conveyor when he directed him to truck the cement wanted by Irving out. It is true that the evidence shows that hammer and nails were lying close by the opening in the conveyor, but there is no evidence, as has been said, that the deceased knew that it was necessary to fasten down any covering put over the conveyor, nor does it clearly appear that the hammer and nails were seen by him, or that they were where he could not have failed to see them. At all events, that was but a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining the question whether the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence.

As to the contention that the conveyor was sufficiently covered over for the deceased to have passed it in safety—that is, that there was room enough for him to have trucked over it without the use of the board which he placed over the uncovered space—the evidence in the case overwhelmingly refutes the contention. In addition to the fact that this board, used by the deceased, was near the opening in the conveyor, and had been there for months before, as Clifton himself testifies, and had the appearance of having been used for the very purpose for which the deceased used it, five witnesses testified that the conveyor could not be crossed with the truck without something being put down over the open space. True, two witnesses for the defendant testified that they trucked over the conveyor the morning of this accident, but on cross-examination one of them says, "We went over a board that was already there," and the jury might have been well warranted in the conclusion that the board referred to was the very board that the deceased put down over the opening in the conveyor, especially in view of the facts shown that the board was conveniently near the opening in the conveyor, that it fitted the opening, and had the marks of truck wheels across it, as if it had been used for the very purpose that the deceased and Webb put it to. This board, or bridge, as the evidence shows, was made by fastening two boards together with a batten nailed across them, and when laid in the opening over the conveyor it came about a quarter of an inch above the floor, as did the covering on the conveyor where not taken up; but Webb, who was the only person present at the time, says that when the board was put down in the opening "it fit the place all right." Although the board, as Clifton admits, had been sitting there in the passageway for months prior to the accident, it disappeared thereafter, and was not produced at the trial, though called for. By their verdict the jury have accepted the statements of the witnesses for the plaintiff, to the effect that there was no way to truck the cement out along the passageway and over the conveyor without putting down something over the opening in it.

This is not the case of an employé voluntarily undertaking to make repairs that the employer should have made, taking the consequences of a failure to make them properly, but that of an employé undertaking to perform his duties with unsafe appliances or ways by using additional precautions. In the first-named case an employé cannot recover for injuries caused by his own negligence in using, without order to do so, appliances which he knows to be dangerously defective or out of repair, or using dangerous machinery in a perilous manner, etc.; for, as the authorities say, "Obviously he cannot recover for an injury caused by his own negligent workmanship or bad judgment, especially where he chooses to follow his own judgment in opposition to that of the master." 1 Shearman & Redfield on Neg. § 207.

The case here comes under that line of cases referred to by the same learned authors in section 214, where it is said: "The right of a servant to recover on account of the master's negligence is not affected by notice of any defects other than such as the servant foresaw, or, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, ought to have foreseen, might endanger his safety. If a servant of ordinary prudence would have believed that he could not, in the regular discharge of his duties, be injured by the defect, the servant may properly disregard it, without losing the right to complain if, while pursuing his ordinary course, under such belief, he suffers from such defect. And so, if the danger is one which a servant of ordinary prudence would believe could be entirely avoided by the use of certain additional precautions, the servant would not, by continuing his service, lose his right to recover for damages suffered by him while using such precautions. But, on the other hand, it is clearly the duty of a servant in such a case to use all those additional precautions which ordinary prudence, in view of the risk, would dictate; and the burden of proof would justly be laid upon him to prove that he did so. The servant loses no rights unless he comprehends and appreciates the danger, or, having the necessary capacity and information, fails to do so by his own fault. But one who comprehends the danger is not excused by his inability to realize the full extent of the injuries which may possibly result therefrom."

In all such cases, whether the servant has been guilty of negligence which is the proximate cause of his injury, is a question for the jury. As was said in McMahon v. Port Henry Ore Co., 24 Hun, 48: "It would seem to be unreasonable that one who has undertaken a service which in itself has some elements of danger, whenever he shall see that the danger has been increased through some negligence of his employer, must either stop his employment or be deemed to have accepted the increased risk. We do not think that this is the rule, and it seems to us that the plaintiff had the right to go to the jury on the question whether he was, under the circumstances, justified in going on with his work." See, also, N. Pac. R. R. Co. v. Egeland, 163 U. S. 93, 16 Sup. Ct. 975, 41 L. Ed. 82.

In a note to that case, citing a number of authorities, the familiar rule is stated, viz.: "When the facts are disputed, or more than one inference can be fairly drawn from them as to the care or want of care of the plaintiff, the question of contributory negligence is for the jury." And, further, that: "When the question arises upon a state of facts on which reasonable men may fairly arrive at different conclusions, the fact of negligence cannot be determined until one or the other of these conclusions has been drawn by the jury. The inferences to be drawn from the evidence must either be certain and incontrovertible, or they cannot be decided by the court." This is substantially the rule as laid down by this court in Kimball & Fink v. Friend's Adm'r, 95 Va. 125, 27 S. E. 901, and a number of cases following.

"A servant is, as a general rule, excusable for obeying orders in and about his master's business, when such orders are given by the master, or by one in authority over the servant as a representative of the master, unless the danger to be incurred by such obedience is so plain and manifest that no prudent person would attempt obedience even under orders from one having authority over him. Even though there be apparent danger in obeying the master's order, yet such knowledge on the part of the servant will not defeat a recovery, if the danger is not such as to threaten immediate injury, or if the servant might reasonably have supposed that he could safely work about certain defective machinery by the use of care and caution, and if it is shown that he did use all the care incident to the situation in which he was placed." 20 A. & E. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) pp. 147, 148.

In the case at bar the only eyewitness to the accident to the deceased was Webb, who testified that he and the deceased were just as careful as they could be in trucking over the conveyor; and it is perfectly clear from the evidence that, had not the screw operating through the conveyor choked up and displaced the board laid down by Webb and the deceased, which it often did, and which was unknown to the deceased, so far as the record discloses, the board would not have been displaced, and the accident would not have happened. The defendant, however, was well aware, not only that the conveyor was open, but that it could not be safely covered without the covering being securely nailed down; and this knowledge was not communicated to the deceased by Clifton when he gave him the order to truck the cement out over the conveyor. Therefore there was no information which the deceased could have imparted to his employer, as to the condition of the conveyor, it did not already possess.

Say Shearman & Redfield on Neg. 186: "The true rule in this as in all other cases is that, if the master gives the servant to understand that he does not consider the risk one which a prudent person should refuse to undertake, the servant has a right to rely upon his master's judgment, unless his own is so clearly opposed thereto that in fact he does not rely upon the master's opinion."

says: "When the right of a servant to recover for an injury received while using defective machinery or appliances, which the master has provided for his use, is questioned because of previous notice of the defect, the mere isolated fact of risk is not the only matter to be considered. All the circumstances are to be taken into account. The law does not prescribe a rule so inflexible or unwise as that a servant must forthwith refrain from using a defective machine or appliance, or immediately quit the service of the master upon the discovery of the defect in the machine or appliance, or that he is working by the side of a negligent fellow servant, upon the pain of conferring immunity upon the master from all liability for an injury incurred in consequence of such defect or incompetency. The true test in all such cases is whether a person of ordinary prudence, acting with such prudence, would, under all the circumstances, have refused to incur the risk." See, also, City of Charlottesville v. Stratton's Adm'r, 102 Va. 95, 45 S. E. 737; B. & O. R. R. Co. v. McKenzie, 81 Va. 71.

In the last case, citing Hough v. Ry. Co., 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. Ed. 612; Wabash Ry. Co. v. McDaniels, 107 U. S. 454, 2 Sup. Ct. 932, 27 L. Ed. 605; 2 Thomp. on Neg. 985, 986—it is said: "The master, to be exempt from liability, must himself have been free from negligence. He is bound to use ordinary care in supplying and maintaining proper instrumentalities for the performance of the work required, and generally to provide for the safety of the servant in the course of the employment, to the best of his skill and judgment. And if he fail in the performance of his duty in this particular, he is liable to the servant as he would be to a stranger."

"The servant, although he may know that the instrumentalities of the business are not in good repair and condition, is not thereby necessarily chargeable with negligence in remaining in the master's employ and using them, unless real danger therefrom is apparent. In all cases where there is any doubt, the question is for the jury." Wood on Master & Servant, § 327.

In section 388, the same author says: "In all cases where there is any conflict in the evidence, or any room for doubt as to whether the servant is chargeable with negligence by remaining in service after knowledge of the condition of the instrumentalities of the business, the question is for the jury, and the question for them to pass upon is whether a man of ordinary prudence would have regarded it as negligent to perform the particular service, in view of the circumstances." See, also, Anderson Pressed Brick Co. v. Sobkowiak, 148 Ill. 573, 36 N. E. 572.

The opinion by Buchanan, J., in Richmond Traction Co. v. Clarke, 101 Va. 382, 43 S. E. 618, says: "The questions whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in the management of its car, or the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross the street in front of the approaching car, under the facts and circumstances of the case, were questions peculiarly within the province of the jury. Their determination of those questions depended largely upon the credibility of the witnesses and the value or weight the jury, who saw and heard them testify, attached to the testimony of each; * * * and we cannot say that upon the whole case the evidence was plainly insufficient to sustain the verdict."

In the case at bar it is not pretended that the defendant was not negligent in leaving the conveyor in question exposed, and in failing to warn the deceased, when instructed to truck cement over it, of the danger of the situation; and whether the deceased was guilty of negligence, under all the circumstances, was a question properly and fairly submitted to the jury, and their verdict was for the plaintiff.

As to whether or not the deceased was guilty of negligence proximately contributing to his injury, the evidence, to say the least of it, was conflicting, and upon the familiar rule controlling the consideration of evidence by this court we are bound by their verdict.

The judgment of the circuit court is therefore affirmed.

KEITH, P. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the judgment of the court. Plaintiff's intestate was, in the course of his duties, required to place a number of bags of cement upon a truck and move it to a designated point. The opinion of the court states that: "The deceased took a truck, went to where the cement was, and Webb loaded the truck. They proceeded along the passageway, the deceased pushing the truck, until they reached the conveyor, and, seeing that they could not get across it without some covering over the opening in it, and seeing sitting near by a board which seemed to fit the opening and appeared to have been used for that purpose, they laid it in the opening, which it fitted, and passed successfully over the conveyor with that load of cement, but when crossing the conveyor with the second load the board moved, and left the opening into which the deceased's foot passed, and his leg was ground off below the knee, resulting in a few hours afterwards in his death from the shock." It appears further that when the order to move the cement was given the cement company knew of the condition of the passageway. The situation, then, was that the cement company was derelict in failing to exercise ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place for their employees in which to perform their duties; but it further appears that the danger was open and obvious, that the plaintiff's intestate knew the condition of the passageway, and that it was impossible to pass over it with a loaded truck in the condition in which he found it.

To pass the obstacle without repair involved imminent and obvious peril. A screw several inches in diameter, designed to move and capable of moving the product of the cement mill, was revolving in an open box 12 or 14 inches in width. What was his duty? He might have declined to perform the task assigned to him; he might have reported the situation to his employer, and required repairs to be made; or he could step beyond the line of his employment, assume a duty which had never been required of or intrusted to him, and himself undertake to make the necessary repairs. He resolved upon the latter course. There was a board sitting against the wall. He and his companion placed it over the aperture. One trip was made over it in safety, but in attempting to pass over it the second time the improvised cover moved and left the opening into which the deceased stepped and received the fatal injury.

The majority opinion cites section 214 of Shearman & Redfield on the Law of Negligence:

"The right of a servant to recover on account of the master's negligence is not affected by notice of any defects other than such as the servant foresaw, or in the exercise of ordinary prudence ought to have foreseen, might endanger his safety. If a servant of ordinary prudence would have believed that he could not, in the regular discharge of his duties, be injured by the defect, the servant may properly disregard it, without losing his right to complain, if, while pursuing his ordinary course, under such belief, he suffers from such defect. And so, if the danger is one which a servant of ordinary prudence would believe could be entirely avoided by the use of certain additional precautions, the servant would not, by continuing his service, lose his right to recover for damages suffered by him while using such precautions. But, on the other hand, it is clearly the duty of a servant in such a case to use all those additional precautions which ordinary prudence, in view of the risk, would dictate; and the burden of proof would justly be laid upon him to prove that he did so. The servant loses no rights unless he comprehends and appreciates the danger, or, having the necessary capacity and information, fails to do so by his own fault. But one who comprehends the danger is not excused by his inability to realize the full extent of the injuries which may possibly result therefrom."

I cannot conceive of a more open or obvious danger than that which existed in this case, and by that I mean to say that not only was the defect obvious, and was in point of fact seen by the deceased, but the imminent peril incident to the defect was such as temerity itself could not be blind to. It required no foresight, but the simplest observation of an existing fact, obvious to the senses, and known to the decedent, to notify him of the peril in undertaking to pass over such an opening, inclosing a screw propelled by such a force, with a loaded truck. He saw the defect, he knew the peril, and he undertook, of his own accord, to make such repairs as would obviate the danger. Was it ordinary prudence for an employé to act beyond the scope of his authority with respect to a matter as to which he owed no duty, had no knowledge or experience, and to deal with such a situation as that which confronted the deceased? The master in this case gave no assurance. The servant acted upon his own initiative and responsibility.

McMahon v. Port Henry Ore Co., 24 Hun, 48, is relied upon in the majority opinion, and I have no fault to find with that decision. In that case it appears that the employé of the defendant was injured by the premature explosion of a blast while he was engaged in charging a hole. It appears that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in three respects: First, in using damp, unglazed powder; second, in drilling a square, instead of a round, hole; and, third, in using an iron, instead of a copper, spoon for charging it. It was held that the mere fact that the plaintiff continued his work with knowledge of these facts did not of itself establish contributory negligence as a matter of law on his part, but only authorized the submission of that question to the jury. The court said, in the course of its opinion, that: "It would seem to be unreasonable that one who has undertaken a service, which in itself has some elements of danger, whenever he shall see that the danger has been increased through some negligence of his employer, must either stop his employment or be deemed to have accepted the increased risk. We do not think that this is the rule. And it seems to us that the plaintiff had a right to go to the jury on the question whether he was, under the circumstances, justified in going on with his work."

In that case there were elements of danger, but the danger was not so imminent but that reasonable men might entertain different opinions with respect to it.

Another quotation is made by the court in its opinion from Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 186: "The true rule in this as in all other cases is that, if the master gives the servant to understand that he does not consider the risk one which a prudent person should refuse to undertake, the servant has a right to rely upon his master's judgment, unless his own is so clearly opposed thereto that, in fact, he does not rely upon the master's opinion."

Does it not clearly appear in this case that the servant did not rely on the master's opinion? The order to move the truck was given, and that may be said to satisfy the quotation, as giving the servant to understand that the master did not consider the risk one which a prudent person would refuse to undertake. But the servant did not rely upon it. The risk was so clear, so obvious, so imminent; the task, indeed, so impossible of performance in the condition in which Luck found the passway—that there is no pretension that he relied upon any such implied understanding of the master's opinion as to the risk. It is plain that he exercised and relied upon his own judgment when he undertook to make the needed repairs.

Previous decisions of this court had established, as I supposed, the law upon which I rely.

In McDonald's Adm'r v. Norfolk & Western R. Co., 95 Va. 98, 27 S. E. 821, Judge Riely said: "It is a general principle of the law of master and servant that the master shall use ordinary care and diligence to provide reasonably safe and suitable machinery and appliances for the use of the servant, and the master will be held liable for an injury to the servant which results from the omission to exercise such care and diligence. It is also a settled principle that a servant, when he enters the service of the master, assumes all the ordinary risks of such service. He assumes, as a general rule, all risks from causes which are known to him, or which are open and obvious, and must exercise reasonable care and caution for his own safety while engaged in the master's service. It is likewise well settled that, if the servant is injured by reason of a defect in the machinery or appliance furnished by the master for the use of the servant, or its unsuitableness, which defect or unsuitableness is known to him, and the servant, after such knowledge, remain in the service of the master, and continue to use the machinery or appliance without giving notice of the defect or unsuitableness to the master, or without any promise by the master to render the same less dangerous, he will be taken to have assumed the risk of all danger to be reasonably apprehended from its use, and is bound to exercise the care and caution which the perils of the business demand."

When the authorities speak of exercising care and caution in using defective machinery or appliances, they obviously mean the machine or appliance in the condition in which the master left it and in which the servant found it. They have no reference to any betterments or repairs which the servant, at his own suggestion and at his own peril, undertakes to make.

Section 214 of Shearman & Redfield on Negligence makes plain what is meant when it is said: "If the danger is one which a servant of ordinary prudence would believe could be avoided by the use of certain additional precautions, the servant would not, by continuing his service, lose his right to recover for damages suffered by him while using such precautions." The caption of the section is as follows: "Notice of Defect Without Notice of Danger Immaterial." But here it is not denied that both the defect and the danger incident to it were known. The defect was open and obvious, and the danger not less so, and the knowledge of its existence is admitted by the effort to repair. Nor was there any specific order from the master to go on despite the defect, but only such assurance of safety as is to be inferred from the general direction to perform the service—that is, to remove the cement—the master knowing the condition of the passageway. Other than this there was no order from the master, and no assurance of safety, or promise with respect to repairs.

The cases cited in support of the text are conclusive as to its meaning. Without exception they turn upon the point that the servant was required to act quickly, without opportunity for inspection, or there was a promise to repair, or there was a contemporaneous and urgent command from the master requiring instant obedience. Dooner v. Del. Canal Co., 164 Pa. 17, 30 Atl. 269; Irvine v. Flint, 89 Mich. 416, 50 N. W. 1008; Carter v. Oliver Oil Co., 34 S. C. 211, 13 S. E. 419, 27 Am. St. Rep. 815; Kane v. R. R. Co., 128 U. S. 91, 9 Sup. Ct. 16, 32 L. Ed. 339; Lee v. Woolsey, 109 Pa. 124; Griffin v. Glenn Mfg. Co., 67 N. H. 287, 30 Atl. 344. In not one of these cases is there a suggestion of any repair, great or small, and it is manifest that the "additional precautions" referred to in the text refer to the greater circumspection on the part of the employé.

We have held that among the unassignable duties of a master is that of exercising ordinary care to furnish reasonably safe appliances with which the work of the employé is to be performed. Suppose, in the case before us, Luck had gone to the proper officer of the cement company and had said: "There is a defect in the passway over which I am directed to move a loaded truck, and it must be repaired before I can discharge the duty imposed upon me." Let us suppose that the cement company, in the performance of its duty, had taken the plank actually used by Luck, and had made the repair in the identical manner and form resorted to by Luck, can it be doubted that the company would have been responsible for the injury which resulted? In addition to the original negligence, there would have been superadded the negligence of making an insufficient repair to a dangerous appliance. If, then, Luck, instead of making the demand of his employer, assumes the place of that employer, and undertakes to discharge one of its unassignable duties, has he not, with the assumption of the duty, taken also upon himself the burden resulting from its improper discharge?

The majority opinion says: "This is not the case of an employé voluntarily undertaking to make repairs that the employer should have made, but that of an employé undertaking to perform his duties in the face of danger, to say the most of it, by using additional precautions. In the first-named case an employé cannot recover for injuries caused by his own negligence in using, without order to do so, appliances which he knows to be dangerously defective or out of repair, or using dangerous machinery in a perilous manner, etc.; for, as the authorities say, 'Obviously he cannot recover for an injury caused by his own negligent workmanship, or bad judgment, especially where he chooses to follow his own judgment in opposition to that of the master.' 1 Shearman & Redfield on Neg. § 207."

It would be difficult to give an illustration differentiating the act of an employé voluntarily making a repair and thereby taking upon himself the consequence of failing to make it properly from that of an employé undertaking to perform his duties with unsafe appliances by the use of "additional precautions," using those words in the sense of making alterations in or repairs to the place or appliance in use. As I understand the learned authors just cited, the "additional precautions" referred to are not in the nature of alterations, betterments, or changes in the structure of the appliances used, but greater caution and circumspection in the use of the defective appliances which the employer has provided. In the latter case, unless the danger be obvious to all—that is to say, if there may be an honest difference of opinion as to the peril involved in its use—the employé, when injured, will still be entitled to recover, if he used the defective machine in a careful and cautious manner. But an employé who finds a defect in a machine, and he, not being charged with the duty of repair, undertakes to assume such duty, then he comes within the law as stated in Shearman & Redfield, § 207, and cannot recover for an injury caused by his own negligent workmanship or bad judgment.

I am of opinion that the cement company was guilty of negligence in that it failed to exercise ordinary care in providing a reasonably safe place for the performance of the duties imposed upon its employés, but that the contributory negligence of the plaintiff's intestate was of such a character as to preclude a recovery, in that, when confronted with an open and obvious risk, a peril of the most palpable and imminent character, he voluntarily assumed to step beyond the line of his duties; that in this act he was not resorting to "additional precautions" in the use of an imperfect appliance, but was undertaking to remove the danger by repairs of his own making; that in thus acting he assumed the duty of his employer, and discharged it at his own peril; and that, as the master would have been responsible if the repair had been made by it in the identical manner adopted by the injured servant, and the latter could have recovered, he is in this case debarred of recovery, because his injury was due to his own negligent workmanship and bad judgment.

RIXEY v. RIXEY et al.

PARENT AND CHILD—CONVEYANCES BETWEEN—PRESUMPTION OF VALIDITY—BURDEN OF PROOF—CONSIDERATION.

1. Contracts and conveyances by which benefits are secured by a parent to a child are generally presumed to be free from suspicion, and the person who claims they were procured by undue influence has the burden of proof.

2. Though there is a considerable disparity between the money consideration and the value of land conveyed by a mother to two of her daughters, it will not be set aside, at the suit of other children, where there is no evidence of fraud or undue influence, and the conveyance recites that the grantees have attended to all of the grantor's business and have cared for her, and reserves a vendor's lien to enforce a covenant that the grantees will care for and support the grantor during the remainder of her life.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fauquier County.

Bill by James M. Rixey, as next friend of Eleanora Rixey, against Mollie E. Rixey and others, to cancel a deed. From the decree rendered, Mollie E. Rixey and Fannie A. Coles appeal. Reversed.

E. S. Turner and Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson, for appellants. J. K. M. Norton and Louis C. Barley, for appellee.

KEITH, P. James M. Rixey, as next friend of his mother, Eleanora Rixey, filed a bill in the circuit court of Fauquier county against his sisters, Mollie E. Rixey, Fannie A. Coles, and Tucker S. Coles, her husband, and Richard Anderson, the object of which was to have a deed from Eleanora Rixey to Fannie A. and Mollie E. Rixey annulled upon the ground that it was obtained by fraud and undue influence.

The defendants filed their answer, denying the allegations of the bill, and, upon the issues thus made, evidence was taken, and the circuit court, by its decree, set the deed aside for "inadequacy of consideration and undue influence"; and thereupon Mollie E. Rixey and Fannie A. Coles have brought the case to this court upon appeal.

At the instance of the defendants a rule was awarded requiring James M. Rixey to appear and show by what authority he instituted this suit as the next friend of his mother. Upon this subject affidavits were filed, and there was much discussion at the bar. Without intimating any opinion upon this branch of the case or upon the demurrer to the bill, but assuming that the plaintiff had a right to sue in the manner and form which he pursued, and that the demurrer was properly overruled, we shall dispose of the controversy upon its merits.

Many witnesses were examined, and their testimony is comprised in a very bulky record. Thoroughly to discuss the details of this evidence would be tedious and unconstructive. The more important facts are as follows:

Mrs. Rixey was 78 years of age when the deed in question was executed by her. She had a son, who is the plaintiff, as her next friend; a daughter, Mrs. Lake; and the appellants Mollie and Fannie, who is now Mrs. Coles. The appellants were capable and energetic business women. They looked after the affairs of their mother, who, while sound in mind, was enfeebled by the weight of years, and shielded and watched over her with affectionate interest and care. On the 27th of August, 1898, Mrs. Rixey executed a deed, which recites: "This deed made and entered into this 27th day of August, 1898, between Eleanora Rixey, party of the first part, and Fannie A. Rixey and Mollie E. Rixey, parties of the second part;

"Whereas, the said party of the first part is indebted to the said parties of the second part in the sum of three thousand ($3000) dollars, with interest from June, 1891, which said debt is evidenced by a certain deed of trust, of record in the clerk's office of the County Court of Fauquier county, in Deed Book 1893-94, page 341; and

"Whereas, the said parties of the second part, daughters of the said party of the first part, have attended to all of the business of the said party of the first part, and have cared for and attended to her; and

"Whereas, the said parties of the second part hereby covenant and agree to and with the said party of the first part, which is evidenced by their acceptance of this deed, to provide for and support the said party of the first part for life;

"Now, therefore, this deed witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the above debt, services and covenant to support, and of the sum of five ($5.00) dollars in hand paid the said party of the first part by the said parties of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the said Eleanora Rixey has granted, bargained and sold, and by these presents does grant, bargain, sell and convey unto the said Fannie A. Rixey and Mollie E. Rixey, their heirs and assigns forever, with general warranty, all that certain tract or parcel of land * * * containing five hundred and twenty-five acres. * * *

"This land hereby conveyed is subject to a deed of trust to secure the sum of one thousand dollars, and there is excepted from this conveyance about eighty acres of land, conveyed by the said party of the first part to R. C. Rixey. * * *

"The said party of the first part hereby reserves a vendor lien upon the land hereinbefore conveyed, in order to secure to her an adequate support for and during her natural life."

It appears that Mrs. Rixey had theretofore made a will, to the following effect:

"Being of sound mind and memory, I, Eleanora Rixey, of Fauquier County, Virginia, do make this my last will and testament.

"1st: I wish my funeral expenses and just debts paid.

"2nd: I give to my son James M. Rixey ten dollars.

"3rd: I give to my daughter Florence V. Lake, ten dollars.

"4th: All the rest and residue of my estate, real, personal, and mixed, of whatever kind and wheresoever situate, I give, bequeath and devise to my daughters, Fannie A. Rixey and Mollie E. Rixey to them and their heirs forever.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 15th day of January, 1894."

Here are two solemn instruments emanating from Mrs. Rixey, one dated the 15th of January, 1894, and the other August 27, 1898, both disposing of her property in substantially the same manner. The will was, of course, revocable, but was never revoked, and has been probated as her last will and testament. The two instruments, taken together, show a fixed and settled purpose upon the part of Mrs. Rixey with respect to the disposition of her property. She was a woman of sound mind—the only infirmity under which she suffered being such as is inseparable from advancing years—and there is no evidence that either the will or the deed was procured by actual fraud or undue influence.

It is earnestly contended, however, that, by long intercourse between the mother and daughters, she had become dependent upon them, and had fallen wholly under their influence, and that they, being strong, active, energetic, and capable, exercised a dominant influence over their mother, who had become enfeebled by age.

The subject has been recently considered by this court, and the opinion of Judge Buchanan in Burwell v. Burwell (decided at the present term) 49 S. E. 68, renders any discussion of the law upon the subject unnecessary.

In the case just cited it is said: "There are certain relations in life, which, from the peculiar confidence necessarily subsisting, courts of equity feel bound to guard and protect. These are guardian and ward, trustee and cestui que trust, attorney and client, principal and agent, parent and child, and the like. Transactions between persons occupying such confidential relations are viewed with jealous vigilance by courts of equity. 1 Story's Eq. Jur. §§ 307 to 323.

"While the natural and just influence which a parent has over a child renders it peculiarly important for courts to watch over and protect the interests of the latter, and to set aside contracts and conveyances whereby benefits are secured by children to their parents, if they are not entered into with scrupulous good faith, and are not reasonable under the circumstances, the same rule does not apply where contracts and conveyances are made by which benefits are secured by the parent to the child. Instead of such contracts and conveyances being guarded with a jealous eye, they will generally be presumed to be free from suspicion, and the party who claims that they were procured by undue influence must generally prove it.

"Mr. Pomeroy says, in discussing the transactions between parent and child, that 'a child is presumed to be under the exercise of parental influence as long as the dominion of the parent lasts. Whilst that dominion lasts it lies upon the parent maintaining the gift to disprove the exercise of parental influence by showing that the child had independent advice, or in some other way. When the parental influence is disproved, or that influence has ceased, a gift from a child stands upon the same footing as any other gift, and the question to be determined is whether there was a deliberate, unbiased intention on the part of the child to give to the parent. Where the positions of the two parties are reversed—where the parent is aged, infirm, or otherwise in a condition of dependence upon his own child, and the child occupies a corresponding relation of authority—conveyances conferring benefits upon the child may be set aside. Cases of this kind turn plainly upon the exercise of actual undue influence, and not upon any presumption of invalidity. A gift from parent to child is certainly not presumed to be invalid.' 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 962. And a fortiori there is no such presumption as to a contract based upon a valuable consideration.

"In the case of Greer v. Greer, 9 Grat. 332, a man in extreme old age conveyed the whole of his estate to one of his sons; and this court held that, as he had sufficient capacity to understand what he was doing, and there was no direct proof of fraud or undue influence, the improvidence and injustice of the act, in disinheriting his other children, did not give rise to a presumption of an abuse of confidence, or justify the court in setting aside the conveyance.

"In the case of Orr v. Pennington, 93 Va. 268, 275, 24 S. E. 928, where a father, a month before his death, had conveyed substantially all of his property to one of his four children, and it was sought to set aside the conveyance upon the ground that the grantee had procured its execution by the exercise of undue influence over the grantor when his mind was weakened by the infirmities of age and disease, the rule, as stated by Mr. Pomeroy and quoted above, that such cases turn upon the exercise of actual undue influence of the child over the parent, and not upon any presumption of invalidity, was approved and followed."

In this case there is a considerable disparity between the money consideration which passed and the value of the land, but other considerations are recited. It is declared that the parties of the second part have attended to all of the business of the party of the first part, and have cared for and attended to her; and there is a further covenant, for the enforcement of which there is the reservation of a vendor's lien upon the land—that the grantees will care for and support the grantor during the remainder of her life.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the mother was capable of contracting; that in the deed culminates a purpose with respect to the disposition of her property which she had long entertained, as is shown by her will duly executed more than four years before the date of the deed; that there is no proof of actual fraud and undue influence; and that the relation between the grantor and grantees, and other circumstances of the case, are not such as to give rise to a presumption of the invalidity of the deed in question.

The decree of the circuit court allows a fee of $500 to the attorneys who filed the bill. This action of the court was, we think, also erroneous, as there is no fund under the control of the court in this case properly applicable to that purpose.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the decree complained of should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, to be further proceeded with in accordance with the views herein expressed.

GOFF v. BOARD OF CANVASSERS OF ROANE COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Dec. 31, 1904.)

MANDAMUS—ELECTION OFFICERS—JURISDICTION.

1. Upon a mandamus from this court in election cases, the action of election officers may be reviewed and controlled to the same extent as upon the statutory writ of certiorari in the circuit courts.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by H. F. Goff for writ of mandamus to the board of canvassers of Roane county. Writ awarded.

Pendleton & Boggess, J. G. Schilling, J. M. Harper, O. J. Chambers, Geo. F. Cunningham, and Molohan, McClintic & Mathews, for petitioner. T. P. Ryan and C. E. Hogg, for respondent.

POFFENBARGER, P. H. F. Goff asks a mandamus to compel the board of canvassers of Roane county to reject the ballots and certificate of the election held at precinct No. 8 of Geary District, in said county, in the election held in November last, for the reason that none of the said ballots have the signatures of the poll clerks properly affixed. Goff and W. Bailey Young had been opposing candidates for the office of sheriff of said county in said election, and a recount between them was in progress. Before said precinct was reached the ballots were tampered with. Upon opening them it was found that not a single ballot had the signatures of both poll clerks on it, written in the handwriting of each. There were 184 ballots. On 169 of them both names were in the handwriting of the Republican clerk. On the remaining 15 ballots, both names were in the handwriting of the Democratic clerk. Under these circumstances, the rule announced in Stafford v. Board of Canvassers (just decided) 49 S. E. 364, required the rejection of the ballots and the certificate of the precinct officers as to said precinct and of the entire vote at said precinct. Instead of rejecting it, the board admitted evidence of commissioners and clerks to show that some ballots cast at said precinct had been properly signed. On this issue the evidence was conflicting, and the board arrived at the conclusion that some legal ballots had been cast, and had been abstracted and others inserted in lieu of them since the returns had been canvassed. Upon this finding the result of the election at the precinct was declared from and according to the certificate of the precinct election officers, under the rule declared in Stafford v. Board. It is not pretended that on the recount of said precinct a single valid ballot was before the board. They sustained the certificate upon the theory that originally it had been founded upon valid ballots.

If no ballots at all appeared, and there was evidence of tampering with the returns, there would be a presumption in favor of the certificate. The evidence of the commissioners and poll clerks as to the identity of the papers purporting to be returns is admissible, and if from such evidence it appears that the papers purporting to be the ballots used are not the ballots actually used, and it further appears that the returns have been tampered with, there would be a presumption in favor of the validity of the certificate.

It is urged that the finding of the board on the evidence as to the identity of these papers is not reviewable by this court by mandamus, because they say that would make the writ operate, not as a common-law certiorari, but as the statutory certiorari. We think, however, its scope is the same as the statutory certiorari. Mandamus in election cases, as now exercised, is of recent institution. The statute was passed long after the scope of the writ of certiorari had been broadened. This court having jurisdiction of mandamus, and it having, in election matters under the statute, the efficacy of a certiorari in a circuit court, we have the right to look to the statute giving the scope and effect of that writ. What else points the way? As the duties of election officers are almost wholly ministerial, no exercise of discretionary or quasi judicial power by them is binding on the courts having supervisory jurisdiction over them by mandamus.

Having carefully examined the evidence, we do not think the conclusion of the canvassers on the question of the identity of the ballots is sustained by it. The Republican poll clerk testified that it was his "recollection" that the first six or eight ballots cast had been properly signed. After examining all the ballots and finding none properly signed, he adhered to his former statement, but said he could not state positively that both clerks had signed some of the ballots. His evidence closed with this statement as to whether he might be mistaken: "It is possible that I might, but don't think I am." One of the commissioners said: "My recollection is that Mr. Osborn wrote his name and passed it to the other clerk, Mr. Pettit, but I didn't see the writing. I can't say whether the names were written that way or not." On cross-examination he said: "I didn't see the names. I wasn't close enough to see." The Democratic poll clerk said: "Each of us signed each other's names." He had no recollection of any having been properly signed. Another commissioner said: "To the best of my recollection Mr. Pettit wrote his name and Mr. Osborn's name on part of them, and the remainder Mr. Osborn wrote them himself."

From this it is apparent that the conclusion of the canvassers rests upon evidence of mere recollection, contrary to an admitted fact, namely, that one genuine signature is found upon every ballot. To sustain the finding, it must be said not only that ballots have been abstracted, but that one of the poll clerks signed both names on and substituted other ballots for those abstracted. There is not a scrap of evidence, circumstantial or other kind, indicating that either clerk had tampered with the ballots or that the signature of either had been counterfeited. The presence of these actual unimpeached signatures is a very strong circumstance in favor of the identity of the papers, and we conclude that the board erred in not giving the papers and signatures the evidential force to which they are entitled.

For the reasons aforesaid a writ of mandamus is awarded, commanding the said board of canvassers to reassemble and reject the entire vote at said precinct No. 3 of Geary district, and not count the same or any of it, and then declare the result of the said election in said county between the said candidates.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. DUCKETT.

RAILROADS—FRIGHTENING HORSE—EVIDENCE.

1. The plaintiff's horse became frightened at the noise of escaping steam made by an engine of the defendant company in starting with a heavy train of cars from one of its stations, the noise thus created being neither unusual nor unnecessary. The horse, after breaking away from a boy who was attempting to hold the animal, ran some distance along a road parallel to the railroad track, and then suddenly swerved from its course, and dashed headlong into the train, several cars back of the engine, and was killed by the impact. There was some conflict in the testimony as to whether the company's engineer shut off steam and checked the speed of the train as soon as he discovered that the horse had taken fright; but, whatever may have been the truth in this regard, it affirmatively appears that nothing he did or failed to do brought about or contributed to bringing about the casualty, the proximate and efficient cause of which was the fright of the horse produced by the noise made in starting the train. Such being the case, the verdict in favor of the plaintiff was contrary to law, and should have been set aside by the trial court.

HUGHES v. McHAN.

MARRIED WOMAN—GOODS SOLD—ACTION FOR PRICE.

1. Where the sole and controlling issue in a case was whether, as contended by the plaintiff, he had sold goods upon the credit of a married woman, to whom he delivered the same, or whether, as she insisted, credit therefor was extended to her husband, it was prejudicial error to allow the plaintiff to testify that, contracting on her own account, she had rented rooms from him.

Error from Superior Court, Gilmer County; Geo. F. Gober, Judge.

Action by Wm. T. McHan against Mrs. Charlie Hughes. Judgment for plaintiff before a justice. From an order of the superior court refusing to sustain a certiorari, defendant brings error. Reversed.

N. A. Morris and A. N. Edwards, for plaintiff in error. V. L. Watts, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. This case originated in a justice's court, the same being a suit brought by W. F. McHan against Mrs. Charlie Hughes to enforce the collection of an open account. The plaintiff prevailed on a trial before a jury in that court, and the defendant thereupon took the case by certiorari to the superior court. To the judgment of the superior court refusing to sustain her petition for certiorari she excepts.

In her petition she made complaint of various rulings of the magistrate, but, as his answer does not verify the statements of fact concerning any save two of these rulings, the correctness of the judgment excepted to depends upon whether or not there was merit in the complaint made of the two rulings of the magistrate to which he certifies. The issue in the case was whether, as contended by the plaintiff, he sold the articles of merchandise included in the account upon the individual credit of Mrs. Hughes, or whether, as she insisted, credit therefor was extended to her husband under an arrangement he had made with the plaintiff to furnish her supplies during his absence in Florida. Upon this issue the testimony was in painful conflict. Over the defendant's objection, the magistrate permitted the plaintiff to testify that "Mrs. Hughes rented some rooms from him." The purpose of this testimony was to show that the defendant had, with respect to the renting of these rooms, contracted in her individual capacity. Her objection was that he was not suing for rent, and the testimony did not illustrate the issue then being tried. The defendant then sought to rebut this testimony by introducing a receipt signed by the plaintiff, whereby he acknowledged payment of rent by her husband, but the magistrate declined to allow this receipt to be put in evidence. It is apparent that Mrs. Hughes' chances of success before the jury were thus seriously impaired. The testimony to which she objected was clearly irrelevant, and should have been excluded. It raised a purely collateral issue, which she was not permitted to meet, and its prejudicial effect upon the jury is illustrated by the verdict they returned, for the preponderance of the evidence was apparently in her favor. The court below should have allowed her another opportunity of contesting with the plaintiff the real merits of the case.

DRAKE v. BROWN MFG. CO.

JUDGMENT—VACATING.

1. A motion to set aside a judgment must be predicated upon some defect apparent upon the face of the record. Sweat v. Latimer, 46 S. E. 835, 119 Ga. 615, and cases cited. It was accordingly not error to sustain a demurrer to such a motion, based upon the ground that the movant had never been served with proper process in the suit wherein the judgment sought to be set aside was rendered, when it affirmatively appeared upon the face of the record that he had been so served.

CANDLER, J. This was a statutory action of ejectment, brought by Mrs. Bullard against her stepmother, Mrs. Leverett. The jury found for the plaintiff the premises in dispute and mesne profits. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and she excepted. The parties claimed under a common grantor, W. C. Leverett, father of the plaintiff, and husband of the defendant. The deed relied upon by the plaintiff contained a description by metes and bounds which was manifestly erroneous, inasmuch as it would be impossible, by following the courses laid out, to get back to the point from which the description started. The plaintiff contended that the ambiguity in the deed arose from the fact that the scrivener, by a clerical error, described one of the lines as running in a northeasterly direction to a rock corner, when he should have described it as running in a northwesterly direction to that point. The questions for our determination are whether the description in the plaintiff's deed was so vague and uncertain as to render it inadmissible in evidence, whether parol evidence was admissible to explain the ambiguity and establish the true boundaries of the land sought to be conveyed by the deed in question, and whether certain charges of the court of which complaint is made were erroneous.

We are clear that parol evidence was admissible to explain the ambiguity in the deed, and that, as thus explained, the deed was admissible as a muniment of title upon which the plaintiff could base a recovery. "Where the question whether a given deed is good as color of title depends upon whether it covered the land in dispute, and its terms are in this respect ambiguous, parol evidence is admissible to show that it did in fact apply to such land." Mayor of Chauncy v. Brown, 99 Ga. 766, 26 S. E. 763. The jury were amply warranted in finding that if, indeed, the draftsman of the deed under which the plaintiff claimed used the word "northeasterly" by mistake for "northwesterly," the land conveyed by the deed was the same as that described in the declaration. The termination of this line was a rock corner, which was clearly identified by different witnesses for the plaintiff. "If capable of identification, artificial monuments and old marks will generally control conflicting calls for courses and distances." 5 Cyc. 921, and cases cited in note 11; Riley v. Griffin, 16 Ga. 142 (15), 60 Am. Dec. 720. If this evidence was admissible, then—as we hold that it was—the description in the plaintiff's deed, as aided thereby, was sufficiently definite to constitute the basis of a recovery in an action of ejectment, for it is well settled in this state that a deed will not be declared void for uncertainty so long as the intention of the grantor can be ascertained. The doctrine, "Id certum est quod certum reddi potest," here applies. See Andrews v. Murphy, 12 Ga. 431; Gress Lumber Co. v. Coody, 94 Ga. 520, 21 S. E. 217; Mayor of Chauncy v. Brown, 99 Ga. 766, 26 S. E. 763; Tumlin v. Perry, 108 Ga. 520, 34 S. E. 171; Horton v. Murden, 117 Ga. 72, 48 S. E. 786; Brice v. Sheffield, 118 Ga. 128, 44 S. E. 843. These are only a few of many cases that might be cited in support of the ruling here made.

On the examination of the defendant as a witness in her own behalf it appeared from her testimony that the family of the plaintiff had for a time occupied the premises in dispute, but that they left at the request of Leverett, the common grantor of the parties. Counsel for the plaintiff objected to this testimony as irrelevant, and the court ruled: "You can show by the witness that they left, and left at the request of Mr. Leverett. I will let the evidence go in to that extent, and no further." In her motion for a new trial the defendant complains that the court erred in thus restricting the evidence, insisting "that said evidence should have been admitted for all purposes, and especially for the purpose of showing that W. C. Leverett claimed the right of adverse possession of the property," etc. We fail to see what cause for complaint the defendant has. The evidence was admitted for what it was worth, and there was nothing in the ruling made by the trial judge to prevent counsel from drawing whatever inference he chose from the evidence as given. While the judge used the language, "I will let the evidence go in to that extent, and no further," he in no sense restricted its probative force.

Error is also assigned upon the refusal of the judge to allow a witness to answer a stated question set out in the motion for a new trial; but, while the answer expected from the witness was set forth in the motion, it does not appear that like information was given to the judge at the time the ruling was made, and for this reason we cannot consider this ground. Freeman Co. v. Mencken, 115 Ga. 1017 (2), 42 S. E. 369; Grant v. Noel, 118 Ga. 258 (2), 45 S. E. 279.

The remaining grounds of the motion complain of alleged error in the charge of the court. They are, in our opinion, without merit. The charge to the effect that, if the jury should find that the plaintiff's deed covered the land in dispute, the deed to the defendant from the same grantor, which was 10 years subsequent to it in date, would not establish a superior outstanding title in the defendant, stated a correct principle of law. After title passed out of the grantor to Mrs. Bullard, it could not vest again by prescription in him, or those claiming under him adversely to the plaintiff, until after 20 years' adverse possession. The other extract from the charge to which exception is taken was quite long, and contained a statement of numerous principles of law, some of which, to say the least, were undeniably correct. The complaint against the charge seems to be that the court left it to the jury to determine the disputed issue as to the description of the land conveyed by the plaintiff's deed, instead of undertaking to settle the question as matter of law without the aid of the jury. It is always, of course, the province of the court to determine the legal effect of a written instrument; but we are not aware of any law which requires or authorizes a judge to settle a disputed question of fact as to the intention of the grantor in a deed where the description therein is ambiguous. The evidence for the plaintiff warranted the finding in her favor, and the verdict was not contrary to law.

WILL OF MARRIED WOMAN—DEATH OF HUSBAND—REVOCATION—REPUBLICATION—JURISDICTION.

1. Where a married woman made a will, her husband died, and she subsequently remarried, the will, under Civ. Code 1895, § 3347, was revoked. See Ellis v. Darden, 12 S. E. 652, 86 Ga. 368, 11 L. R. A. 51.

TANNER v. LEE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1904.)

PAYMENT—APPLICATION—NOTICE TO CREDITOR

1. If, without notice of another's claim thereto, a creditor receives money from his debtor in payment of a pre-existing debt, the true owner cannot thereafter compel such bona fide creditor to account therefor.

2. The evidence was conflicting as to whether the plaintiff had notice of defendant's title to money previously paid, but was sufficient to sustain a finding in plaintiff's favor.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Troup County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Action by W. C. Lee against Viney Tanner. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Viney and her husband, Jacob, Tanner were indebted to the plaintiff, Lee. The wife's debt was represented by a note, and that of the husband by an account, and also by a mortgage. Lee brought suit against the wife on the note. She pleaded payment of a certain sum, for which she claimed credit. Her evidence tended to show that she had given her husband certain money, with instructions to hand the same to the plaintiff as a payment on the note. The husband testified that he let the plaintiff know that the money belonged to his wife, but instructed him to put part as a credit on the note and part as a credit on his own mortgage; that he received a receipt, which he had lost. It appeared that the account was the oldest claim. The plaintiff denied that he had any notice that the money belonged to the wife, and testified that when the husband brought the money he first instructed it to be applied on the mortgage, but, after some conversation, consented that it should be applied on the account. There was a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount of the note sued on, and a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

E. T. Moon, for plaintiff in error. Isaac Jackson and D. J. Gaffney, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. If, when the cash was received and applied as a credit on the debt of the husband, the plaintiff had notice that the money actually belonged to the wife, she would have been entitled to a verdict on her plea of payment. If, however, he had no such notice, but took the money bona fide as a part payment on a pre-existing debt, then she was not entitled to the credit claimed, nor to a judgment against him for the amount so received. If the creditor's title to this money could be thus defeated without proof of notice of the defendant's interest therein, so likewise could the title of the defendant to the same money be attacked. The result would be that, if any link in the chain of ownership between herself and the mint was invalid, she could be called on to account by the last true owner. It is manifest that any such rule would be utterly destructive of the quality of currency which has been attached by law as an incident peculiar to money and negotiable paper, alone, of all other property. Money not only has no earmarks, but is currency, passing by delivery from hand to hand. It may be accepted in good faith, without any obligation to examine the holder's title, or to inquire the source from which he got it. One can give a better title thereto than he himself has, and one who receives it bona fide for a consideration may retain it as against the true owner. But it is said this principle does not apply to the payment of a pre-existing debt; that the creditor, on being obliged to return another's money unlawfully paid by the debtor, is in no worse position than he was before; that he still has his claim against the debtor, and may proceed to enforce it. And there are some decisions which seem to sustain this contention; certainly as to the case of negotiable instruments when they are used as collateral, or payment on pre-existing debts. But the contrary view has been adopted in this state. In Gibson v. Conner, 3 Ga. 51, it was said that the weight of authority was to the contrary, and that a note taken in payment of a pre-existing debt before due, and without notice of the maker's equity, can be enforced against him. See, also, Kaiser v. U. S. Nat. Bank, 99 Ga. 259, 25 S. E. 620; Partridge v. Williams' Sons, 72 Ga. 807. By the same principle one who receives money bona fide for a consideration, as in payment of a pre-existing debt, gets a title thereto good as against the true owner. The individual hardship must yield to the general rule, and to the necessity of preserving intact the right to accept money bona fide, without an inquiry as to the source from which it came. Besides, the payment may have lulled the creditor into nonaction. Relying thereon, he may have lost the opportunity to collect by means which were not resorted to because he thought the debt had been fully or partially paid. These considerations, along with the credit on the existing debt, furnish a sufficient consideration to support the transfer of title, and enable the creditor without notice of her claim to retain the same against the defendant. Civ. Code 1895, § 3538; Cloud v. Kendrick, 82 Ga. 730, 9 S. E. 1084; Newhall v. Wyatt, 139 N. Y. 452, 34 N. E. 1045, 36 Am. St. Rep. 712; State Nat. Bank v. U. S., 114 U. S. 401, 5 Sup. Ct. 888, 29 L. Ed. 149. Nor is the rule different under Civ. Code 1895, § 2488, because the money belonged to a wife, and the payment was made by the husband to satisfy a debt due by him to the plaintiff. Chason v. Anderson, 119 Ga. 495, 46 S. E. 629.

The evidence as to notice by the plaintiff of the wife's title was conflicting. It was, however, sufficient to sustain the finding in his favor, and there was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by T. B. Eaton and others against Joseph Barnes. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Westmoreland Bros. and F. M. Hughes, for plaintiffs in error. Saml. H. Sibley, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. An equitable petition was filed against Barnes by Eaton and others, the plaintiffs being the children and only heirs at law of Wm. G. Eaton. The petition alleged that Wm. G. Eaton had owned a certain tract of land, and had, on February 15, 1895, conveyed the same to the defendant to secure an indebtedness of $375, which sum he owed the defendant. The conveyance was made by a deed absolute on its face, but "upon the following trusts and conditions: The said Joseph Barnes was to hold the title to said property to secure him in the payment of the said sum of three hundred and seventy-five dollars, without interest. He was authorized to sell the same after the death of said Wm. G. Eaton, and, after deducting from the proceeds of said sale, the said three hundred and seventy-five dollars, without interest, he was to pay over to the plaintiffs, the children of the said Wm. G. Eaton, the remainder of the proceeds of the sale of said tract of land, giving to each of said children an equal proportion thereof." Wm. G. Eaton died on May 11, 1895, intestate, owing no other debts except that to Barnes; and there has been no administration upon the estate.

Barnes had never sold the land, which at the time of the filing of the petition, June, 1904, was of the value of $3,000. The petition further alleged that Barnes denied that he held the property upon any trust or condition, but claimed the absolute title, and was about to sell it for much less than its real value. The petitioners prayed that the deed to Barnes be declared to be a trust deed; that the court appoint a new trustee or a receiver, and order him to sell the property; and that the proceeds of the sale, after the payment of costs and after paying to defendant $375 and the amount he had paid for taxes upon the land, be paid to petitioners. To this petition defendant demurred upon several grounds. The court below sustained the demurrer, and the petitioners excepted.

1. The allegations of the petition show that the trust therein set up is express, and not implied. There was a distinct agreement made between the parties as to what should become of the land after the death of the grantor. The agreement did not contemplate any redemption of the land, but the land was to be sold. The proceeds of the sale, after the payment of the debt of the grantee, were not to go to the grantor or his estate, but to his children in equal shares. Such a trust is clearly within the definition of an express trust as given in Civ. Code 1895, § 3152: "Express trusts are those created and manifested by agreement of the parties." On the other hand, "implied trusts are such as are inferred by law from the nature of the transaction or the conduct of the parties." Civ. Code 1895, § 3152. The trust described in the petition was not such a one as would be inferred by law "from the nature of the transaction or the conduct of the parties," but was an express trust.

2. Under Civ. Code 1895, § 3153, "all express trusts must be created or declared in writing."

3. While the trust must have been created or declared in writing, it was not necessary for the pleader to so allege in the petition. Brown v. Drake, 101 Ga. 130, 28 S. E. 606; Walker v. Edmundson, 111 Ga. 454, 36 S. E. 800; Taliaferro v. Smiley, 112 Ga. 62, 37 S. E. 106. From the trend of the argument of counsel here the trial judge evidently sustained the demurrer upon the ground that the trust was an express one, and could not be established by parol. As to whether the petitioners intend to rely solely upon parol evidence, we are not informed. So far as the pleadings disclose, they may have writings which will be competent evidence to make out their case upon this point. They do not have to allege how they expect to prove their case. Upon demurrer it must be presumed, where the contrary does not appear, that the proof will be such as is required under the statute of frauds. The trial judge therefore erred in sustaining the demurrer. Whether the petitioners have any competent evidence with which to establish the alleged trust is a matter which can be tested upon the trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

COLLINS v. CITIZENS' BANK & TRUST CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1904.)

BUILDING ASSOCIATION—LOANS—BIDS—USURY—FORECLOSURE—EVIDENCE.

1. The Tennessee statute requires competitive bids for loans made to members by building associations, but such bid may be in writing.

2. The contract was within the scheme of a building and loan association proper, and not usurious on its face.

3. There was no formal plea of usury, and the payments claimed in the defendant's plea were in fact allowed by the plaintiff.

4. The rulings as to the admission of evidence objected to were immaterial, since they could not, in any event, have changed the result.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County
W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company, trustee, against J. A. Collins. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

In August, 1892, Collins made to the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company of Tennessee a mortgage in trust for the purpose of securing a promissory note payable to the Atlas Savings & Loan Association of Tennessee, chartered as a building and loan association under the laws of Tennessee. In addition to the promise to pay the principal sum, this note also promised to pay certain amounts for each week for dues, interest, and premiums. The trust company instituted, in the superior court of Floyd county, proceedings to foreclose the mortgage for the balance due. The rule nisi issued. By an amendment the plaintiff made proffert and an exhibit of the constitution, charter, and by-laws of the Atlas Savings & Loan Association. The defendant answered, denying the allegations of the original petition, and that he was the owner of any of the capital stock of the Atlas Savings & Loan Association, and averred that it was not a building and loan association pure and simple, but that it had devised a scheme under the form of a building and loan contract for exacting usurious interest. There was also attached a list of payments made by the defendant, and a statement in the plea that "upon an accounting he believes he has paid the original loan, the interest due upon it, and a sum in excess of those charges." The plaintiff introduced the note, the charter, by-laws, and constitution contained in the book furnished to the defendant, and the act of the Tennessee Legislature on the subject of a building and loan association, from which it appeared that the premium bid by borrowing stockholders for the preference or priority of loans may be paid in installments, not as a part of the loan, and not as interest, but as a means of determining which one of the shareholders shall receive a loan whenever there are a number of stockholders who may simultaneously desire to effect a loan. The plaintiff also introduced the application of the defendant for membership, and constituting Rood his attorney and agent to sign the rules and by-laws, which the plaintiff also agreed to abide by. The defendant objected to the admission of the by-laws signed by Rood and to the proof of the charter; and in several assignments of error raised the point that under the Tennessee statute the bid for the loan could only be in person, and there was evidence that defendant's bid had been made in writing, and that such written bid had been read and accepted at a meeting for the sale of money. The plaintiff proved and admitted payments equal to or in excess of those set out in the defendant's plea. The president of the building and loan association testified at length as to the method on which its business was conducted. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). Had the loan been an advance of money between an ordinary lender and borrower, the evidence shows that the amount paid by the defendant would have satisfied the principal and interest thereof. But the defendant's note promised to pay the debt, interest, dues, and premiums under a building and loan contract, the scheme of which was considered in Kirkin against this same association, 107 Ga. 313, 33 S. E. 83, and where a contract substantially like the one here involved was held not to be usurious. That question, however, is really not in the case, because the defendant filed no formal plea of usury. Hawkins v. Americus B. & L. A., 96 Ga. 209, 22 S. E. 711; Pattison v. Albany B. & L. A., 63 Ga. 377; Tillman v. Morton, 65 Ga. 386. The payments claimed by him were allowed. He objected to the method of proving the charter, and, had there been a plea of usury, the question would have been important in testing the corporate powers. But he dealt with the association as a corporation, and was estopped from denying its corporate existence. Civ. Code 1895, § 1862. The contract, being one within the scheme of a building and loan association proper, was authorized by the general statute of Tennessee under the laws of which the Atlas Association was chartered. This statute was introduced in evidence. We find nothing in that statute, or in any decision from the courts of Tennessee produced to us, requiring anything more than competitive bids for the sale of the money by the association to the members. Indeed, we find a recent ruling that a written bid is sufficient under the statute. Hughes v. Farmers' Ass'n (Tenn. Ch.) 46 S. W. 362. The testimony is that the money was cried at open meeting; that the defendant, through another, presented his written bid, which was accepted. The rulings complained of as to the admission of testimony could in no way work a reversal, since such evidence was not essential to plaintiff's case. It made out a prima facie case on introducing the note. The burden was then cast upon the defendant. This he failed to carry. If the evidence objected to had been excluded, it would have still left this burden on the defendant. The case may be a hard one for him, but it arises from the form of the contract he made, and his agreement to pay a high premium to an association of which he was a member. These premiums, in local associations conducted at small expense, the member got back in the shape of dividends. And, where the scheme is the same, the member is theoretically supposed to get the same dividend on stock held by him in the larger, but more expensively conducted, associations. The fact that this theory is rarely realized in practice in and of itself alone furnishes the courts no authority to relieve against the hard bargain.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

RAMEY et al. v. O'BYRNE et al.

APPEAL — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—AMENDMENT—DEMURRER TO PETITION.

1. Where a suit was brought by certain persons as receivers of the Southern Mutual Building & Loan Association, and, in a bill of exceptions sued out by the defendant, the plaintiffs are described as receivers of the Southern Mutual Loan Association, the error in description may be corrected from the record by amendment in the Supreme Court.

2. Where a writ of error is sued out by one party who is entitled to except, an amendment may be made in the Supreme Court, adding as plaintiffs in error the names of all other persons who were co-parties with the plaintiff in error in the court below, and who may appear from the record to be proper or necessary parties plaintiff in error.

3. A judgment overruling a demurrer to a petition is proper matter for direct exception, as a ruling which would have been final "if it had been rendered as claimed" by the defendant.

4. The statutory action in this state for the recovery of real property is a mixed action; being partly an action ex delicto, but mainly to recover possession of the land. It is in no sense an action ex contractu.

5. It follows that it is not permissible for the grantee in a security deed to join in the same action a suit against the widow of the deceased grantor to recover the land described in the deed, and a suit against the administrator of the grantor's estate to recover a judgment on the debt secured by the deed.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Wm. Henry, Judge.

Action by M. A. O'Byrne and others, receivers, against Mrs. Wm. Ramey and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

This was an action instituted by J. A. Anderson and M. A. O'Byrne as receivers of the Southern Mutual Building & Loan Association. The petition alleged, in substance, as follows: On November 28, 1894, William Ramey executed to the building and loan association a deed to a described tract of land to secure a loan. Ramey has since died, and E. P. Treadaway has been appointed administrator of his estate. There is now due on the debt of Ramey to the association a named sum. Mrs. William Ramey, widow of William Ramey, has since February 5, 1897, been in possession of the land described in the deed, receiving the rents and profits, and refuses to surrender possession to plaintiffs. Mrs. Ramey and Treadaway, as administrator, refuse to pay the balance of the debt to the association, although the same is past due. The prayers were (1) that writ of possession issue in favor of the plaintiffs to the land described in the deed; (2) that they have judgment against Mrs. Ramey for rents and profits since January 1, 1897; (3) "that, if the equity of the case demands, that they have judgment against E. P. Treadaway, administrator as aforesaid, for their debt, principal and interest, with * * * a special lien against the premises described"; (5) that process issue against Mrs. Ramey and Treadaway, as administrator. Pending the action, Anderson (one of the plaintiffs) died, and Weaver, as co-receiver, was made a party plaintiff in his stead. Mrs. Ramey demurred to the petition on the grounds of misjoinder of parties defendant and misjoinder of causes of action, in that plaintiffs sought to unite in one suit an action ex delicto against Mrs. Ramey, to wit, the recovery of land, and an action ex contractu, to wit, a recovery against the administrator on the debt of his intestate. There were also special demurrers to certain paragraphs of an amendment to the petition. The court struck one of the paragraphs of the amendment, and overruled the other grounds of the demurrers. Mrs. Ramey excepted. Upon the call of the case in this court, the defendants in error moved to dismiss the writ of error (1) because the association of which they were receivers is described in the bill of exceptions as "The Southern Mutual Loan Association of Atlanta, Ga.," and in the petition as "The Southern Mutual Building & Loan Association of Atlanta, Ga."; (2) because E. P. Treadaway, as administrator, is not a party to the bill of exceptions; and (3) because the judgment complained of is not matter for a direct bill of exceptions, but only for exceptions pendente lite in the trial court until a final judgment in the case is rendered. In response to the first and second grounds of the motion to dismiss, counsel for the plaintiffs in error moved to amend the bill of exceptions by the record, to correct the misnomer in the description of the loan association, and to make E. P. Treadaway, as administrator, a party plaintiff in error with Mrs. Ramey.

Max Meyerhardt and Halsted Smith, for plaintiffs in error. Denny & Harris, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. 1. Misnomers in the description of parties to a writ of error are not necessarily fatal. If the variance is not substantial, and it is clear that the party referred to in the bill of exceptions and the record is the same, a dismissal will not result. Palatine Ins. Co. v. Dickenson, 118 Ga. 794, 43 S. E. 52; Fussell v. Dennard, 118 Ga. 270 (4), 45 S. E. 247. It need not be determined whether the variance in the present case is so substantial as to work a dismissal if left uncorrected. While a writ of error cannot be amended so as to strike out the name of one person and substitute that of another, who was the real party in the trial court (Arnold v. Wells, 6 Ga. 380 [3]), a misnomer in the description in the bill of exceptions of one who was a party in the court below may be corrected by amendment. Dupon v. McLaren, 63 Ga. 470; White v. Cook, 73 Ga. 164 (1). See, also, Civ. Code 1895, § 5570. The motion to amend the bill of exceptions so as to correct the description of the loan association of which the plaintiffs were receivers will be granted.

2. It is settled from the earliest history of this court that, where a writ of error is sued out by one entitled to except, an amendment may be made in the Supreme Court for the purpose of adding as coplaintiffs in error all parties in the court below whom the record shows could have united in suing out the writ of error; and this, too, without giving notice to the parties so added. Carey v. Giles, 10 Ga. 1 (7); McNulty v. Pruden, 62 Ga. 185 (1); Sharp v. Findley, 71 Ga. 654 (6); Culver v. Mullally, 94 Ga. 644, 21 S. E. 895 (1); Steele Lumber Co. v. Laurens Lumber Co., 98 Ga. 329, 24 S. E. 755 (1); Western Union Tel. Co. v. Griffith, 111 Ga. 551, 36 S. E. 859 (1); Maccon Nav. Co. v. Schofield, 111 Ga. 881, 36 S. E. 965 (1), and citations. Parties so made may unite with the original plaintiff in error in the assignments of error which he has made, or they may sever and seek to uphold the judgment. Carey v. Giles, supra; Steele Co. v. Laurens Co., supra; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Griffith, supra. A writ of error sued out only by a person not entitled to except is void, and cannot be amended so as to insert as a plaintiff in error the name of a person who would have been entitled to sue out the writ. Swift v. Thomas, 101 Ga. 89, 28 S. E. 618 (2). See, also, Berendt v. McHugh, 121 Ga. —, 48 S. E. 691. The amendment making Treadaway, as administrator, a party plaintiff in error, will be allowed.

3. The third ground of the motion to dismiss the writ of error is obviously without merit. A party may, in this state, except either to a final judgment adverse to him, or to one which would have been final "if it had been rendered as claimed" by him. Civ. Code 1895, § 5526. To the latter class of judgments belongs a ruling overruling a demurrer to a petition. Central R. Co. v. Denison, 83 Ga. 266, 9 S. E. 788 (2). See, also, Savannah Ry. Co. v. Renfro, 115 Ga. 774, 42 S. E. 88 (1), and Long v. State, 118 Ga. 319, 45 S. E. 416 (1), which related to the overruling of a demurrer to an indictment.

4, 5. As we construe the petition, it undertook to set forth two causes of action—one against Mrs. Ramey for the recovery of land of which she was in possession, and another against the administrator of the estate of Ramey for the recovery of a judgment on a debt due by his intestate, with a prayer that the judgment be made a special lien on the land in possession of Mrs. Ramey. The petition, therefore, was subject to the objection that it contained "distinct and separate claims . . . against different persons." Civ. Code 1895, § 4938. The Code also provides that all claims arising ex contractu may be joined in one action, and that all claims arising ex delicto may be so joined. Civ. Code 1895, § 4944. By implication from this section, as well as by express provision of the section first cited, claims belonging to the two different classes cannot be joined.

The writ upon which the action of ejectment was founded was a mere action of trespass, in which damages only were recoverable. Tyler on Ejectment, p. 34; Cumming v. Butler, 6 Ga. 91. Afterwards, under the action of ejectment, the land, as well as damages, could be recovered. Chitty speaks of this action as a mixed action. 1 Chitt. Pl. 125. This court has said that ejectment "is not strictly an action for a tort, but is a mixed action—partly and nominally for a tort, but mainly to try title to land." Lopez v. Downing, 46 Ga. 120. The fact that in this state, since the act of 1834, mesne profits are recoverable, does not change the nature of the action, for mesne profits are in the nature of damages, and other damages may be recovered in the action for trespasses committed while the defendant was in possession. Cunningham v. Morris, 19 Ga. 583, 65 Am. Dec. 611; Bizard v. Mining Co., 74 Ga. 523, 58 Am. Rep. 445.

Our statutory action for the recovery of real property is the successor of the old action of ejectment, and follows it in many important respects. The difference is mainly in procedure, being a simpler and more direct method of accomplishing the same purpose. In it mesne profits may be recovered, as well as such other damages as could have been recovered in the old action. See, in this connection, 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law

(2d Ed.) p. 472. The statutory action, therefore, may also be characterized as a mixed action. It is certainly not, under any view of it, an action ex contractu, and cannot be joined with such an action. We think, therefore, that the court erred in overruling that ground of the demurrer which set up that the petition sought to set forth two separate and distinct causes of action against different persons.

We do not, however, think that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. If a simple action of ejectment had been brought against Mrs. Ramey as the tenant in possession, and the administrator had claimed an interest in the land, he could have been made a party defendant by simply serving him with a copy of the petition, and he would have been bound by the judgment. Civ. Code 1895, § 5001. If this is so, there would seem to be no good reason why he might not have been sued jointly with the tenant in possession in the first instance. On the other hand, if the suit had been simply to recover a judgment against the administrator on the debt due by his intestate, with a special lien on the land, Mrs. Ramey, as the widow and heir at law of the intestate, would not have been a necessary, even if a proper, party defendant. The petition, however, does not join Mrs. Ramey and the administrator as defendants to either cause of action, but undertakes merely to set up a separate and distinct cause of action against each of them alone.

The defendants in error asked that, in the event of a reversal, direction be given that they be allowed to amend so as to relieve the petition of any infirmity that may be therein. As the demurrer was overruled, and the case will not be dismissed until the remittitur is entered and the judgment of this court made the judgment of the trial court, no such direction is necessary, but the plaintiffs are at liberty to amend at any time before a judgment of dismissal is entered. See Cooper v. Brewing Co., 118 Ga. 3, 38 S. E. 347, and citations.

BLUMENTHAL v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—LARCENY.

1. There is a difference between fact and evidence tending to establish a fact.

2. In his charge the judge may define what are the elements going to make up an offense, and instruct the jury that, if they find from the evidence that the facts constituting these elements are established, they may find the defendant guilty.

3. But the trial judge may not go from general to the particular, and so charge in reference to the testimony as to intimate whether the facts constituting the elements of the crime have or have not been established. Civ. Code 1895, § 4334.

4. There was no error in the charge as to how the state was to prove that the defendant knew the goods were stolen, it appearing from the succeeding sentence that the jury were instructed and must have understood that positive and direct evidence of such knowledge need not be adduced, but that it might be inferred from circumstances. Cobb v. State, 76 Ga. 664.

H. Blumenthal was convicted of crime, and brings error. Reversed.

Twiggs & Oliver, for plaintiff in error. W. W. Osborne, Sol. Gen., and E. H. Abrahams, Sol. Gen. pro tem., for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. 1-3. There is a difference between fact and evidence tending to establish a fact, though it may not be possible to lay down any rule by which the line separating the two may be distinguished in determining the power of the judge to refer thereto. It has been held that the judge need not confine himself to the abstract, but may instruct the jury with reference to the concrete. Pennaman v. State, 58 Ga. 336. To that end, and for the purpose of making a helpful charge, he may define what are the constituent elements of the offense named in the indictment, and thereupon instruct the jury that, if they find from the evidence that facts constituting these named elements have been established beyond a reasonable doubt, they may return a verdict of guilty. But section 4334 of the Civil Code of 1895 prohibits the use of any language which even intimates the court's opinion as to what has or has not been proved as to these elements or by them. In the present case, after charging in general terms what were the elements of the offense, and what class of circumstances might be considered, the judge might have told the jury that they could consider the character of the articles pawned, and the sex of the person offering them. But he went from the general to the particular, and charged: "In this case the articles pawned were pants, and the parties pawning them were negro girls. You can consider whether negro girls wear pants. These are some of the circumstances which you should consider in determining the guilty knowledge of the defendants." The very force and pertinence of the intimation requires the grant of a new trial. Moody v. State, 114 Ga. 449, 40 S. E. 242; Rawls v. State, 97 Ga. 187, 22 S. E. 529; Davis v. State, 91 Ga. 167 (2), 17 S. E. 292; Bradley v. State, 121 Ga. 201, 48 S. E. 981. It is very clear that the jury could not have been misled by the charge that the state need not prove that the defendant knew that the goods were stolen. The context and the succeeding sentence showed that the court meant only that positive and direct evidence of such knowledge need not be adduced, but that it might be inferred from the circumstance. The judge then proceeded to enumerate what might be considered by the jury in determining this question. His charge is supported not only by the absolute necessity in such cases, and the utter impossibility of making out a case without relying on circumstantial evidence, but also by the express ruling in Cobb v. State, 76 Ga. 664.

WATKINS et al. v. GILMORE.

WILLS—DEVISE—ASSENT OF EXECUTOR—RIGHTS OF REMAINDERMAN—PAYMENT OF DEBTS.

1. The assent of the executor to a devise of lands perfects the inchoate title of the devisee.

2. Where land is devised to one for life, with remainder over to another, the executor's assent to the devise for life inures to the benefit of the remainderman, and at the termination of the life estate the remainderman may take immediate possession of the property, unless the will shows a different intention.

3. The assent of the executor, "when once given, is, in general, irrevocable, although the assets may prove insufficient to pay the debts."

4. Where, under the executor's assent to a devise for life with remainder over, the remainderman, after the death of the life tenant, becomes entitled to the immediate possession of the land, such land is no longer any part of the estate of the testator, nor subject to be sold to pay debts of such estate; and the ordinary has no power or jurisdiction to order the land sold as part of the estate. In such case, although the ordinary has granted an order of sale, the executor, having no title or right to the land, cannot recover it from the remainderman, or from a third party, whether the latter have good title or not.

Error from Superior Court, Butts County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by J. B. Watkins and others against H. F. Gilmore. Judgment for defendant. and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Y. A. Wright and Jno. R. L. Smith, for plaintiffs in error. Lane & Park and B. P. Bailey, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. In February, 1890, J. B. Watkins and S. J. Hale qualified as the executors of A. M. Watkins. By his will the testator had devised all of his property to his wife for life, and after her death to his children for life, with remainder over in fee to their children; the will providing that, if any child should die without child or children, then his portion should go to the surviving children of the testator and the children of deceased children. The executors assented to the devise to the widow, and at her death assented to the devises to the children, dividing the land, and making each child a deed to his or her part. G. W. Watkins was one of the children, and took possession of a portion of the land under the assent and deed of the executors. He was subsequently adjudged a bankrupt, and his property sold, one of his brothers being the purchaser. This brother sold the land to the defendant in error. The executors, on their application, had in the meantime been discharged. G. W. Watkins died, never having had any child or children, and the executors then applied for reappointment as executors. They were reappointed by the ordinary in July, 1902. They then applied to the ordinary for leave to sell certain lands, including those which had been assigned to G. W. Watkins, and the ordinary granted an order giving such leave in September, 1902. This order of sale recited that the lands reverted to the estate of the testator by the death of G. W. Watkins. The executors then instituted suit against Gilmore, the defendant in error. Upon the trial of the case the above facts were proved, and the trial judge granted a nonsuit. To this the plaintiffs excepted.

1, 2, 3. Under the facts above stated, we think the nonsuit was correct. After the death of the widow, the first life tenant, and the assent of the executors to the devise to the second life tenant, G. W. Watkins, the latter's title to the life estate became perfect. This assent of the executors not only served to perfect the life tenant's inchoate title to the life estate, but inured to the benefit of the remaindermen provided for in the will. The life tenant having left no children, the remainder went to his brothers and sisters who were in life, and to the children of his deceased brothers and sisters. Upon his death these remaindermen were entitled to the immediate possession of the land. The only exception to this rule is as provided, in section 3105 of the Civil Code of 1895, which declares: "The assent of the executor to a legacy to the tenant for life inures to the benefit of the remainder-man. Remainder-men, at the termination of the life estate, may take possession immediately. If, however, the will provides for a sale or other act to be done for the purpose of, or prior to, a division, the executor may recover possession for the purpose of executing the will." In the will now under consideration there is no provision for a sale by the executors, nor is there any hint that any other act shall be done by them for the purpose of or prior to a division of the property. The assent of the executors perfected the inchoate title of the devisees. 2 Woer. Am. L. Adm. *993; Whorton v. Moragne, 62 Ala. 201; Lillard v. Reynolds, 25 N. C. 366; Alexander v. Williams, 2 Hill (S. C.) 522; McMullin v. Brown, 2 Hill's Eq. 457; Lyon v. Vick, 14 Tenn. 42. The assent of the executors perfected the title of both the life tenant and the remaindermen, and at the termination of the life estate the remaindermen were entitled to take immediate possession. This assent, "when once given, is, in general, irrevocable, although the assets may prove insufficient to pay the debts." 2 Woer. Am. L. Adm. *993. By assenting to the devise the executors lost all control and interest in the land. If there were unpaid creditors, they might follow the land into the hands of the devisees, or have their remedy against the executors personally for assenting to the devise before paying the debts. Id. It was argued here by counsel for the plaintiffs in error that the executors should recover because a division was to be made at the death of the life tenant. Doubtless a division was necessary, but the will does not provide that such division shall be made by the executors, but merely that the remaindermen shall take in equal shares. There is no intimation in the will that it is the duty of the executors to make the division among the remaindermen after the death of the life tenants. The remaindermen became tenants in common, and Civ. Code 1895, § 4786, provides for a division of land held in common. Under this section the division may be had without any interference from the executors. On the whole case, to the present point of development, the decision in McGlawn v. Lowe, 74 Ga. 34, is direct and controlling authority. Under the ruling in that case it is clear that the executors cannot recover unless the case is changed by the fact that they had an order from the ordinary granting them leave to sell.

4. Does the ordinary's order to sell change the case? At the time the ordinary granted the order and recited therein that the land had reverted to the estate of the testator, the land had not reverted, and was no part of the estate. The assent of the executors perfected the inchoate title of the devisees, and at the death of G. W. Watkins the remaindermen had the right to take immediate possession. This land was no part of the estate, and the order to sell it was void for want of jurisdiction. Such order, being void, could be attacked anywhere, and at any time. The title to the land having passed out of the estate into the devisees, the executors have no right to recover it as part of the estate. The ordinary's order to sell cannot give the estate any title to the land, nor give the executors any right to recover it when it is no part of the estate. Whorton v. Moragne, 62 Ala. 201. That order may have adjudicated as against the world that it was necessary to sell land of the estate to pay debts or for distribution, but it did not vest in the estate the title to any land which was no part of the estate. After the assent of the executors and the death of the life tenant, the land in controversy was the property of the remaindermen, and the title vested in them as completely, as against the estate and the executors, as though it had never formed any part of the estate. The order to sell the land as part of the estate could not change the title, nor give the executors the right to recover land which was not part of the estate, nor subject to sale by the executors to pay debts or for distribution. Whether the defendant had title was immaterial. The evidence of the plaintiffs showed an outstanding title in the remaindermen, and the grant of the nonsuit was proper.

WHITLEY v. JAMES et al.

REAL ESTATE AGENT—SALE—AUTHORITY—RATIFICATION—KNOWLEDGE OF FACTS—ACQUIESCENCE.

1. Where a purchaser is charged with notice that an agent is only authorized to sell for cash, a sale on credit may be treated as void by the principal.

2. A conveyance by an agent authorized to sell, if made to a corporation of which he is president and a stockholder, may likewise be treated as void by the principal.

3. But the agent actually having a power to sell, the sale under such circumstances was not absolutely void, but could be validated by the principal.

4. Ratification will result, by operation of law, from the principal's acquiescence in such sale for an unreasonable length of time after notice of the agent's conduct.

5. If there were special reasons why the principal did not know of such sale, or if there be facts excusing the delay in bringing the suit, the same should be specially averred, in order to prevent the defendant, by demurrer, from taking advantage of the acquiescence implied from the nonaction for long lapse of time.

6. Such acquiescence will be implied where it appears that the purchaser entered under a recorded deed in 1889, and remained in possession until 1903, when the suit was brought for the recovery of the real estate.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; Geo. F. Gober, Judge.

Action by T. R. Whitley against J. S. James and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

This was an equitable petition against the Douglasville Mineral Land & Improvement Company, Georgia Western Cotton Mills, New Century Cotton Mills, and J. S. James, for the recovery of certain land, cancellation, removal of cloud, and for an accounting. The petition alleged that James was the attorney of Gen. Gordon and Gen. Colquitt to sell their interest in land lying in Douglas county, with power to make deeds thereto and receive the money therefor, "but said power did not authorize him to sell for anything except cash." It was alleged that by deed dated January, 1889, and recorded May 27, 1889, a sale was made to the mineral company, of which James was president; that the land passed by successive conveyances to the Georgia Western Cotton Mills and to the New Century Cotton Mills, of each of which James was president; that the New Century Cotton Mills was in possession of the land at the time of the suit; that no payments had ever been made to Gen. Gordon for his interest in the land; and that the several corporations each knew of the agent's want of authority to sell, except for cash. It also appeared that on February 12, 1903, Gen. Gordon executed an instrument by which he transferred to Whitley all of his interest in certain lands in Douglas county, "said lands having been sold or transferred by J. S. James. This quitclaim deed is to convey to T. R. Whitley all my interest arising from any sale of said land in as full and complete a manner as I held the same." The agreement further provided as to the disposition to be made of "all moneys arising from any settlement he [Whitley] may make with J. S. James." There was a somewhat similar agreement from the heirs of Gen. Colquitt, but the plaintiff dismissed his suit in so far as there was any right of action based on this latter transfer or conveyance. The petition contained a detailed statement of the facts and circumstances on which the plaintiff relied, but the foregoing is all that is necessary to a consideration of the controlling points in the case. There were general and special demurrers. The court sustained the same in so far as the petition sought any recovery against the three corporations, with the result that James was left as the sole defendant. He filed no exceptions to the judgment retaining him as a defendant, and the plaintiff, Whitley, excepted to the judgment striking the other three parties.

J. D. Kilpatrick, Felder & Rountree, and B. G. Griggs, for plaintiff in error. Roberts & Hutcheson and J. S. James, for defendants in error.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). 1. The petition alleged that the unauthorized credit sale was made by the agent in 1889, that the deed was recorded in the same year, and that the defendant corporations had been in possession from that date until April, 1903, when the present suit was filed—a period of 14 years. If the original purchaser knew, or was charged with notice, that the agent was exceeding his authority in making a sale on credit instead of for cash, this would put the conveyance where it could be treated as void at the option of the principal. Civ. Code 1895, § 3021. Compare Loveless v. Fowler, 79 Ga. 135, 4 S. E. 103, 11 Am. St. Rep. 407; Lumpkin v. Wilson, 5 Helsk. 555.

2. If, on the other hand, the sale is attacked because the agent of the vendor was also president or agent of the purchaser, the effect of the dual agency would authorize the principal to repudiate the transaction. Civ. Code 1895, § 8010; Red Cypress Lumber Co. v. Perry, 118 Ga. 876, 45 S. E. 674; Moore v. Casey, 116 Ga. 28, 42 S. E. 258; Story on Agency (8th Ed.) § 211.

3. But whether the attack is because of the dual agency, or of a violation of the instructions, the sale was not absolutely void, so as to be incapable of ratification. The agent actually had the power to sell. There was at least an attempted execution of the power, and the principal could waive the violation of instructions or the results of the inconsistent positions. The ratification, whether soon or late, was the equivalent of an original command, and cured any defect in the execution of the power. The ratification must, of course, be with knowledge of the material facts; nor would the principal be required to repudiate the act of his agent immediately upon the discovery that there had been anything which rendered the sale voidable. But if, after knowledge of what the agent had done, the principal made no objection for an unreasonable time, a ratification would result by operation of law. What is a period long enough to bring about such a result would usually be a question for the jury, depending upon the peculiar circumstances of each case. But in proceedings to recover the land and set aside the deed the pleadings of the principal may themselves allege enough to show a ratification results as matter of law. In the analogous case of voidable sales to himself by an administrator, it has been held that failure to repudiate for seven years will raise the presumption that the owner acquiesces in the irregular and voidable sales. Advantage can be taken of such lapse of time by a demurrer. Civ. Code 1895, § 3775; Griffin v. Stephens, 119 Ga. 139, 46 S. E. 66, and citations. If there be a good and sufficient explanation as to why the principal did not know of the transaction, or had been unable to discover it, or if there be an excuse for delay in bringing the suit, these facts would have to be specially averred in order to prevent the defendant from taking advantage of the acquiescence implied by nonaction for a long lapse of time. Whether, therefore, the statute of limitations be treated as a bar to the remedy, or raising a presumption of payment, the demurrer was properly sustained. The purchaser took possession in 1889. This was itself some notice, and, when followed by continued possession under a deed recorded for 14 years, with nothing to explain why the principal did not know, or could not learn by the exercise of ordinary care, of what had been done, the case was within, and not without, the rule. The period was long enough to raise the presumption of acquiescence in the act of the agent. Such acquiescence validated the deed. The validation conveyed the title completely to the purchaser. The claim for purchase money is barred, there being no averment of a written or sealed promise to pay the purchase price. Hays v. Callaway, 58 Ga. 288 (2).

These conclusions make it unnecessary to consider the effect of the recitals in the transfer or conveyance to Whitley. They are strengthened, however, by a consideration of the recital therein as to the "land sold by James." This itself goes far to indicate a ratification of the sale, but with a transfer of the principal's claim for what would be an accounting. But while the question was argued, the record does not present any question as to whether, under Civ. Code 1895, § 3079, this claim could be assigned, for James did not except to the judgment retaining him as a party defendant, and that dismissing the corporations was proper.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

MOORE v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 20, 1904.)

ACTION FOR SERVICES—QUANTUM MERUIT—EVIDENCE—ACTION AGAINST EMPLOYER'S WIDOW—PLEADING.

1. Properly construed, the petition sought a recovery on a quantum meruit for services performed.

2. Where a father employs another to care for and nurse his invalid child until the latter's death, promising to give for the services thus rendered a portion of his (the father's) estate, and the father dies before the son, the person thus employed has a claim, based on a quantum meruit, against the father's estate for the value of the services performed during the father's lifetime.

3. An action of the nature above indicated may be maintained against the father's widow if it appears that there is no administration on the estate, that there are no debts due it except the claim sued on, that the widow is sole heir, that she is in possession of all of the property of the estate, and that she took possession without notice of any existing debt due by the estate.

4. Failure to allege in the petition that the widow took possession of the estate without notice of any existing debt should be taken advantage of by special demurrer, and does not render the petition subject to a general demurrer.

5. It is not permissible to amend a petition setting forth a cause of action of the nature above indicated, by seeking to recover upon an express contract made with the widow after her husband's death to pay a given sum for the services which the plaintiff was employed by the father to perform.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by Mollie Smith against S. E. Moore. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed in part.

Mrs. Smith brought an action against Mrs. Moore (formerly Mrs. Price), alleging, in substance, as follows: The defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,725, besides interest. In 1883 Dr. Price, who was then the husband of the defendant, employed the plaintiff to nurse his and defendant's invalid minor child; agreeing to pay the plaintiff a stated compensation per week for her services. After the plaintiff had remained in Dr. Price's home for one year under the aforesaid agreement, Price contracted with the plaintiff that, if "she would remain with them and take care of the said minor son (Tom) of Price and defendant until his death, petitioner should share his estate equally with said son and the said defendant." The plaintiff faithfully complied with her part of this contract, and took care of the child until 1902, when the child died, "which was then a full performance of her part of said agreement and contract." Dr. Price died in 1897, "and the said defendant, well knowing said contract, ratified the said contract and agreed that it should be carried out," and plaintiff continued to nurse the child, which services were accepted by the defendant. The estate of Dr. Price is worth over $5,000, and the plaintiff is entitled to the sum aforesaid, which the defendant is in possession of and refuses to pay. The plaintiff previously sued out an attachment to enforce the payment of the sum due her, and had the same levied upon described property. Garnishments were also served upon named persons. If for any reason the plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance, she alleges that her services were worth $1,720, and she prays judgment for that sum, to be satisfied by a sale of the property attached, and for a judgment against the garnishees. The defendant demurred to the petition on the ground that it set forth no cause of action against her; the cause of action, if any is set forth, being against the estate of Dr. Price, and no reason is set forth why suit is brought against the defendant. The court allowed the plaintiff, over objection of the defendant that it set forth a new cause of action, to file an amendment to the petition, alleging that there were no debts due by the estate of Price except the one sued on, and no necessity for administration; the only parties interested being the parties to this suit. The amendment further alleged that, after the defendant took possession of the property of the estate, she agreed that, if plaintiff would continue to care for the minor child during his life, she should have half of the property which the defendant had received from her husband's estate. It is alleged that the plaintiff performed the services in question upon the faith of this agreement, and that the defendant has become liable to the plaintiff for the value of one-half of the property of the estate, for which judgment is prayed. The court overruled the demurrer, and the defendant excepted; assigning error upon this judgment and upon the allowance of the amendment.

R. J. & J. McCamy, for plaintiff in error.
W. E. Mann and Shumate & Maddox, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. 1. While the words "his death," occurring in that part of the petition where the second contract with Price is first referred to, are ambiguous, and should, under the rule, be construed most strongly against the plaintiff, still, when the whole petition is considered together, we think it is clear that the plaintiff intended to allege that she was employed by Price to render services to the son during the son's lifetime. The subsequent allegation that when the son died the contract was fully performed seems to make this clear. The cause of action attempted to be set forth in the original petition was not on the contract, but on a quantum meruit for the value of services rendered. The contract was alleged merely as matter of inducement.

2. If, therefore, the suit had been brought against a legal representative of Price's estate, a cause of action would have been set forth, as for a quantum meruit, for services performed during Price's lifetime; it appearing that Price is dead, and that consequently specific performance cannot be had. See Hudson v. Hudson, 87 Ga. 678, 13 S. E. 583, 27 Am. St. Rep. 270; Id., 90 Ga. 581, 16 S. E. 349; Banks v. Howard, 117 Ga. 94, 96, 43 S. E. 438.

3. The Code provides that, upon the death of a husband without lineal descendants, the widow is his sole heir, and that she, upon the payment of his debts, if any, may take possession of his estate without administration. Civ. Code 1895, § 3355 (1). The Code also provides that: "If the estate has been distributed to the heirs at law, without notice of an existing debt, the creditor may compel them to contribute pro rata to the payment of his debt." Civ. Code 1895, § 3422. By implication and analogy from these sections, where a husband dies, and his widow takes possession of his estate, a creditor of the husband might maintain an action on his debt directly against the widow, upon proof that the widow was sole heir and in possession of the estate, that there was no administration on the estate, that his claim was the only debt due by the estate, and that the widow took possession without notice of any existing debt due by the estate. The cases of Johnson v. Champion, 88 Ga. 527, 15 S. E. 15, and McElhaney v. Crawford, 96 Ga. 174, 22 S. E. 895, recognize the creditor's right to bring suit against the widow under such circumstances. See, also, in this connection, Towns v. Mathews, 91 Ga. 546, 17 S. E. 955. The widow is not, in such a case, to be regarded as the "personal representative" of the estate for all purposes, but she is so far its representative as to authorize the creditor to sue her under the circumstances above set forth. While the creditor can require administration, the law will not compel him to do so, when he can, by a suit against the widow, have adjudicated the rights of all persons interested in the estate. This rule avoids circuity of action. If an administrator were appointed, it would be necessary for him to recover possession from the widow, and then the creditor must obtain judgment against him. The law favors directness. Here the result is the same, whichever method is adopted. The creditor's claim must at last be satisfied out of property to which the widow would otherwise be entitled, and the law will not require three proceedings—one in the court of ordinary, and two in other courts—where the same result can be accomplished by one. The recovery against the widow should be restricted to services performed during the lifetime of Dr. Price. Of course, the plaintiff might maintain an action against the widow on a contract made by her for the performance of services to the son after the father's death. As we have construed the original petition, there is no effort to recover on such a contract. The allegations and prayers are broad enough to include services rendered after the death of the father, but the petition seeks a recovery against the widow only as the representative of the estate. The fact that the plaintiff may have prayed for the recovery of too large a sum will not result in the dismissal of the petition, but on the trial the recovery should be limited to an amount which would represent the value of services performed in nursing and caring for the child during the lifetime of his father.

4. If the widow have notice of an existing debt of her husband's, she cannot take possession of his estate, and, if she does so, she is a wrongdoer. Under such circumstances she might be sued as executrix in her own wrong for thus dealing with personality, but in no other way could an action be maintained against her as the legal representative of the estate. The petition should, therefore, have alleged that the widow did not have notice of the debt sued on when she took possession of the property of the estate. There is no such allegation in the petition. Nor does it allege that the widow did have such notice. It is necessarily to be inferred from the allegations that the widow knew of the contract between Dr. Price and the plaintiff, and of the rendition of the services by her. But it does not appear from the petition that when the widow took possession she knew that the plaintiff had an unsatisfied claim against the husband, which was "an existing debt" against his estate. The plaintiff should have alleged distinctly that the widow did not know this, but the failure to do so did not render the petition subject to general demurrer, but only to a special objection, which was not made.

5. So much of the amendment as sought to complete the cause of action outlined in the petition by showing that there were no other debts and no necessity for administration, and that the widow was in possession, was properly allowed. But that portion of the amendment which sought to set up the contract with the defendant, made after her husband's death, ought to have been rejected. It was clearly open to the objection made to it, that it set forth a new cause of action; and it was subject to the further objection that it sought to recover against the defendant as an individual, whereas in the original petition she was sued as the representative of the estate. Such an amendment as the one sought to be made was not allowable even in an attachment case. Direction will be given that so much of the amendment as related to the contract made with the defendant be stricken.

Judgment affirmed in part, and in part reversed, with direction. All the Justices concur.

McWHORTER v. CHENEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1904.)

HOMESTEAD—INVASION OF RIGHTS—ACTION TO MAINTAIN—LIMITATIONS.

1. The wife of a head of a family may prosecute any appropriate remedy to prevent interference with her homestead interest.

2. Being under no legal disability to institute and maintain an action for the invasion of her homestead rights, she must assert her cause of action within the period of limitation.

3. Plaintiff's right to sue existed from the beginning of the alleged fraud, as she does not disclaim knowledge of the fraud, and the reasonable deduction from her petition is that she had contemporaneous knowledge of the various acts alleged to be fraudulent. A delay to sue for 18 years renders her demand stale.

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Suit by S. H. Cheney against W. P. McWhorter. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

An equitable proceeding was brought by Mrs. Sarah H. Cheney against W. P. McWhorter. In her petition the plaintiff set forth the following statement of facts: On September 25, 1869, her husband, E. R. Cheney, had set apart to him, as the head of a family, a homestead in a certain (described) tract of land in Greene county for the benefit of his family, consisting of petitioner and several minor children. He died on March 21, 1902, leaving her the sole beneficiary of the homestead, his youngest child having attained his majority on September 13, 1896. About the year 1881, E. R. Cheney desiring to run an account with the defendant, and the latter being unwilling to credit him without security, an arrangement was made between them whereby Cheney brought a petition for leave to sell the homestead property for the ostensible purpose of reinvesting the proceeds in lands in Jackson county, and in pursuance of an order obtained from the court granting leave to sell executed and delivered to McWhorter a deed conveying to him the homestead premises for a recited consideration of $1,000. By this arrangement Cheney obtained credit at the store of McWhorter, and became indebted to him from year to year until 1884. McWhorter having then declined to make further advances, a supplemental petition was filed by Cheney, asking the leave of the court to reinvest the proceeds of the alleged sale to McWhorter in certain lands in Oglethorpe county. After the prayer of this supplemental petition had been granted by an order of the court, petitioner "joined with her said husband in a deed to said land of date November 28, 1884, which deed" was duly recorded, conveying "the premises aforesaid to W. P. McWhorter for a consideration therein recited of twenty-five hundred dollars." In point of fact, "McWhorter parted with only $366.68 in actual cash at the time said second deed was made, and the remainder of the consideration stated therein was a settlement of the open account and other debts which had been made by her said husband to said McWhorter," including certain security debts which her husband had assumed; among them a debt of some $600, which had been charged against him in settlement of an open account due McWhorter by J. S. Cheney, an adult son of petitioner and E. R. Cheney. The deed first above referred to "was made in execution of a plan devised or participated in by the defendant, W. P. McWhorter, having for its object the obtaining by him of homestead property as security for debts then in existence and thereafter to be contracted, and not for the purpose of bona fide purchasing said property"; and the "deed and conveyance of date November 28, 1884, was made to said McWhorter in settlement of debts or obligations due at the time to him by said E. R. Cheney, and said deed was not made in good faith for the purpose of conveying to him homestead property for the purpose of reinvesting the proceeds thereof." The petition of plaintiff's husband for leave to sell and reinvest was filed with the full knowledge of McWhorter, "in compliance with an agreement which had already been entered into between [them], whereby said McWhorter was to make advances to said Cheney, and take the deed to the land as security," and the petition presented to the court "deliberately and intentionally misrepresented the truth of the transaction." Both of the orders obtained from the court, as well as the deeds made in pursuance thereof, "were in execution of a scheme and device entered into for the purpose of deliberately setting aside and undoing the homestead which had been granted for the benefit of petitioner and her minor children, and for the evasion and setting aside of the rights guaranteed to petitioner in said homestead by the laws and Constitution of this state." The defendant "having participated in said scheme, the same is a fraud; the deeds made to him in pursuance thereof are fraudulent, null and void, and he has no shadow or right of title to said property, or the possession thereof, as against the homestead rights of petitioner." The defendant went into possession of the property in the year 1886; has since enjoyed the rents and profits thereof, of the yearly value of $300, and is liable to account therefor. No part of the $366.68 paid in cash by McWhorter to plaintiff's husband was in fact reinvested by the latter in other property, and petitioner has received no benefit from the payment of that amount, but has been deprived of her entire interest in the homestead property and its income. The prayers of the petition were (1) that the deeds made to McWhorter be canceled as fraudulent, and of no effect; (2) that the collusive sale of the homestead premises be declared void for fraud; (3) that plaintiff be granted a decree providing for her occupancy and enjoyment of the homestead premises for the remainder of her natural life; (4) that she have judgment for mesne profits for the time defendant had been in possession of the premises; and (5) that she be granted such other relief as the facts entitled her to receive. The defendant filed a demurrer to the petition. The plaintiff was then allowed to amend, over the defendant's objection, by setting up the following additional facts: The defendant was a merchant at the time the transactions mentioned in plaintiff's petition took place, and he kept correct and complete books. These books, which are still in his possession, and which were recently examined, with his consent, by petitioner's attorney, will disclose the "truth of petitioner's case." W. R. Wilson, the guardian ad litem appointed by the court when the homestead order to sell was granted, is in life. "Said McWhorter therefore has in his possession every fact and all the evidence he needs, and the ascertainment of the truth will not be more difficult because of delay, and he is not hurt because suit was not instituted sooner." During the life of plaintiff's husband he "refused to bring this suit, and when petitioner's sons attempted to bring it for her he objected thereto, and prevented the same." The defendant has always realized that his claim to the land is "defective"; has never repaired or improved the property, though fully able to do so, "because he anticipated this suit"; and as the minor children of petitioner and her husband arrived at age the defendant "endeavored to obtain deeds from them to their interests in this land, thereby indicating knowledge that he had no valid title thereto." After the allowance of this amendment, the defendant renewed his demurrer, but the court overruled the same. Exception is taken both to the allowance of the amendment and to the judgment overruling the demurrer to the petition as amended. The demurrer was based upon the general ground that the petition was without equity, and also upon a number of special grounds, one of which presented the objection that "the petition shows such laches in the petitioner as that she should not be relieved."

Saml. H. Sibley, for plaintiff in error.
James Davidson and James B. & Noll P. Park, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). The first proposition to be determined in solving the rights of the plaintiff is whether the widow of the head of a family, who is the sole beneficiary under a homestead, is affected by the ordinary rules of limitation as applied to the recovery of her interest in the homestead property. It would seem that, if the wife of the head of a family could assert her rights under the homestead by filing a claim in her own name (Connally v. Hardwick, 61 Ga. 501), she could prosecute any other appropriate remedy to prevent interference with her homestead interest (Eve v. Cross, 76 Ga. 693). Certainly, upon the refusal of the head of the family to sue, she could maintain an action for any deprivation of benefit to which she might be entitled under the homestead. Pritchett v. Davis, 101 Ga. 236, 28 S. E. 666, 65 Am. St. Rep. 298. The general rule is that limitation runs against all persons who are not under disability to sue. The wife or widow of the head of the family, being under no legal disability to institute and maintain an action for an invasion of her homestead rights, must assert her rights within the period of limitation. The plaintiff's cause of action accrued upon the fraudulent sale of the homestead, and her right to sue began as soon as she knew of the fraud, or by reasonable diligence could have known of it. She waited 18 years after the alleged fraudulent sale before instituting her suit. She insists that, even if the statute of limitations was applicable, her cause of action is not stale, because the defendant's possession of the land originated in fraud, and that no length of time could ripen such fraudulent possession into a prescriptive title. It is undeniably true that possession originating in fraud can never ripen into prescription; and, if the present suit was to recover the land, the defendant could not plead a fraudulent possession for more than seven years as a bar to a recovery against the true title. The plaintiff does not claim the title to the land, but only a usufruct therein, and her suit is brought to cancel the title of McWhorter as fraudulent, and to recover the mesne profits since he has been in possession, and to procure a decree for the use and occupation of the homestead premises during her life. As her husband joined with petitioner in the deed sought to be canceled, it would seem that his estate ought to be in some way represented in the litigation before his deed is vacated. Until the deed from plaintiff's deceased husband to McWhorter is legally vacated, the title to the reversion is in McWhorter. The deed may have been ineffectual to convey the homestead interest because of the alleged collusive conduct of McWhorter and plaintiff's husband; but it did convey the husband's reversionary interest, the homestead being taken out under the Constitution of 1868. Huntress v. Anderson, 110 Ga. 427, 35 S. E. 671, 78 Am. St. Rep. 105. Assuming, however, that petitioner, who is the sole remaining beneficiary of the homestead, is seeking to cancel the sale to the defendant as a means of recovering her beneficial interest, if the cancellation of such sale is not a condition precedent for her recovery, then she could maintain so much of her action as sought to recover her usufruct interest without formally vacating her husband's deed to the homestead estate; that is to say, if the defendant's title is not a good one—is void as against her—it would not estop her recovery of her right to the possession of the homestead property during her life. Thus construed, her action is to recover her usufruct interest in the homestead (which is the right of possession of the homestead land during her life) and damages for withholding that right since 1886, which are alleged to be the mesne profits of the land, and her action is maintainable without making the personal representative of her deceased husband a party. Pritchett v. Davis, supra.

Petitioner does not allege her ignorance of the fraud at the time of its commission, nor at any subsequent time. From her petition it is clearly inferable that she was cognizant of the fraud from its inception. She signed the deed of 1886, and McWhorter went into possession that year. If there was no reinvestment, she must have known it from the beginning. Besides, she alleges that, as her children would arrive at majority the defendant would attempt to get deeds from them, and that her youngest child arrived of age more than seven years before the bringing of her suit. The only excuse offered for this long delay of 18 years is that "her husband refused to bring the suit, and when petitioner's sons attempted to bring it for her he objected thereto, and prevented the same." This allegation does not amount to a charge of duress on the part of the husband; and, even if it did, McWhorter is not alleged to be responsible therefor. Her right to sue, from all the allegations of the petition, existed from the beginning of the alleged fraud, as she does not disclaim knowledge of the fraud and the reasonable deductions from her pleadings is that she had contemporaneous knowledge of the various acts alleged to be fraudulent.

In another part of this opinion it was pointed out that this was not an action of ejectment; that the title in reversion was not involved, but the suit was for the recovery by the sole beneficiary of a homestead usufruct and damages in the way of mesne profits for interference with her enjoyment of the homestead property. The demurrer does not set up prescription on the part of the defendant, but attacks the case as made by the petition as a stale demand. Now, it is a familiar doctrine that not only do the various limitations apply equally to all courts, but, in addition, courts of equity may interpose an equitable bar whenever, from lapse of time and laches of the complainant, it would be inequitable to allow a party to enforce his legal rights. Civ. Code 1895, § 3775. Eighteen years have elapsed since the alleged fraud was committed. The husband is dead, and the ascertainment of the truth made more difficult. Equity follows the analogy of the law, and even in suits to recover land, when fraud is charged, it has been held that "the period of limitations applicable to an action * * * for the fraud is the same as that which would apply to an action for the land, to wit, seven years from the discovery of the fraud." Cade v. Burton, 35 Ga. 280. "If the defendant has been guilty of a fraud by which the plaintiff has been debarred or deterred from his action, the period of limitations shall run only from the time of the discovery of the fraud." Civ. Code 1895, § 3785. The statute of limitations is a statute of repose. When a person is defrauded, and has knowledge of the fraud, the law expects him to ask redress, if at all, within the period of limitation. If he waits for a longer period, he is bound by his laches. The petition does not charge the defendant with any conduct the effect of which was to debar or deter her from sooner bringing suit. We therefore conclude that the cause of action set out in the plaintiff's petition was a stale demand, and the court should have sustained the demurrer thereto.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. MORRIS.

MASTER AND SERVANT—ASSAULT BY SERVANT.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by T. C. Morris against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. Branham and McHenry & Maddox, for plaintiff in error. Seaborn & Barry Wright, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. The error assigned in the bill of exceptions sued out in this case is that the court below overruled a demurrer to the plaintiff's petition as amended at the trial. The allegations of fact upon which the plaintiff sought to recover were substantially as follows: On October 5, 1902, plaintiff went onto the platform of defendant's freight depot, at the request and invitation of a policeman of the city of Rome, for the purpose of pointing out to the policeman a man in the company's employ whom the policeman desired to arrest for a violation of an ordinance of that city. While standing on the platform, the plaintiff was approached by one J. O. O'Dell, "an employé of defendant in the capacity of trainmaster," who said to him, "I told you not to come around here again, bothering my men," or words of similar import; meaning that he had told plaintiff not to bother the employés of the defendant who were under his direction and control, and implying that plaintiff was at the time bothering an employé who was under his control and direction. After so addressing plaintiff, O'Dell violently assaulted him and threw him off the platform into the street, a distance of four feet, in the presence of many bystanders, and in a place fully exposed to view by the public, and O'Dell at the same time cursed and abused plaintiff. The said "J. C. O'Dell was an employé of defendant in capacity of trainmaster, as aforesaid, whose duty was to exercise a general supervision over all trainmen and operators, and to report all neglect of duty on the part of employés." The assault upon plaintiff was made because he had come there for the purpose of pointing out to the policeman an employé and trainman who was under the control of O'Dell, and "said O'Dell was acting in his capacity as trainmaster, as aforesaid, and not in his individual capacity." The plaintiff was greatly embarrassed and humiliated by the unlawful and violent battery committed upon him, and his feelings were thereby wounded, and he asks for $2,000 damages.

It is unnecessary to set forth the special grounds of the defendant's demurrer, for, in the view we take of the case, the general demurrer to the plaintiff's petition should have been sustained.

The plaintiff did not go upon the premises of the company at its invitation, express or implied, but upon the invitation of a policeman. There is no pretense that the plaintiff had any business to transact with the company. In this respect the case differs very materially from those of Christian v. Ry. Co., 79 Ga. 460, 7 S. E. 216; Columbus & R. Ry. Co. v. Christian, 97 Ga. 56, 25 S. E. 411; and Ga. R. Co. v. Richmond, 98 Ga. 495, 25 S. E. 565. Accordingly the company owed to the plaintiff no affirmative duty of protection against an unprovoked assault by one of its employés, and cannot be held liable in damages for a battery committed by an agent or employé who acted outside of the scope of his authority and upon his individual responsibility. Ga. R. Co. v. Wood, 94 Ga. 124, 21 S. E. 288, 47 Am. St. Rep. 146; Lynch v. R. Co., 113 Ga. 1105, 39 S. E. 411, 54 L. R. A. 810. The plaintiff was a mere intruder, and the company had a right to insist upon his departure. If he persisted in remaining, the company could lawfully use such force as was reasonably necessary to eject him from its premises. Hammond v. Hightower, 82 Ga. 290, 9 S. E. 1101. This right could be exercised by any agent to whom the company had delegated the power to exercise it; the company being responsible, of course, for any abuse of such power by its agent. But it does not appear that O'Dell, the employé who assaulted the plaintiff, was an agent to whom the company had delegated its right to eject intruders from its premises. We are informed by the plaintiff's petition that O'Dell was assuming to act, not in his individual capacity, but in his capacity as trainmaster. His official designation does not warrant the inference that he was placed by the company in charge of its premises, and had either express or implied power to determine who were intruders, and to protect the company's interests by ejecting persons whom he believed came there for the purpose of bothering the employés placed under his control and direction. Therefore that he assumed to act in his official capacity, rather than as an individual, cannot be regarded as sufficient to render the company liable for his actions. The important thing to be considered, and that upon which the right of the plaintiff to recover depends, is whether or not O'Dell acted within the scope of the business for the transaction of which he was employed. As to this all-important matter, the plaintiff simply alleges that the trainmaster's "duty was to exercise a general supervision over all trainmen and operators, and to report all neglect of duty on the part of employés." There is in the petition no hint that O'Dell was held out by the company as an agent authorized to deal in its behalf with the general public in any manner whatsoever, or to perform for it any service save that of exercising a general supervision over a particular branch of its internal affairs. The company had a right to thus limit the field of his usefulness. It was not bound to appoint him its "casual ejector." That it ever, in point of fact, clothed him with authority to take any action with respect to persons coming upon its premises, at or without its invitation, does not appear. The plaintiff's petition is lacking in one of the essential ingredients necessary to a cause of action against the defendant company for the tort complained of, and should have been dismissed on general demurrer.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

RAILROADS—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—INSTRUCTIONS—NEW TRIAL—REVIEW.

1. After instructing the jury that plaintiff and defendant railroad company were bound to exercise the same degree of care to prevent a collision between plaintiff's team and defendant's engine on a public crossing, it was not erroneous for the court to add to such instruction: "But one is not bound to anticipate negligence when the law commands diligence for his protection at the hands of another." The duty of exercising care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence does not arise until such negligence exists, and is either apparent, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent person would have reason to apprehend its existence. Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Ferguson, 39 S. E. 806, 113 Ga. 708, 54 L. R. A. 802.

2. It was not erroneous for the court to refuse to instruct the jury that it is the duty of one who attempts or intends to cross a railroad track to use his powers of hearing and seeing before going on the track. Macon Railway & Light Co. v. Barnes (Ga.) 49 S. E. 282. What an ordinarily prudent man would do under the circumstances is a question for the jury.

3. The requests to charge, in so far as they were sound and pertinent, were fully covered by the instructions given, in which the law applicable to all the issues in the case was accurately and specifically given to the jury.

4. Grounds of a motion for a new trial not approved by the trial judge will not be considered by the Supreme Court.

Action by A. B. Berry and others against W. F. Jordan and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

W. T. Davidson, for plaintiffs in error. W. F. Jenkins & Son and F. Jordan, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. Upon the foreclosure of a mortgage upon personalty an execution for $110.50 was issued, returnable to the county court. The defendant interposed an affidavit of illegality, and the papers were returned to the county court for trial. At the next succeeding quarterly term of the court, which was more than 10 days after the papers had been returned, the case was called, and, there being no appearance for the defendant, the affidavit of illegality was dismissed. The execution was proceeding, when the defendant filed a petition praying for an injunction to restrain a sale of the property. The ground upon which the injunction was sought was that at the time the affidavit of illegality was dismissed the defendant had not been given 10 days' notice of the time and place of the hearing of the illegality. The injunction was refused, and the applicant excepted.

1. The county court, as organized under the act of 1872 (Acts 1871-72, p. 288), was not a court holding its sessions at stated times or terms. Suit was begun by a summons, which not only stated the nature of the plaintiff's demand, but also fixed the "time and place in the county" for the trial; the judge being expressly authorized to hold the court at the courthouse, or any other place in the county. The term of the court was not fixed by law, but it was fixed by a summons in each case. It was therefore necessary, under such a scheme, that when an affidavit of illegality was interposed the time and place of hearing should be fixed by the judge, and the act provided that no illegality should be disposed of until the county judge had given "ten days' notice of the time and place of hearing." The act of 1879 (Acts 1878-79, p. 132) made radical changes in the constitution, jurisdiction, and procedure of the county court. It declared that the court should be held at the courthouse, or where the superior courts are usually held in the county; and that the court should hold its sessions monthly and quarterly, according to the character of the case to be tried. It was provided that when an affidavit of illegality was filed the case arising thereon should not, as against the plaintiff in execution, be forced to trial until he or his attorney shall have had 10 days' notice of such defense being made. The present Code requires the court to be held at the courthouse, unless impracticable from any cause, when the same may be held at some other place in the county site, after the prescribed notice has been given. Civ. Code 1895, § 4181. Under the original scheme, when the law fixed no time or place for the hearing of any case, but both were to be fixed by the judge as each case arose, notice of the time and place of hearing to both parties was necessary. But when the law fixed both the time and place for the hearing of every case that could come before the court, no notice as to either is necessary to be given to a party who is the movant in the case. The law charges him with notice when he files his proceeding, and therefore the only notice necessary under the new law is to the one against whom the proceeding has been brought. Hence the law provides that when an illegality is filed the case shall not be forced to trial until the plaintiff in execution has had 10 days' notice of the defense—not of the time and place of hearing, but of the fact that such defense has been filed. When an illegality has been interposed to the levy of an execution, it is the duty of the officer to return all the papers for trial to the next term of the court from which the execution issued, and the case stands for trial at the first term. Civ. Code 1895, § 4738. The provision of the Act of 1872 in reference to giving 10 days' notice of the time and place of hearing of illegalities appears in the present Code. Civ. Code 1895, § 4206. And the provision of the Act of 1879, which prevents an illegality case from being forced to trial as against the plaintiff in execution, also appears in the Code. Civ. Code 1895, § 4201. It seems that the conflict between the two sections in reference to this matter is no less than the conflict between the two schemes in the different acts. The conflict in the two sections being irreconcilable, and both being derived from legislative acts, the section which is taken from the act of the later date is to be deemed the law, as being the last legislative expression on the subject. Lamar v. Allen, 108 Ga. 165, 33 S. E. 958. Applying this rule, the procedure prescribed in section 4201, which is taken from the Act of 1879, and is entirely consistent with the scheme of that act, is the law to be followed, and the rule laid down in the last sentence of section 4206, which is derived from the Act of 1872, and is wholly inconsistent with the scheme of the later county court act, is no longer of force. There was no error in refusing to grant the injunction prayed for.

HARRIS v. DALY.

CERTIORARI—ANSWER OF JUSTICE—SALE—RESCISSION—ACTION ON NOTE—JUDGMENT.

1. The answer of the justice of the peace, though brief, verified the statements of fact in the petition for certiorari.

2. Rescission involves the obligation to restore the status, unless the subject-matter of the sale is worthless.

3. Regardless of whether the evidence sustained the verdict, a new trial should have been granted. It appears that the defendant was not only relieved of liability on the note sued on, and obtained a judgment for the return of the money previously paid, but was also allowed to retain in her possession the property conveyed by the plaintiff under the rescinded contract.

Error from Superior Court, Catoosa County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by Ella Harris against Martha Daly. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Mrs. Harris sued Mrs. Daly in a justice's court on a note for $15, representing the balance due on the purchase of a Jersey cow which had been sold for $30, with a cash payment of $15. The defendant filed a plea which was equivalent to one of rescission on the ground that the quality, condition, and value of the cow had been misrepresented. There was conflicting evidence as to what representations had been made, and as to what were the condition and value of the cow when received, and whether the defendant had acted promptly, or notified the plaintiff of her election to rescind only after the purchase-money note became due, and there had been a refusal of the demand for payment thereof. In the suit on the note the verdict was adverse to the plaintiff, the jury finding "for the defendant fifteen dollars." Nothing was said as to what should be done with the cow. The plaintiff applied for a writ of certiorari. The petition was divided into numbered paragraphs, the testimony of each witness being included in separate paragraphs. The answer of the justice was extremely brief. After the formal beginning, it proceeds as follows: "Replying specifically to the allegations in said petition respondent says: First. Absolutely true. Second. Substantially correct. Third. The evidence as near as I could state it from memory. Fourth. Evidence as given on trial. Fifth. See nothing to change." At the hearing in the superior court the certiorari was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

W. H. Odell and R. J. & J. McCamy, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Mann, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the facts). In the argument here it was contended that on the authority of Colbert v. State, 118 Ga. 302, 45 S. E. 403, the certiorari was properly overruled. It was insisted that the answer of the justice did not verify the petition, nor was there otherwise any statement of what occurred on the trial. The defendant made no motion to dismiss because the answer was insufficient, though he did traverse the return in so far as it related to the testimony of the witness Orr. On this traverse the justice filed a supplemental answer setting out more in detail the testimony of this witness. The original answer of the justice was brief, but it substantially verified the allegations in the petition. There was no suggestion, as in Colbert v. State, 118 Ga. 302, 45 S. E. 403, that the officer was unable to remember whether it was correct or not. Some of the paragraphs are absolutely verified. The only one which is even subject to criticism is that relating to the evidence referred to in the third paragraph, as to which the justice answered that it contains "the evidence as near as [he] could state it from memory." This was not a statement that he could not recollect the testimony, but, rather, that his memory of what transpired corresponded with that of the defendant. Civ. Code 1895, § 4648. The petition being, therefore, verified, it could not have been overruled for want of a proper answer.

The record presents no question as to the sufficiency of the pleadings, or as to the right of the defendant to rescind. But from the verdict it appears not only that the plaintiff was not allowed to recover on the note, but that the jury found that she should repay the defendant the amount previously received on account of the purchase of the animal. So far as the pleadings and verdict show, the defendant is relieved from liability on the note, gets back the amount paid on account of the purchase, and also retains the animal. There is no suggestion that it was worthless. In any view of the case, a new trial should have been ordered. Rescission involves the necessity of restitution of parties to the condition before the contract was made. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3711, 3712.

MCCORMAN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1904.)

BASTARDY—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—NEW TRIAL—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

1. The demurrer to the indictment was properly overruled.

2. Upon a trial under an indictment charging the accused with the offense of bastardy, evidence that he had previously been tried under an indictment charging him with the seduction of the mother of the bastard child, and found guilty of the offense of fornication, was irrelevant and inadmissible.

3. Where the magistrate who presided at the preliminary hearing of a bastardy proceeding signed entries made on the warrant to the effect that, after evidence heard, the accused was required to give the bastardy bond, in terms of the law, and that, having failed and refused to do so, he was recognized in a given sum to the superior court, such entries were admissible as original evidence on the subsequent trial of the accused under an indictment for bastardy founded upon such bastardy proceedings.

4. The court did not err in instructing the jury that the warrant and the entries thereon were in substantial compliance with the statute in such cases provided.

5. Testimony of a witness that the bastard child resembled the accused was inadmissible. (Candler, J., dissenting.)

6. Testimony of the mother of the child that after she became pregnant she sent word to the accused to come and marry her, as he had agreed to do, and of her father that he carried such message to the accused, was irrelevant and inadmissible.

7. When, in a motion for a new trial, error is assigned upon the exclusion of evidence offered to impeach a witness by proof of contradictory statements previously made, it should appear from the motion itself that the proper foundation for the introduction of such evidence was laid.

Error from City Court of Carrollton; W. C. Hodnett, Judge.

F. E. McCalman was convicted of crime, and brings error. Reversed.

Griffith & Weatherly, for plaintiff in error. S. Holderness, Sol., R. D. Jackson, James Beall, and H. A. Hall, Sol. Gen., for the State.

FISH, P. J. Felix E. McCalman was indicted for the offense of bastardy. The indictment, so far as material here, was as follows: "For that the said Felix E. McCalman on the 23d day of September, 1903, in the county aforesaid, being the father of a bastard child born to S. E. Chance, and upon a lawful warrant sued out in said case in said county before W. B. Chandler, a justice of the peace in and for said county, charging him, the said Felix E. McCalman, with the offense of bastardy, and upon the trial of said warrant before said W. B. Chandler, justice of the peace in said county, and having been required in terms of the law by said W. B. Chandler, justice of the peace aforesaid, to give a bond, with good and sufficient security, in the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, payable to S. J. Brown, ordinary of said county, to be used in the support, maintenance, and education of the child until it arrives at the age of fourteen years, and also the expense of lying in with said child, boarding, nursing, and maintenance while the mother is confined by reason thereof, did fail and refuse, contrary to the laws of said state, the good order, peace, and dignity thereof." Sarah E. Chance, the mother of the child, was the prosecutrix. The indictment was demurred to upon the following grounds: That it alleged no offense against the accused; did not allege when a bastard child was born to the prosecutrix; did not set out the age of the child, nor allege whether it was over or under the age of 14 years on September 23, 1903, or at the time when the indictment was found; did not allege that the accused was the father of a bastard child born to the prosecutrix, nor that the accused was the father of a bastard child at the time the indictment was found; did not allege that the accused was required to give bond in terms of the law, nor what or whose child the accused was required to give bond to support, etc.; did not allege that the child for whose support, etc., the bond was required, was a bastard; did not allege that the accused was required to give bond for the support, etc., "of any certain specified child"; did not allege for whose or what child the bond for lying-in, etc., expenses was required, nor who the mother was that was confined, or was to be confined; and because the indictment alleged that the bond was required for lying-in expenses, though it appeared that the child was already born; and because it alleged "a lawful warrant sued out in said case," without alleging what case [was] referred to." The demurrer was overruled, and the accused excepted pendente lite. The trial resulted in a verdict of guilty. The accused moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted; assigning error upon the overruling of such motion, and also upon his exceptions pendente lite.

1. There was no merit in any of the grounds of the demurrer. We deem it unnecessary to deal specifically with any of these grounds. Suffice it to say that the indictment not only stated the offense charged in the terms and language of the Penal Code, and so plainly that the nature of the offense could be easily understood by the jury, but set out all the averments of fact essential to constitute the offense with sufficient particularity to enable the accused to make his defense.

2. The indictment for bastardy was found at the October term, 1903, of Carroll superior court. It charged that the accused refused to give the bond required by the statute, September 23, 1903, and that he was then the father of the bastard child. It did not allege when the child was begotten. The court, over the objection of the accused, permitted the state to put in evidence an indictment, found at the April term, 1901, of said court, charging the accused with having seduced the prosecutrix on July 22, 1900, with a verdict thereon, rendered in the superior court of the county, finding him guilty of fornication. It does not appear from the record when the verdict was rendered. The objection urged to the admissibility of this evidence was that it was irrelevant and immaterial. The objection was well taken, and the evidence should have been excluded. The verdict that the accused was guilty of the offense of fornication with the prosecutrix fixed no particular time when the offense was committed, as the jury that tried that case might have found the accused guilty of fornication upon evidence showing that he committed the offense with the prosecutrix at any time within the statute of limitations prior to the finding of that indictment. And there was nothing to show that the child referred to in the bastardy proceedings was the result of the fornication for which the accused was found guilty. This being true, such indictment and the verdict thereon could throw no light whatever upon the issues in the bastardy case. In Davis v. State, 58 Ga. 170, it was held: "That the defendant was acquitted on a former trial for fornication and adultery with the mother of the alleged bastard is not a good plea of autrefois acquit to an indictment for bastardy." If in such a case the accused could not put in a verdict of acquittal for the purpose of showing that he had not had sexual intercourse with the mother of the alleged bastard, then, of course, the state should not be allowed to put in a verdict of guilty, under such circumstances, to show that the accused had had sexual intercourse with the mother.

3. The court admitted in evidence, over the objection of the accused, a warrant sworn out by the prosecutrix, charging him with bastardy, together with the entries thereon, signed by the magistrate before whom the preliminary investigation was had. These entries were as follows: "After hearing the evidence in the above-stated case, the said Felix E. McCalman is hereby required to give a bond, with good and sufficient security, in the sum of $750, payable to S. J. Brown, ordinary of said county, to be used in the support, maintenance, and education of the child until it arrives at the age of fourteen years, and also the expense of lying in with said child, boarding, nursing, and maintenance while the mother is confined by reason thereof." "The said Felix E. McCalman refusing and failing to give the security required in the above judgment, as provided by law in such cases, it is hereby ordered that he, the said Felix E. McCalman, give a bond, with security in the sum of $200, for his appearance at the October term, 1903, of Carroll superior court, to answer whatever charges the grand jury of said county may prefer against him for the failure to make said bond or give said security." It appears that several objections were made to the admissibility of this evidence, but the only one referred to in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error is that the entries on the warrant were not the highest and best evidence that the magistrate required the accused to give a bastardy bond, and that he was recognized to the superior court; the contention of counsel being that the judgment on the docket of the magistrate should have been offered in evidence. We presume the other objections made to the admissibility of this evidence were abandoned in view of the rulings made in Parsons v. State, 97 Ga. 73, 24 S. E. 845. We do not think that the objection insisted on here was meritorious. Pen. Code

1895, § 293, provides: "Justices, and notaries public who are ex officio justices of the peace, shall keep separate dockets of all civil and criminal causes disposed of by them, which dockets shall show: (1) The actual disposition of each case. (2) An itemized bill of costs charged or collected, and from whom collected. (3) For what officer and service each item is charged. The justices and notaries public shall lay their dockets before the grand juries of their respective counties on the first day of each term of the superior court, for inspection." It has been several times held that the proper method of proving that a particular judgment was rendered by a justice of the peace in a civil case is the introduction of the justice's docket, with the judgment entered thereon. Scott v. Bedell, 108 Ga. 205, 33 S. E. 903. The proceeding before a justice of the peace, when a warrant has been issued by him against one sworn to be the father of a bastard child, requiring that such person be brought before him, that he may determine, upon an investigation of the matter, whether such person shall be required to give the bond prescribed by the statute in such cases, and to recognize such party to the superior court in the event a bond should be required, and there shall be a failure and refusal to give it, is in the nature of a criminal proceeding. Upon the hearing in such a proceeding, the justice of the peace acts as a court of inquiry. Hyden v. State, 40 Ga. 476. Upon the hearing before a court of inquiry, if the evidence, in the opinion of the officer holding such court, is sufficient to authorize the binding over of the accused to the superior court, it is the duty of such officer to make out a commitment, which shall be delivered to the officer in whose custody the prisoner is placed, to be delivered, with the prisoner, to the jailer; and the memorandum of the commitment shall be entered on the warrant, and the warrant and all other papers in the case shall be forwarded to the clerk of the superior court, or other court having jurisdiction of the crime, to be delivered to the solicitor general. Pen. Code 1895, § 924. The entries made on the warrant in this case, requiring the accused to give the bastardy bond, and, in default thereof, recognizing him to the superior court, were in the nature of a commitment, or at least memoranda of the action of the magistrate in the case, and were made that the solicitor general, when the warrant should be placed in his hands, should have evidence of the action of the magistrate in the proceedings before him. In Parsons v. State, 97 Ga. 73, 24 S. E. 845, an entry on a warrant for bastardy, reciting that the accused had failed to give the bond as required by law, and directing that he be imprisoned in jail, in default of his appearance at the trial court to answer to the charge of bastardy, was treated as a commitment, and it was held that the accused was bound to take notice of and act upon the requirement made of him as recited in such entry.

4. One ground of the motion for a new trial alleges that the court erred in instructing the jury as follows: "The state has introduced in evidence a warrant taken out before W. B. Chandler, justice of the peace, with all the entries thereon. This warrant and the proceedings thereon are substantially in accordance with the statutes in such cases made and provided." The assignment of error on this charge was that it contained an expression of opinion by the court to the jury as to what had been proved in the case. This exception was not meritorious. The court merely instructed the jury that the papers were substantially as the law required.

5. During the argument of counsel for the state, the accused, by his counsel, moved to rule out the testimony of the prosecutrix that the bastard child, of which the accused was alleged to be the father, was just like him, upon the ground that it was irrelevant and inadmissible. The court overruled this motion. A motion to rule out is not too late, if made before the case is finally submitted to the jury. Blount v. Beall, 95 Ga. 182, 22 S. E. 52. In a bastardy case, the testimony of a witness that the child looks like, or resembles in appearance, the person charged to be its father, is not admissible. Eddy v. Gray, 4 Allen (Mass.) 435; Keniston v. Rowe, 16 Me. 38; United States v. Collins, 1 Cranch (U. S.) 592, Fed. Cas. No. 14,835; Jones v. Jones, 45 Md. 144; Shorten v. Judd, 56 Kan. 43 (4), 42 Pac. 837, 54 Am. St. Rep. 587; 2 Enc. of Ev. 253; 5 Cyc. 663. See Hanawalt v. State, 64 Wis. 84, 24 N. W. 489, 54 Am. Rep. 588, where, in a well-considered opinion, the cases on the subject are collected and considered.

6. The prosecutrix testified: "He [the accused] told me that, if I would let him have sexual intercourse with me, that, if he hurt me, to just send him word, and he would come immediately and get me; and I sent him word, and he did not do it." The accused objected to her testifying, "I sent him word, and he did not do it." The father of the prosecutrix was permitted to testify that, when he ascertained that his daughter was pregnant, he carried word to the accused of the fact, and stated to him that she wanted him to come and marry her, as he had agreed to do. The accused objected to this testimony of the prosecutrix and to this testimony of her father upon the ground it was irrelevant and immaterial. We think the objections well taken, and the evidence should have been excluded.

7. Complaint was made in the motion for a new trial of the refusal of the court to admit in evidence specified extracts from the stenographer's report of the testimony of the prosecutrix given upon the trial of the accused for seduction. The purpose for which this evidence was offered was stated to be the impeachment of the prosecutrix, who had testified in the present case. In this connection a witness for the accused testified "that he heard the testimony of the prosecutrix on the trial of the seduction case, and that the report offered was her correct testimony on the trial of said case, and that on the trial of the bastardy case at a former trial, when a mistrial was had, * * * the prosecutrix admitted that said part of said record was her testimony on the trial of the seduction case; that she admitted that she testified on the trial of the seduction case as set out in said record; and that the record prepared by the stenographer was a correct record." The testimony given by the prosecutrix in the trial now under review, which was claimed to be in conflict with what purported to be her testimony set out in the stenographer's report offered in evidence, was set out in the motion for a new trial. It nowhere appeared in the motion, however, that the proper foundation was laid for the impeachment of the prosecutrix in this manner, by reading or submitting to the prosecutrix the extract from the stenographer's report, and then asking her if she did not testify on the trial of the seduction case as set out in such extract. Without such foundation having been laid, the evidence was inadmissible; and for this reason, if for no other, this ground of the motion for a new trial was without merit. Taylor v. Morgan, 61 Ga. 46; Smith v. Page, 72 Ga. 539; Georgia Railroad & Banking Co. v. Smith, 85 Ga. 530, 11 S. E. 859. This court will not search through the brief of evidence contained in the record to ascertain whether or not the proper foundation was laid for the introduction of impeaching evidence. It should appear in the ground of the motion complaining of the exclusion of the evidence offered to impeach the witness.

CANDLER, J. (specially concurring). I concur in the judgment of reversal, but not in all the reasoning by which that conclusion is reached in the opinion delivered by the Presiding Justice. In my opinion, evidence that a bastard child resembles in appearance the person charged to be its father is admissible, where the points of resemblance are pointed out, and should be submitted to the jury for what it is worth. Often it may be of little probative value, but that is a matter for the jury, and not the court. It is a circumstance, and I am at a loss to understand in what respect it differs from any other circumstantial evidence. A man may have strongly marked physical characteristics, and the fact that a child of which he is alleged to be the father has those characteristics may be very high evidence of his guilt of the charge of bastardy. At all events, courts cannot say, as a matter of law. that it proves nothing. A jury has as much right to say whether a red-headed, blue-eyed, hook-nosed baby is the child of a man with those same features as it has to establish the identity of a man charged with murder by means of his physical characteristics. See 1 Gr. Ev. § 14a.

MARTIN v. NICHOLS et al.

SAME v. NICHOLS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1904.)

WRIT OF ERROR—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—LANDLORD'S LIEN—CONTESTING CLAIM—TRIAL—CONTINUANCE.

1. Error was sufficiently assigned in each bill of exceptions. There were two cases disposed of by the superior court, and a bill of exceptions in each case was necessary to review each adverse judgment. The motion to dismiss the bills of exceptions on the grounds of insufficient assignment of error, and that two bills of exceptions had been sued out in one and the same case, is denied.

2. The issue raised by the filing of an affidavit of a contesting creditor to a landlord's lien for supplies, as provided in Civ. Code 1895, § 2816, is triable at the term of court succeeding the filing of the contesting affidavit.

3. It is error to refuse a first continuance when it is shown that the party is ill, and his counsel states in his place that he cannot safely go to trial without the presence of his client. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Proceedings between F. M. Martin and Z. T. Nichols and others and between F. M. Martin and Z. T. Nichols to determine the priorities between an execution and a landlord's lien. From the judgment, Martin in both cases brings error. Reversed.

James B. Conyers, for plaintiff in error. Geo. H. Aubrey and T. C. Milner, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. Three justice's court fi. fas. in favor of F. M. Martin and against Sam Fletcher were on November 5, 1903, levied by A. S. Herrin, a constable, on a quantity of cotton, cotton seed, corn, and fodder which had been grown by the defendant in fi. fa. upon land belonging to Z. T. Nichols. On December 10th Nichols filed with the clerk of the superior court of Bartow county an affidavit to foreclose a landlord's lien for supplies furnished to Fletcher during the year 1903, and on the same day an execution was issued upon this affidavit. The execution was then placed in the hands of Herrin, the constable, with written notice to hold up all funds which might then be or which might thereafter come in his hands by reason of any process against Fletcher. Subsequently, on December 19th, the constable brought to sale the property levied on under the three justice's court fi. fas. above mentioned. On January 11, 1904, the constable was called on by Nichols to pay him, out of the proceeds of the sale, the amount of his demand against Fletcher. The constable declined to do so, and on the following day a rule was issued against him at the instance of Nichols. To this rule the constable answered that he was advised and believed that the three fi. fas. under which he sold the property constituted a lien on the fund in his hands, and he accordingly prayed that Martin, the holder of these fi. fas., be made a party to the proceeding, and be given an opportunity to file his intervention, setting up his claim to the fund. On January 20th the court passed an order, ex parte, reciting that, as it appeared Martin was interested in the fund to be distributed, he was thereby made a party to the proceeding, "with leave to file an intervention in said case before said case [was] heard," and directing that he be served with a copy of the order, unless service should be acknowledged by him. He did acknowledge service on January 25th. On the same day, Martin, under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 2816 (6), as a creditor of Fletcher, filed with the clerk of Bartow superior court a counter affidavit, with a view to resisting the enforcement of the execution which had been issued on the affidavit of Nichols to foreclose the landlord's lien asserted by him against Fletcher, their common debtor. The case made by the filing of this counter affidavit was entered on the issue docket of the July term, 1904, of that court. On the 26th of January, during the regular January term of the court, the proceeding commenced by the money rule against the constable was called for trial. Counsel for Martin made a motion to continue the case on the ground that he was not ready for trial, he being unable to attend court on account of sickness. In support of this motion, proof was made of the illness of Martin, and of his inability to attend court, and his counsel stated in his place as an attorney that he "could not go safely to trial without his client, whom he needed as a client, and might need as a witness also." The court overruled this motion to continue the case. Counsel for Martin then produced and called the court's attention to the counter affidavit hereinabove referred to, and counsel for Nichols thereupon insisted that the court take up the case made by the filing of this counter affidavit, announcing that he wished to demur to the same. Objection was interposed by Martin's counsel, who directed the attention of the court to the fact that the case made by the filing of the counter affidavit was returnable to the July term, 1904, of the court, and who insisted that the court had at the January term no jurisdiction to hear and pass upon that case. The court nevertheless allowed counsel for Nichols to present a demurrer to the counter affidavit, and, after hearing argument thereon, sustained the demurrer and ordered the counter affidavit stricken. After the rendition of this judgment, the case made by the rule against the constable was taken up by the court, and counsel for Martin filed an intervention in which he attacked, on substantially the same grounds set forth in his counter affidavit, the claim of landlord's lien on which the execution in favor of Nichols was based. This intervention was then demurred to by Nichols, and the court sustained his demurrer. Counsel for Nichols introduced in his behalf evidence of the foreclosure of his lien for supplies furnished to Fletcher, and counsel for Martin introduced the three justice's court fi. fas. under which he claimed the fund in court. On this evidence the presiding judge entered up a judgment awarding the fund to Nichols. Two bills of exceptions were sued out by Martin. In one, he excepted to the action of the court in taking up and disposing of the case made by the filing of his counter affidavit in resistance to the foreclosure of Nichols' alleged landlord's lien; in the other, error was assigned upon the overruling of his motion to continue the rule proceeding, as well as upon the various other rulings made against him in that case, and exception was taken to the judgment awarding the fund in controversy to Nichols.

1. In this court, counsel for Nichols moved to dismiss both writs of error, insisting that Martin had sued out two bills of exceptions in one and the same case; that in certifying one the trial judge had necessarily divested himself of all jurisdiction; and that, as it was impossible to tell from an inspection of the two bills of exceptions which of them had first been certified, it did not affirmatively appear that this court had jurisdiction to entertain and pass upon either. There is no merit in this contention. As appears from the foregoing statement of facts, the court below called and disposed of two distinct and separate cases. First, the case made by the rule issued against the constable was taken up, and Martin's counsel made a motion to continue it, which motion was overruled. Then, before proceeding with the trial of this case on its merits, the court suspended the trial thereof long enough to dispose of the demurrer which counsel for Nichols stated he wished to interpose to the counter affidavit filed by Martin, the filing of which inaugurated an altogether different case, to which the constable was not a party, and which was returnable to a subsequent term of the court. After sustaining this demurrer, the court again took up the other case, and rendered final judgment therein. There were two cases, both of which were finally disposed of; and it was necessary that the losing party should, in order to bring under review the various adverse rulings of which he complains, sue out a separate bill of exceptions in each case. As another ground for dismissing the two writs of error, counsel insisted that in neither of the bills of exceptions was there a sufficient assignment of error to the judgment awarding the fund to Nichols. There could not properly be any assignment of error on this judgment in the bill of exceptions, in which complaint is made of the striking of Martin's counter affidavit, for, in the case to which that bill of exceptions refers, no such judgment was rendered. The exception to that judgment made in the other bill of exceptions was that the "court erred in awarding said fund to said landlord's lien fi. fa. in favor of Z. T. Nichols against Sam Fletcher," and that the "court erred in not awarding said fund to the three common law fi. fas. in favor of F. M. Martin against said Sam Fletcher." This certainly was a sufficiently specific assignment of error. Holst v. Burrus, 79 Ga. 111, 4 S. E. 108.

2. When the landlord sued out his special lien for supplies furnished his tenant, the creditor of the tenant had a right to file his affidavit contesting the existence and amount of the lien. Civ. Code 1895, § 2816. Upon the filing of the creditor's affidavit, the landlord's process ceased to be final; it became mesne process, and the lien affidavit and execution and the creditor's affidavit became pleading. The statute declares that the issue thus formed shall be tried as other causes. Civ. Code 1895, § 2816 (6). The issue was not joined until the filing of the creditor's affidavit, which was not done until after the sitting of the court at which the case was tried. The trial by disposing of the case on demurrer to the creditor's affidavit was premature. The case was not triable at the term when the court disposed of the creditor's affidavit on demurrer. The case originated after the session of the court, and was returnable to the succeeding term, and the court was without jurisdiction to hear and determine the issue made by the pleadings before the term to which the case was returnable. Irrespective of the merits of the demurrer or the sufficiency of the creditor's affidavit, the court erred in determining the case at a term prior to the one to which the case was returnable and triable. For this reason, the judgment of the court dismissing the affidavit must be reversed.

3. In the other case, a motion to continue was made because of the illness of Martin, the contesting creditor. The fact of the illness was shown by proof, and counsel stated in his place his inability to go to trial without the presence of his client. No counter showing was made. The court overruled the motion to continue, sustained the demurrer to Martin's intervention, and awarded the fund to the movant. The court erred in refusing to continue the case. Martin had been formally made a party to the rule against the constable to distribute the money. He had a right to file an intervention setting up his claim to the fund at any time prior to the trial. Being a party to the cause, he had all the rights of a party, one of which was to move for a continuance on legal grounds. His motion fulfilled every requirement of the statute (Civ. Code 1895, § 5131). And it was error to overrule the same. It is no reply to say that the intervention filed by the absent party was fatally defective, and should have been stricken on demurrer. If the party had been present, he might have been able to amend by supplying the necessary averments to his intervention. The erroneous overruling of Martin's motion for a continuance rendered all subsequent proceedings in the case nugatory. The case is remanded for another trial.

Judgment in each case reversed. All the Justices concur.

BULLARD BROS. v. BANK OF MADISON.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1904.)

BANKS—POWERS AND DUTIES OF CASHIER—PAYMENT OF DRAFTS.

1. A promise by the cashier of a bank, made without consideration to the drawer of a draft, to pay the same out of funds of a customer on whom the draft is drawn, and who has been credited with the proceeds of negotiable paper which he, as owner, transferred to the bank, is not enforceable against the bank unless the customer assents that the bank shall make such an application of the funds so placed to his credit.

(a) The court fully and fairly covered by its charge every issue raised by the pleadings which the plaintiff had a right to have the jury pass upon, and the verdict in favor of the defendant was warranted, if not demanded, by the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Bullard Bros. against the Bank of Madison. Judgment for defendant, and both parties bring error. Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed, and cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

W. B. Wingfield, F. Jordan & Son, and Q. L. Williford, for Bullard Bros. Foster & Butler, for Bank of Madison.

EVANS, J. During the cotton season of 1896, Bullard Bros., a firm doing business at Machen, Ga., engaged in buying cotton on commission. Under an arrangement made with J. D. Tweedy, a cotton buyer of Madison, Ga., Bullard Bros. shipped cotton to him, receiving a commission of 25 cents per bale. It was customary for that firm to pay for cotton purchased by it with a draft drawn on Tweedy in favor of the seller, and for Tweedy to honor the draft as soon as he received the cotton, or a bill of lading therefor. At the beginning of the season Bullard Bros. took out bills of lading in the name of the firm as consignor, but later adopted the course of having them made out in the name of Tweedy as consignor, as well as consignee. On receiving a bill of lading covering a particular shipment, Tweedy would go to the Bank of Madison, and indorse and surrender to it the bill of lading, afterwards substituting therefor another bill of lading covering a shipment of cotton to one of his customers, which the bank would attach to a draft drawn on such customer for the amount of the purchase price he had agreed to pay. In this way the Bank of Madison, which made advances to Tweedy on the security of the bills of lading indorsed to it, placed itself in a position where it could pay for Tweedy drafts drawn on him by Bullard Bros. and other parties making sales to him. Near the close of the cotton season, Tweedy became involved. The bank declined to make further advances to him, and a number of drafts which had been drawn on him by Bullard Bros., and which the holders had sent to the bank for collection, were either protested for nonpayment, or returned by the bank with the statement that the same could not be collected. Subsequently Bullard Bros. were compelled to settle with the holders of these drafts. The purpose of this suit was to require the bank to refund to Bullard Bros. the amount so expended.

As showing the liability of the bank, the following allegations were made in the plaintiff's petition: The drafts were received by the bank for collection, and were by it presented to Tweedy for payment, who drew and delivered to the bank his check on it for the aggregate amount called for by these drafts. At the time Tweedy had on deposit in the bank a sufficient sum of money to cover his check, and it was accepted by the bank in payment of the drafts. The bank subsequently honored numerous other checks drawn on it by Tweedy; had in its possession the bills of lading covering the cotton in payment of which the drafts were given, having demanded these bills of lading from Tweedy when he gave his check in payment of the drafts; and subsequently, by virtue of Tweedy's transfer to the bank of these bills of lading, came into possession of the cotton, and received the proceeds thereof on a resale to one of his customers, well knowing that the cotton had not been paid for, and that the aforesaid drafts had been drawn against it.

At the trial of the case the plaintiff offered an amendment to the petition, which the court allowed over the objection of the defendant. In this amendment the following additional allegations were made: The change in the mode of shipping cotton to Tweedy, whereby bills of lading were taken out in his name as consignor, instead of in the name of Bullard Bros., was made at the instance of the bank, and upon the faith of its statement that it "was paying for Tweedy's cotton," and could not protect Bullard Bros. unless the cotton was shipped as directed, but could and would protect that firm provided its shipping directions were complied with. Bullard Bros. relied on this promise and undertaking on the part of the bank, and shipped cotton to Tweedy accordingly, looking to the bank to protect the firm in its cotton dealings with Tweedy. In view of this promise and undertaking, the cotton shipped to Tweedy "was quasi trust cotton," and the bank was under legal obligation to pay drafts drawn on him for the purchase price thereof, and could not appropriate the cotton, or the proceeds thereof, to other indebtedness of Tweedy. The legal effect of the bank's undertaking was "to make it, as far as petitioner's cotton was concerned, Tweedy's paymaster or trustee," and the bank was "in good conscience and law obliged to appropriate the money arising from the sale of cotton shipped said Tweedy by" Bullard Bros. to drafts which that firm drew on him for the purchase price, and could not, "without a breach of trust, appropriate it to extrinsic debts due it by said Tweedy." On December 11, 1896, S. H. Bullard, a member of the firm, "came to the city of Madison for the purpose of collecting on bills of lading for something like sixty-one hundred dollars worth of cotton which had been purchased by petitioner and shipped to J. D. Tweedy. * * * Said bills of lading were delivered to H. T. Shaw, cashier of the Bank of Madison, who paid to petitioner thereon the sum of fifty-five hundred dollars, and inquired of S. H. Bullard whether or not said payment was in full for all cotton represented by said bills of lading. * * * S. H. Bullard replied in the negative, stating to said Shaw that there was outstanding against said cotton small drafts amounting to about $125, and for what was known as the 'Deiter cotton'; so that there were then outstanding drafts for something over $200. S. H. Bullard further stated that the draft representing the purchase price of the Deiter cotton "was to be sent to a gentleman in New York, and would not be presented for payment until it could be transmitted to New York, and from there back to Madison"; and Shaw then "accepted said bill of lading, and said it would be all right; that when said draft was presented it would be paid." This draft, which was drawn in favor of one Huntington, was one of those which Bullard Bros. had to pay, as stated in the original petition. During the course of the same conversation Shaw asked Bullard how much more cotton his firm expected to buy for Tweedy, and Bullard replied, "Between seventy-five and one hundred bales, as this was about all there was left at and around Machen." Bullard also mentioned the names of certain parties from whom his firm expected to buy some 50 bales, and told Shaw that the members of his firm "would not come again to Madison to collect on their bills of lading, but would draw on J. D. Tweedy for" the cotton as it was purchased. "Shaw said that was all right. He did not say that he would not pay the drafts as he had been doing; on the contrary, he said, in addition to 'that was all right,' that J. D. Tweedy was getting along nicely; that he (Shaw) had succeeded in keeping him from speculating, and he was making money." For the price of the cotton subsequently purchased and shipped to Tweedy the drafts referred to in the original petition as having been drawn on Tweedy after December 11th, and as having been returned to the holders with notice of dishonor, were given by Bullard Bros. to the parties from whom the cotton was bought, and with whom that firm was thereafter forced to settle. By another amendment to the petition the plaintiff alleged that "Shaw was cashier of the Bank of Madison, and acting within the scope of his authority as such cashier, and had authority to make the statements and enter into the transactions" above set forth.

A trial was had on the merits, the defendant bank having, by its answer, denied all liability to respond to the plaintiff. In view of the evidence submitted pro and con, the court declined to leave to the determination of the jury any issue save as to the liability of the defendant with respect to its dishonor of the Huntington draft, drawn on Tweedy by Bullard Bros. in payment of the Deiter cotton, which the plaintiff claimed the bank had, on December 11th, expressly agreed to pay on presentation. The jury decided this issue in favor of the bank. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, therein complaining of the refusal of the court to submit other issues to the jury, and assigning error upon certain portions of the charge of the court. The motion for a new trial was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted. A cross-bill of exceptions, in which complaint was made of the allowance of the first amendment to the petition, was thereupon sued out by the defendant bank, which also therein assigned error on the overruling of a demurrer it had made to the petition as amended. As we have reached the conclusion that the judgment denying the motion for a new trial should be affirmed, it is unnecessary to further deal with the cross-bill of exceptions.

The record before us discloses the following facts: The president of the bank informed one, if not both, of the members of the firm of Bullard Bros., that the only way in which that firm could protect itself in its dealings with Tweedy was to follow the usual custom of attaching to drafts drawn on him the bills of lading representing the cotton shipped to him. The reply received was to the effect that Bullard Bros. could not adopt this course, as it was necessary for Tweedy to control the cotton and resell it to his customers before actual payment by substituting for the bills of lading sent to him by Bullard Bros. other bills of lading which he could attach to drafts drawn on such customers. At the beginning of the season Bullard Bros. took out bills of lading in the name of the firm as consignor, and sent them direct to Tweedy. The bank declined to advance Tweedy on these bills of lading until he procured the indorsement of Bullard Bros. thereon, indicating that firm's assent to his transfer of the same, and delay was occasioned by the necessity of returning the bills of lading to Bullard Bros. for indorsement. Both Tweedy and the bank urged Bullard Bros. to avoid this delay by having the bills of lading issued in the name of Tweedy as consignor as well as consignee. The bank did assure Bullard Bros. that, if this plan was pursued, the bank would be in a better position to protect the interests of the firm, because it could make advances to Tweedy at once on the bills of lading sent to him, and he would thus be enabled to pay the drafts drawn on him for the cotton as they were presented. But the bank entered into no agreement with Bullard Bros., with or without consideration, whereby the bank was to guaranty the payment of drafts drawn by the firm on Tweedy to pay for cotton shipped to him. Nor was the cotton so shipped in any sense "quasi trust cotton." On the contrary, Bullard Bros. sold to Tweedy on credit, contemplating that he should deal with the bills of lading as his own, and transfer the same to the bank, and trusting to him to raise funds with which to meet the drafts drawn on him. In other words, the bank had the right, under the circumstances, to treat Tweedy as the owner of the cotton, to accept it as security for advances made to him, and to make payment out of the funds deposited to his credit in such manner as and to whomsoever he might direct, irrespective of the source from which such funds were realized. This being the real truth of the matter, as conclusively shown by the evidence, the court certainly did not err in refusing to submit to the jury any of the plaintiff's contentions to the contrary raised by the pleadings. The court also properly declined to call on the jury to determine whether or not, at the time the dishonored drafts were presented to Tweedy for payment, he had on deposit sufficient funds to meet the same, and the bank accepted his check in payment of these drafts. The evidence discloses that the allegations in the plaintiff's petition in this regard had no foundation in fact.

As to whether or not the cashier of the defendant bank really agreed to pay the Huntington draft on presentation, the evidence was conflicting. But, however this may be, it does not appear that at the time the promise was alleged to have been made Bullard Bros. had any ownership of or control over the bills of lading representing the cotton for which that draft was given. The only conclusion warranted by the testimony is that these bills of lading had been surrendered to and belonged to Tweedy at the time the bank advanced money thereon, and that the advance was made to him, and not to Bullard Bros. There was no evidence that he assented to or contemplated payment of the draft out of the proceeds of these particular bills of lading. The court, however, charged the jury, in effect, that, if they believed such an arrangement was made by Bullard with the cashier of the bank, and that Tweedy assented thereto, the bank would be liable for the amount of the Huntington draft if it was returned to the holder with notice of dishonor; but, if the understanding between Tweedy and Bullard was that out of the proceeds of the $6,100 worth of bills of lading, the bank should pay Bullard only the amount of $5,500 received by him, then the difference would belong to Tweedy, and the bank was bound to credit his account with that amount, and to apply it to any purpose Tweedy might thereafter direct. This charge was certainly as favorable to the plaintiff as the plaintiff had any right to demand or expect. The plaintiff failed to sustain the theory on which the petition was evidently based, viz., that the bills of lading belonged to Bullard Bros., and were surrendered to the bank on condition that the Huntington and other outstanding drafts would be paid on presentation out of the proceeds. Unless Bullard Bros. owned or controlled the bills of lading, of (if they belonged to Tweedy) he assented to the payment by the bank of the outstanding drafts, the alleged promise of its cashier to pay them on presentation was wholly without consideration, and in no sense binding on the bank on the doctrine of estoppel, or upon any other theory of liability. The plaintiff's evidence was at fault, not the charge of the court.

GEORGIA IRON & COAL CO. v. ALLISON et al.

EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE—MESNE PROFITS—PLEADING—FRACTIONAL RECOVERY—APPEAL—AFFIRMANCE.

This was an action of ejectment. The plaintiffs relied upon paper title to an undivided four-fifths interest in the land sued for, and upon more than seven years' adverse possession under color of title to the entire tract. They showed a grant of the land from the state to Henry P. Thomas in 1836; devise by will of Henry P. Thomas (who died in 1863) to his wife, Ellen E. Thomas, for life, with remainder to their six children (two of whom died in the lifetime of their mother, one with and the other without issue); conveyance in 1889 by the four surviving children to Ellen E. Thomas of their undivided interests in the land; and a deed by Ellen E. Thomas in 1890 to one of the plaintiffs, by which she sought to convey the entire fee. The evidence as to the continuity of the possession of the plaintiffs, and as to whether one of the tenants, during the period of that possession, held as the agent of the plaintiffs or the defendant, was somewhat conflicting. The defendant relied upon a chain of deeds beginning in 1866, and possession thereunder by their predecessors in title prior to the conveyance to the plaintiffs. The court directed a verdict for the plaintiffs for the entire tract sued for, and left the question of mesne profits to the jury, who found for the plaintiff $250. Held:

1. The evidence demanded a verdict for the plaintiffs for a five-sixths undivided interest in the property; but, the evidence upon which it was sought to establish a claim to a prescriptive title to the remainder not being free from conflict, the jury should have been allowed to pass upon that claim. King v. Sears, 18 S. E. 830, 91 Ga. 589 (7).

2. There was some evidence to support the finding of the jury as to mesne profits.

3. The fact that the plaintiffs are suing for the entire fee does not prevent them from recovering an undivided fractional part. Wolfe v. Baxter, 13 S. E. 18, 86 Ga. 706. And in a case like the present, where there is evidence to sustain the contention of the plaintiffs that they are entitled to the entire fee, it is not necessary that they amend their pleadings in order to recover a fractional interest.

4. As the evidence demanded a finding for the plaintiffs for a five-sixths undivided interest in the land, and as the only effect of sending the case back for a new trial would be to prolong the litigation as to the remaining one-sixth, the judgment will be affirmed, provided the plaintiffs will write off from the verdict directed in their favor a one-sixth undivided interest in the land, and also one-sixth of the amount found by the jury in their favor as mesne profits; otherwise the judgment will be reversed.

NEAL LOAN & BANKING CO. v. CHASTAIN, Treasurer.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1904.)

MANDAMUS TO COUNTY—REMEDY AT LAW—ESTOPPEL—COUNTY WARRANT—FAILURE TO REGISTER—PLEADING.

1. The petition was good as against a general demurrer.

2. Where suit is brought against a county on warrants drawn by the ordinary, and the county demurs on the ground that the plaintiff's remedy, if any, is by mandamus against the county treasurer, and the suit is dismissed on this ground, the treasurer will not be heard, when subsequently made the defendant in a petition for mandamus to require him to pay the warrants, to urge that the plaintiff has a complete remedy at law, other than by mandamus.

3. Failure to register a warrant drawn by the ordinary of a county may subordinate the payment of the warrant to that of others duly registered, but it does not render the warrant void.

4. An order drawn by the ordinary of a county on the treasurer for the payment of a debt due by the county is evidence of an adjudication by the ordinary that the amount stated in the order is due, and the treasurer cannot go behind this judgment, except for fraud or mistake as to the amount of the indebtedness.

5. The orders which it was sought to require the treasurer in the present case to pay designated with sufficient particularity the fund upon which they were drawn.

6. The law will presume that, in the drawing of a county warrant, all the officers concerned therewith have performed their duty, and a petition for mandamus seeking to require the payment of the warrant by the treasurer need not so allege. The contention that such is not the case is matter for answer, and not demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Fannin County; Geo. F. Gober, Judge.

Petition by the Neal Loan & Banking Company against J. D. Chastain for writ of mandamus. From an order denying the writ, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Westmoreland Bros., for plaintiff in error. Thos. A. Brown, O. R. Du Pree, and J. Z. Foster, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. This was a petition for mandamus filed in the superior court of Fannin county by the Neal Loan & Banking Company against Chastain, as treasurer of that county; seeking to compel him to pay certain warrants drawn on him by the ordinary of the county in favor of Golucke, and transferred to the bank. A mandamus nisi was issued on the petition, but on the hearing the application for a mandamus absolute was refused, and the plaintiff excepted.

The petition alleged that on July 7, 1900, Wilson, the then ordinary of Fannin county, made and delivered to Golucke a certain order on the treasurer of the county, "whereby he adjudged that there was due said Golucke, and whereby he directed said treasurer to pay said Golucke, the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, in part payment for the plans and specifications of the new courthouse of said Fannin county; said amount to be paid out of the taxes of said county specially levied for that purpose, and to be collected during the year 1900; said order bearing interest from date at 7 per cent. per annum"; that on August 22, 1900, the ordinary made and delivered to Golucke & Co. another order, "whereby he adjudged that the county of Fannin was indebted to said J. W. Golucke & Co., and whereby he directed the treasurer of said county to pay to said J. W. Golucke & Co., or order, the sum of four hundred and fifty-eight $\frac{40}{100}$ dollars, in full for balance due for plans and specifications for the county courthouse of Fannin county, and directed that the same be paid out of the county funds to be raised by taxes for the year 1900; and said judgment and order provided that the same should bear interest at the rate of eight per cent. from the date thereof until paid." It was alleged that subsequently to the dates on which these orders were issued, and before they became due, they were transferred for value to the plaintiff bank by the payees; that in the latter part of the year 1900, and after the special tax referred to had been collected, petitioner presented the orders to the treasurer of Fannin county for payment, which was refused, and that the treasurer still refuses to pay the orders, although he has in his hands as treasurer, or should have, funds applicable to their payment. It was further alleged that the amounts represented by the two orders constitute a part of the indebtedness of the county incurred in the erection of a new courthouse building at Blue Ridge, in Fannin county, for the payment of the cost of which a special tax was levied by the ordinary as provided by law; that the tax was collected and paid into the county treasury in an amount more than sufficient to pay the judgments; and that the refusal of the treasurer to pay them is contrary to law. The petition set up that the plaintiff had no adequate remedy at law, except by mandamus, and alleged that on April 18, 1903, it filed suit in the city court of Atlanta against J. W. Golucke and the county of Fannin, asking for a judgment on the two orders, and that the suit was dismissed on a special demurrer filed by the defendant county on the ground that the plaintiff's remedy was by petition for mandamus against the treasurer of that county, rather than by suit on the orders. The petition was duly verified, and copies of the orders were attached as exhibits. The treasurer filed no answer, but demurred on the following grounds: (1) The petition sets forth no cause of action. (2) The plaintiff has a complete and adequate remedy at law. (3) The petition does not show that either of the orders which constitute the cause of action has been registered as required by law, or recorded on the minutes of Fannin county, or other records of that county. (4) It does not show that either of the orders is based upon any contract entered into by the ordinary of Fannin county, or any other person in behalf of the county. (5) It does not show that either of the orders is based upon any contract in writing entered on the minutes or other records of the county. (6) Neither one of the orders designates upon what particular fund it is drawn, and out of which payment is to be made. (7) The petition does not show that the issuing of either of the orders was authorized by law. (8) It does not show that any consideration moved from the payee to the county for the issuing of either of the orders. (9) It does not allege any amount in the hands of the defendant applicable to the payment of either of the orders. (10) It does not show that the defendant has now, or has ever had, in his charge, any funds applicable to the orders, or any part of either of them, over and above all other claims having priority as to payment to said orders. (11) It does not allege any amount of money in the hands of the defendant for any purpose. (12) It does not show that any amount of money was collected in Fannin county in the year 1900, or any other year, as taxes. (13) It does not show what per cent. of taxes was levied by the ordinary for the payment of the orders, or either of them, nor does it show that the ordinary issued any order, and entered it upon his minutes, which specified the per cent. of taxes levied for such purpose for the year 1900 or any other year; nor does it show that a copy of the orders was ever advertised by the ordinary for 30 days, or any length of time, in the manner prescribed by law, within the limits of the county; nor does it show that a copy of such an order was furnished the tax collector. (14) It does not show any contract of the ordinary, entered or recorded on his minutes, authorizing the issuing of either of the orders. After hearing argument on the petition and demurrer, the court passed an order, the legal effect of which was to sustain the demurrer and dismiss the petition, and it is to this order that the plaintiff now excepts.

1, 2. The first and second grounds of the demurrer are general in their nature, and a careful reading of the petition satisfies us that they are entirely without merit. In treating them, we will also dispose of most of the grounds which are special in form. As to the first ground, an examination of the petition shows that there is certainly enough alleged to authorize the judge, in the absence of an answer, to enter a judgment requiring the treasurer to pay the orders. It was alleged that these orders were issued in payment for services rendered the county in the preparation of plans and specifications for a new courthouse; that they were issued by the proper authorities of the county; that demand for payment had been made and payment refused; and that mandamus was the only remedy available to the plaintiff. To meet the second general ground, the plaintiff set up the demurrer to its suit in Fulton county filed by the county of Fannin, by means of which the county had procured the dismissal of the suit on the ground that the plaintiff's remedy was by mandamus against the treasurer. It is well settled that one cannot in one court set up matter from which he receives a benefit by an adjudication in his favor, and in a subsequent action repudiate his position taken in the first. In other words, courts of justice will not allow a party to blow hot and cold. He cannot say when sued in one court that the plaintiff's only remedy is by mandamus against the treasurer, and, after obtaining an adjudication in his favor, claim, when mandamus is brought against the treasurer, that that remedy will not lie. It does not make any difference that the suit in the city court of Atlanta was against the county, while the defendant in the present action is the treasurer, for, in a very real sense, and to all intents and purposes, the defendant in each action is the same.

8. It was not necessary for the petition to allege that either of the orders had been registered, nor that they had been recorded on the minutes of the ordinary of Fannin county, or any other public record. These were duties which the law required the ordinary to perform, and it will be presumed, until the contrary is shown, that he performed them. Registry with the treasurer is a requirement of law, which, if not complied with, may cause payment to be deferred to that of other orders duly registered; but the failure to register the orders would certainly not render them void, nor would it be any excuse for their nonpayment if, at the time of their presentation, or at any other time prior to the bringing of the suit, there were any funds in the hands of the treasurer arising from the taxes collected for the purpose of paying for the erection of the courthouse. If no such funds were in his hands at that time, the fact should be set up by answer. It is not matter for demurrer.

4. It was likewise unnecessary for the petition to allege that the orders were based upon any contract entered into between the county authorities and the architect to whom they were made payable, first, because, in the absence of evidence to that effect, the law will not presume that the ordinary violated his duty by issuing an order for payment for services without having contracted for those services; and, second, because the treasurer cannot go behind the judgment of the ordinary directing the payment of the sums set out in the orders, nor set up any want of authority in the ordinary to issue them, unless he can show that they were fraudulent, or that the ordinary made a mistake as to the amount adjudged to be due. Shannon v. Reynolds, 78 Ga. 761, 3 S. E. 653. We think it clearly appears upon the face of the orders that the ordinary acted within his jurisdiction. The orders are evidence of his judgment, and are as conclusive as any other judgment of that court upon matters devolving upon the ordinary of the county. In the case of Coleman v. Neal, 8 Ga. 560 (2), it was held that, "after an order granted by the inferior court on the county treasurer, to pay a creditor of the county so much money, it is not in the power of the treasurer to defend himself for causes existing prior to the granting of the order." See, also, Beall v. State, 9 Ga. 367.

5. The sixth ground of the demurrer raises a question about which we are not so clear. There is no doubt that the second order designates with sufficient certainty the particular fund upon which it is drawn, and out of which payment is directed to be made. The first is not so definite, but we are inclined to hold that it also points out the fund upon which it is drawn. Taking the order and the allegations of the petition together, we are satisfied that there is enough in the two to require an answer to the petition. The petition alleges that the order was drawn on a special fund raised by taxes levied in 1900 for payment for the courthouse of Fannin county. The two orders show that they were drawn to pay for the plans and specifications prepared by the architect for the courthouse. There was but one fund out of which the orders could be paid, and, while the first one was not technically accurate, still we are not prepared to hold that it was void for failing to definitely point out the fund on which it was drawn. If the treasurer did not have in his hands at the time of the presentation of these orders sufficient money to pay them, or if sufficient money had not come into his hands, to the credit of the courthouse fund, at the time of bringing suit, an answer to that effect would have protected him; but this was matter for answer, and not for demurrer.

6. What has been already said applies also to the 7th and 8th grounds of the demurrer. The 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 18th, and 14th grounds are equally without merit. It was not necessary that the petition show the particular amount collected for the payment of charges against the county, growing out of the erection of a new courthouse. It did allege the levy and collection of a special tax for this purpose, and that the treasurer had, or should have had, in his hands, from the collection of that tax, an amount sufficient to pay it. A reading of the petition will show that, as a matter of fact, the 10th paragraph of the demurrer is not true. It was not necessary to allege the specific amount collected. The law will presume that the ordinary levied the tax for the payment of this indebtedness, that he levied such a per cent. as would raise a sufficient amount to discharge the claim, that the tax collector performed his duty and collected the tax, and that the money was paid into his hands. He had no legal right to pay the money out for any other indebtedness than that growing out of the erection of the courthouse, and the law will presume that these several officers performed their duties, unless the contrary is shown. The law also required the ordinary to advertise the levy, and the same presumption as to the performance of this duty will obtain.

We have thus dealt in detail with the numerous grounds of the demurrer, for the reason that the order dismissing the petition and refusing to make the mandamus absolute does not show upon what ground it was based, and it has thus been necessary to treat of every ground that the judge had before him. A great part of the demurrer was composed of matter which could only be properly set up in an answer. As we have shown, so much of it as was properly matter for demurrer was not legally sufficient, and should not have been sustained.

NEWBERRY v. TENANT.

APPEAL—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—DISMISSAL.

1. A statement in a bill of exceptions that "plaintiff excepts to said verdict and judgment as being contrary to law" is not a valid assignment of error, and will not be considered by this court. Rodgers v. Black, 25 S. E. 20, 99 Ga. 142.

2. A direct bill of exceptions to a ruling made pendente lite, which does not assign error upon any final judgment, will not be entertained by this court. Kibben v. Coastwise Dredging Co., 48 S. E. 830, 120 Ga. 899.

3. Accordingly, where the only attempt to assign error upon a final judgment was ineffective for the reason stated in the first headnote above, and every other assignment of error was in the form of a direct exception to a ruling made pendente lite, the writ of error must be dismissed.

MILLEDGEVILLE WATER CO. et al. v. EDWARDS.

WATER COMPANIES—CONTRACTS WITH SUPERINTENDENT—VALIDITY—MUTUALITY.

1. The superintendent of a waterworks company had apparent authority to make contracts generally on behalf of the company with its customers, though in reality his authority was limited by the rules and by-laws of the company to the making of contracts at the regular rates charged for water. These rates were generally known to the public, but the limitation on the authority of the superintendent was not. The plaintiff made a special contract with the company, through the superintendent, knowing that the rate charged him was lower than that usually charged by the company, but not knowing and not being chargeable with knowledge of the superintendent's lack of authority in this respect. Held, that the contract, being within the apparent authority of the superintendent, which the company held him out to the world as possessing, was binding on the company.

2. A contract by the terms of which a waterworks company agrees to furnish water to a consumer at a greatly reduced rate—the consumer agreeing on his part to lay his own pipe and put in his own fixtures, at an expense of several hundred dollars, and to allow the company to tap his pipe for the purpose of supplying other customers with water—is not void for lack of mutuality, even though the consumer be under no obligation to take the water for any given length of time. Especially is such a contract binding on the company when it is executed on the part of the consumer.

Error from Superior Court, Baldwin County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by J. M. Edwards against the Milledgeville Water Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

See 42 S. E. 417.

Hines & Vinson and Hall & Wimberly, for plaintiffs in error. Allen & Pottle, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. Edwards conducted a dairy and truck farm about two miles from the center of the city of Milledgeville. The Milledgeville Water Company, a corporation, supplied water, for a consideration, to that city and its residents. Wilson, since deceased, was superintendent of the Milledgeville Water Company. Edwards' residence was more than a mile from the nearest main of the water company. Edwards claims that in the year 1897 Wilson solicited him as a customer of the water company; that he realized the great advantage to him of an unlimited supply of water, especially in the operation of his dairy, but was not willing to subscribe to the regular rates charged by the company; and that finally, at the urgent solicitation of Wilson, he entered into an oral agreement with the water company, through Wilson, as its agent, by the terms of which he was, at his own expense, to lay pipes from his residence to the nearest main of the company, make the necessary connections, and supply his own plugs, faucets, and other materials, while the water company agreed, on its part, to furnish him water during the term of its contract with the city of Milledgeville at a rental of $12.50 per annum. He alleges that he fulfilled his part of the contract, by laying the pipes and making the connections as agreed, at an expense to him of several hundred dollars; that recently the water company has served notice upon him that it will no longer furnish him with water at the rate stipulated by his contract, but will exact of him a much higher rate, in default of the payment of which it will cut off his supply of water; and that to deprive him of his water supply would greatly injure his business, while the exaction of a higher rate would be in violation of the contract into which it entered. He alleges that the water company is insolvent and unable to respond in damages, and he prays for an injunction against the water company and Whitaker, its present superintendent, to restrain them from disconnecting his pipes from their water main, and from interfering with his use of the water under the terms of the contract alleged. The water company denies that such a contract was made, or, if sought to be made, that Wilson had any authority to make it. It admits that for several years Edwards has been getting water from it for $12.50 per annum, but claims that this was the regular rental for two faucets, and that, when it ascertained from an inspection of the premises that Edwards was using more than that number of faucets, it immediately notified him that he must pay an additional amount therefor, or suffer his supply to be cut off. It contends that Mrs. Edwards, and not Edwards, owned the premises where the water was supplied, and that the written consent of the owner did not accompany the application for water, as required by its rules, and this is set up in bar of the relief sought. It denies all the material allegations made by Edwards, and insists that an injunction should not be granted. It is now before this court as plaintiff in error in a bill of exceptions to the judgment of the superior court of Baldwin county, which, after a jury trial resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff, enjoined it as prayed.

The motion for a new trial contains 26 grounds, many of which raise practically the same question. We will take up two questions which, in our opinion, constitute the vital issues in the case, viz., whether or not, under the evidence, the jury were authorized to find that Wilson, the superintendent of the water company, had the power to make for it a contract of the nature of the one under consideration; and if, having that power, he made the contract claimed by the plaintiff, whether or not that contract was unilateral and unenforceable for lack of mutuality.

It was not denied that Wilson was a general agent of the defendant company. His duties, as stated by the secretary of that company, were "to collect the rents and make contracts as prescribed in books of rules and regulations, and to look after the operation of the plant." Many, if not most, of the contracts made by the defendant, were in his name and by his authority. It was contended, however, that his authority to contract in the name of the company was limited to the rates, rules, and regulations prescribed by the company, and that he had no power to contract to furnish water at a lower rate than those laid down in the regulations by which he was bound. This contention was amply supported by evidence for the defendant. It does not appear, however, that this restriction of his authority was known to the plaintiff, or that he was in any way chargeable with notice of it. Nor does it appear that the public were on notice as to who fixed the rates to be charged for water. The public were not warned that his powers were limited. On the contrary, the matter seems to have been locked in the corporate bosom—a secret known only to directors and general officers, most of whom resided in the distant state of Pennsylvania. Assuming that the contract was unauthorized, there can be no question as to ratification, for the evidence is all to the effect that, as soon as it was discovered that Edwards was using a greater number of faucets than that for which he was being charged on the books of the company (a fact which was not shown to have been imparted by Wilson to the officers of the company, and which they appear to have discovered only upon an inspection of the plaintiff's premises after the death of Wilson), he was notified without delay that he must pay the regular rate in the future. Aside from the question of ratification, however, if Wilson was held out to the world as an agent with general powers to contract in the name of the defendant, and no notice was given of any restriction on those powers, and, on the faith of his known relations to the company, Edwards entered into a valid contract with the company through his agency, in the fulfillment of which he incurred an expense which he otherwise would not have incurred, the principal would be held to the contract, regardless of the fact that the agent exceeded his authority. It is a well-settled principle of the law of agency that a principal is bound by the acts of his agent within the apparent authority which the principal himself knowingly permits the agent to assume, or which he holds the agent out to the public as possessing. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 989; City Bank v. Kent, 57 Ga. 283; Blaisdell v. Bohr, 77 Ga. 381. As we have already shown, Wilson was the general agent of the water company—held out to the public as one having authority to sign contracts in its behalf. On the other hand, the public were also on notice as to what the regular rates of the company were, and the plaintiff himself knew that he was making a contract for water at a lower rate than that granted the general public. In other words, he made a special contract with a general agent. By a "special contract" we do not mean to say that he knew that he was making a contract outside the authority of the agent, for, if that were true, the discussion would end right there; but he knew that the usual and regular rates were being varied for his benefit. The decision of this branch of the case, then, turns upon the single question whether or not the knowledge of Edwards as to the regular and usual rates charged by the company, and that these rates were being varied for his benefit, was sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the authority of the agent to so vary them. As Wilson was held out to the world as an agent having general powers to contract in behalf of the defendant company, and as he was admitted to have had general supervisory powers over the operation of the plant, we are constrained to answer this question in the negative. The case of Harris v. Central R. Co., 91 Ga. 317, 18 S. E. 159, is not, we think, in conflict with what we now hold. In that case two subordinate agents of a railroad company—one a soliciting agent, and the other a station agent—contracted with the plaintiff to relieve him from the operation of a general rule which was well known to the plaintiff. The limited authority of the agents was obvious, and the plaintiff knew that the rule in question was promulgated by the general authorities of the company. The facts of that case differentiate it easily from the case at bar.

2. On the question whether the alleged contract was void for want of mutuality we have no difficulty. "A consideration is valid if any benefit accrues to him who makes the promise, or any injury to him who receives the promise." Civ. Code 1895, § 3657. According to the plaintiff's testimony, he was put to an expense of between $600 and $700 in laying pipe from his residence to the point of connection with the defendant's main, providing water fixtures, and otherwise carrying out his part of the agreement. Certainly this was an injury that accrued to him. Furthermore, he gave the defendant company the right to tap his line of pipe, thus affording it the opportunity to supply other customers in the vicinity of his residence. With equal certainty, this was a benefit accruing to the water company. There is a broad distinction to be observed between this case and the case of Morrow v. Southern Express Co., 101 Ga. 810, 28 S. E. 998. There it did not appear that the plaintiff was put to any expense whatever in fulfilling his part of the agreement. Here, as we have seen, the case is altogether different. There the plaintiff could be held to nothing under his contract. Here the plaintiff is bound to keep down his pipes so long as the company is willing to furnish him with water at the agreed rate, even though he is not bound to continue taking the water. Indeed, it is extremely doubtful if this question can now be made by the water company, for, when this case was here before, on exceptions to the sustaining of a demurrer to the plaintiff's petition (Edwards v. Milledgeville Water Co., 116 Ga. 201, 42 S. E. 417), it was held that, "for the purpose of obtaining the injunction prayed for, the petition stated the terms, scope, and extent of the contract with sufficient fullness and certainty." The evidence for the plaintiff on the present hearing fully substantiated the allegations of his petition. It having been decided, therefore, when the case was here before, that a valid contract was declared on, and that contract having since been proved as alleged, no question can now be raised as to its lack of mutuality.

The grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, 26 in number, consist in assignments of error upon the admission of evidence, the refusal of the court to charge as requested, and certain extracts from the charge as given. To treat of each of these grounds separately would consume unnecessary time and space, especially as the case has been disposed of on its substantial merits, upon uncontradicted evidence, by what has been said in the foregoing. The charge of the court as to the presumption of authority when the bare fact of agency is shown was undoubtedly erroneous, and, if the case turned upon a disputed issue of fact involving this question, a new trial would necessarily result. But the error in this charge, and whatever error there may have been in other rulings complained of, did not affect the merits of the decision reached, for, as already shown, the essential facts upon which the verdict and judgment were based were undisputed.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

McCUE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 26, 1905.)

GRAND JURORS — DISQUALIFICATION — PLEA IN ABATEMENT — JURORS — COMPETENCY — WITNESSES — IMPEACHMENT — CRIMINAL LAW — INSTRUCTIONS — SPECIAL PROSECUTION — TRIAL — NEWSPAPERS — APPEAL — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — WRIT OF ERROR.

1. That a member of the grand jury was disqualified may be set up by plea in abatement to the indictment, and the issue thus made is to be tried by a jury.

2. That the replication filed by the commonwealth to a plea in abatement setting up facts disqualifying a grand juror concluded with an offer "to verify" instead of "to the country" is immaterial after verdict.

3. The trend of recent decisions is in the direction of limiting, rather than extending, the disqualification of jurors by reason of mere opinion. To have the effect of disqualifying a venireman, his opinion must be substantial, and not a mere impression which will not interfere with his fairness.

4. Section 3351, Code 1904, relating to the method of contradicting an adverse witness called by a party, applies to criminal as well as civil cases.

5. An instruction upon a point covered by other instructions is properly refused.

6. The right of the public prosecutor to have associated with him an attorney to assist in the prosecution is well established, and so long as such attorney keeps within proper bounds he is not open to criticism before the jury.

7. The safer and better practice is to exclude newspapers from jurors in a criminal case, but an accused cannot object to the fact that they were read when he made no protest at the time.

8. A review by an appellate tribunal is no part of "due process of law."

9. It is the practice, and by section 3468 of Code made the duty, of the Court of Appeals to deny a writ of error in a criminal case when of opinion that the judgment is plainly right.

Error to Corporation Court of City of Charlottesville.

One McCue was convicted of murder, and petitions for writ of error. Denied. Petition for rehearing denied.

J. I. Lee, J. Tinsley Coleman, and Walker & Sinclair, for petitioner.

KEITH, P. Petitioner was indicted by a grand jury in the corporation court of the city of Charlottesville on September 19, 1904, for the murder, on the 4th of September preceding, of his wife, Fanny M. McCue. At a subsequent term of the court he was tried upon this indictment, and on the 5th day of November the jury found him guilty of murder in the first degree. The court sentenced him to be hanged, and he thereupon applied to this court for a writ of error, which was refused, the court being of opinion that the judgment complained of was plainly right. At a subsequent day a supplementary petition was filed, asking the court to rehear its judgment refusing the writ of error, and upon the original and supplementary petitions the case is now before us for consideration.

The first assignment of error is to the judgment of the corporation court upon a plea filed by the petitioner, in which he alleges that Lyman, one of the grand jurors finding the indictment, was not a resident of the city of Charlottesville. To this plea the commonwealth, by its attorney, filed a replication. Thereupon the court impaneled a jury, and made up and propounded to it the issue whether or not said Lyman was at the time of finding the indictment a resident of the city of Charlottesville. This issue was found by the jury in the affirmative, and the action of the court in overruling prisoner's motion to set aside the verdict and entering judgment thereon constitutes the petitioner's first assignment of error.

It was decided in Commonwealth v. Cherry, 2 Va. Cas. 20, that by force of the common law, where a bill of indictment is found by a grand jury, one of whom is an alien, or otherwise disqualified by law, the bill or presentment may be avoided by plea. Commonwealth v. Long, 2 Va. Cas. 318.

In Commonwealth v. St. Clair, 1 Grat. 568, it was pleaded in abatement to the indictment that one of the grand jurors was not a freeholder. Upon that plea an issue was made up, tried at the bar of the court by a jury, the issue found for the defendant, and the indictment quashed.

In Day v. Commonwealth, 2 Grat. 563, the prisoner pleaded in abatement that one of the grand jurors was at the time of finding the indictment a surveyor of a highway. To this plea the attorney for the commonwealth replied generally, and thereupon the court decided the issue against the prisoner. The general court was of opinion that the issue so joined was one of fact, and that it should have been submitted to a jury; and for this error the judgment was reversed, and a new trial awarded.

Counsel for petitioner criticize the replication which the court permitted to be filed to the plea in this case upon the ground that it concludes with an offer "to verify," when it should have been "to the country."

We shall not stop to inquire into this nicety of pleading. The injury of which the petitioner complained was that he had been indicted by a grand jury upon which there was a juror incompetent by reason of the fact that he was not a resident of the city of Charlottesville. That issue was submitted to a jury, which heard the evidence, and decided it against him. We cannot permit the grave interests presented in this case to be determined upon a consideration so trivial. It is certain that no right of the prisoner was prejudiced by the ruling of which he complains. The verdict of the jury upon this issue must be considered in this court as upon a demurrer to evidence, and the evidence was, in our judgment, so considered, sufficient to sustain it.

The second assignment of error is as to the qualification of the petit juror J. X. Stockdell, who was challenged by the petitioner.

He was asked if he had formed or expressed an opinion, to which he replied, "I formed an opinion on the newspaper evidence." He was reminded by counsel that in law the prisoner was presumed to be innocent, and he was asked, "In your present state of mind, could you go on that jury, starting out with that presumption of innocence in your mind? A. I could not say that I could, sir, for the reason that I have read this evidence. Naturally there is some impression on my mind, but I cannot say that it is biased or prejudiced. The only thing I have heard is one side as published in the newspapers. I must say that everything I read in the newspapers was one side." After further question and answer, counsel asked the juror this question: "In spite of what you have read and heard, you could go upon this jury and give the prisoner a fair and impartial trial according to the instructions of the court and the evidence as detailed by the witnesses? A. I feel that I am a fair-minded man. Q. But I also understand, Mr. Stockdell, that what you have read of this case has destroyed in your mind the presumption of the prisoner's innocence; that you would not go on the jury presuming him to be innocent. A. I don't know about that. It is a question as to drawing a line between thinking him innocent and knowing him to be guilty, which I don't know."

In answer to other questions the juror stated "that as a fair-minded man I could render a verdict according to the law and the evidence, not biased; I have no prejudice one way or other"; and that as to innocence or guilt he would be governed by the evidence and the instructions of the court.

After numerous questions had been asked and reiterated, the object of which was to ascertain the precise character and strength of the opinion which the juror had formed and expressed, counsel asked him the following question:

"Do you feel at this moment that there is a presumption in your mind that this defendant is an innocent man?"

To which he replied: "I would like to say this: That I feel that I am an honest and unbiased man, and as such that I could enter this jury unprejudiced and unbiased, and give the prisoner a trial according to the law and the evidence. If I did not feel so, I would want to be turned out; but at the same time I feel that I could serve, and am called here to serve, and that it is therefore my duty to serve.

"By the Court: Do you feel that you can go into this trial leaving your mind open to the evidence, free from any previously read accounts in the newspapers, and go through the trial believing him innocent until he is proved guilty? A. Yes, sir."

And thereupon the juror was accepted.

The cases upon this subject are almost without number, and they are not to be reckoned. The trend of recent decisions is in the direction of limiting, rather than extending, the disqualification of jurors by reason of mere opinion. Whatever the mind receives has an effect upon it, passing with almost infinite gradation from a mere impression to a fixed belief. The state strains every nerve to disseminate knowledge. By the diffusion of education it hopes to create a higher citizenship, and to find the means of repressing vice and crime; but if the courts take an extreme position upon this subject, and hold that every opinion shall work a disqualification for service as a juror, the administration of justice will be confided, not to the most intelligent, but to the most ignorant, of our citizens. The courts therefore, while resolute in seeing that every man shall be tried by an impartial jury, inquire into the quality and degree of the opinion, and to that end search the conscience of the juror upon his voir dire, and look into the sources of the information upon which his opinion rests.

No man can read the rigid examination to which this juror was subjected without being impressed with his fairness, with his desire to deal justly by the prisoner, and with his conscientious purpose to discharge his duty as a citizen.

In Moran's Case, 9 Leigh, 651, two jurors were examined upon their voir dire. One stated that he had heard the case spoken of in the town, and rumors in regard to its circumstances, upon which he had expressed no opinion, though he believes those rumors to be true, and, if they should turn out upon the trial to be true, he has a decided opinion in regard to the case; but he feels no prejudice, and is satisfied that he shall be able to decide the case upon the evidence which may be given in, uninfluenced by the rumors he had heard. His opinion was that, if the prisoner had stabbed the deceased under the circumstances which he had heard, he ought to be punished. The other juror stated that he had made up no decided opinion; that he had heard a part of the evidence of one witness, and formed an impression, and, if the balance of the testimony should run that way, that impression would be confirmed; that, so far as the evidence went, he had a decided opinion, if the rest should not run against it; but that he had no prejudice, had not expressed any opinion, and was prepared to decide the case according to the evidence which might be given in, uninfluenced by the portion of evidence he had heard. Both jurors were held to be competent.

In Smith v. Commonwealth, 6 Grat. 696, a juror stated that he had read the evidence as published in the newspapers, and had formed and expressed the opinion, though it was not a decided one, that the prisoner was guilty; that he was satisfied that he could give the prisoner a fair and impartial trial, notwithstanding his impressions, and without being influenced by them, on hearing the evidence adduced at the trial. Another stated that he had formed and expressed a decided opinion, founded on a report of the evidence before the mayor, published in the papers, but not such an opinion as would influence his mind if accepted as a jurymen; that the opinion so formed would naturally be recalled to his memory, but that he would be governed solely by the evidence which might be given in court. Held, that both were competent jurors.

In Clore's Case, 8 Grat. 606, a juror stated that he had not heard any of the evidence, nor had he heard any report of it from those who had heard it, but from the rumor of the neighborhood he had formed an opinion, which at the time he spoke was existing on his mind, and which he should stick to unless the evidence turned out to be different from what rumor had reported it to be; that he had no prejudice nor partiality for or against the prisoner, and believed he could give him a fair and impartial trial according to the evidence that should be given in. Held, that he was a proper juror.

In Jackson's Case, 23 Grat. 919, Judge Moncure, delivering the opinion of the court, goes fully into this subject. He says: "There is no question, perhaps, about which there has been more apparent conflict of decision in this state, or in regard to which it is more difficult to derive from our many cases on the subject any definite rules which will apply to all cases that may arise. The object of the law is to secure to every man who is charged with a criminal offense a trial by an impartial jury. And this rule has been established by the cases, if no other, that if a venireman has formed, and still more if he has formed and expressed, a decided or substantial opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, no matter upon what ground it was formed, whether from having heard the evidence on some former trial or examination or from mere rumor or otherwise, he is an incompetent juror to try the case; and if, on the other hand, his opinion be merely hypothetical, he is not incompetent on that ground. The difficulty is in determining in any given case whether the opinion be decided or substantial or merely hypothetical, there being in almost every case some peculiarity of circumstance. And the desire to remove or lessen this difficulty by laying down certain other rules for our guidance has been the fruitful source of the apparent conflict in many of the cases. Thus, if a venireman has formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused from having heard the evidence on a former trial or examination of the case, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to regard such opinion otherwise than as decided or substantial, within the meaning of the rule; and he would generally, if not always, be considered an incompetent juror, even though he might think and say that he could give the accused an impartial trial. So, on the other hand, if a venireman has formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused from mere rumor, the presumption, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is that such opinion is merely hypothetical, and will be so considered even though he speak of it as a decided or substantial opinion, if he says he has no prejudice against the accused, and thinks he can give him a fair and impartial trial. But if the court be satisfied, either from the venireman's own statements or otherwise, that the opinion is in fact decided or substantial, he will be an incompetent juror. There are intermediate cases which often give rise to difficulty on this subject. The venireman may have formed an opinion from having heard a part only of the evidence on a former trial, or from having heard the whole or part of the evidence given on a former trial, through persons who were present, in whose veracity and accuracy he may have more or less confidence; or from having read an account of such evidence in a newspaper. We cannot lay down any rule for the government of such cases except the general rule before stated; and the court must determine, as best it may, whether the opinion be decided or substantial or merely hypothetical. It would be dangerous to lay down a rule; and no case has ever decided that a venireman who has formed an opinion from accounts received from witnesses out of court, and still less from accounts received from others, as to statements made by witnesses, either in or out of court, is therefore necessarily an incompetent juror, even though he may regard the persons from whom he received his information as persons of general veracity and accuracy, and may credit what he has heard from them. We know that witnesses who make statements out of court of transactions about which they may have testified in court, still more persons who profess to detail what they may have heard in or out of court, often speak carelessly, and generally omitting particulars which may be very material. And we know that those who listen to them often listen carelessly, and, though they almost always form some impression or opinion of the case from what they hear, yet that opinion is not always, and perhaps not often, decided or substantial, in the meaning of the rule aforesaid. The court must determine that question in all such cases in view of all the circumstances."

In the course of his opinion he cites numerous authorities, and quotes with approval the language of Judge Summers in Moran's Case, supra, in which he uses the following language: "Sustaining challenges to jurors for favor on slight grounds tends to place the administration of public justice in the hands of the most ignorant and least discriminating portion of the community, by which the safety of the accused may be endangered, and the proper administration of the laws put to hazard; and we are therefore not disposed to enlarge the grounds of challenge beyond those properly deducible from the cases heretofore decided."

As we have said, the cases are not reconcilable, but we believe those we have cited establish a wise and salutary rule. When to these considerations it is added, as has been frequently reiterated by this court, that great weight is justly due to the opinion of the trial judge, who sees and hears the veniremen, we have no hesitation in rejecting this assignment of error.

These considerations lead to the same conclusion with reference to the juror Wood.

The next exception is as to the competency of the witness Kaufman, who was introduced by the commonwealth to prove that a piece of cloth found in the bathroom on the day following the alleged homicide was a part of the undershirt worn by the prisoner on that occasion.

Kaufman, it appears, is engaged in the clothing business, and is a salesman of and dealer in underwear, but has never manufactured it. Fontaine Eddins, a clerk in a clothing store, was introduced for the same purpose, and both were permitted to testify over the objection of the prisoner.

In this there was no error. It was for the court to say what evidence should be admitted. It was for the jury, before whom the witnesses were subjected to investigation as to their source of knowledge, to determine upon their credibility, and the weight to be given to their testimony.

The eleventh exception is to the admission of a conversation between the prisoner and his son, William McCue, as testified to for the commonwealth by the witness Martin. In this conversation petitioner, according to the witness, said that he (his son) knew that the statement made by Ernest Crawford about petitioner's having drawn a pistol upon his wife was not true; to which petitioner's son replied by affirming that petitioner did draw a pistol upon his wife. This is objected to upon the ground that there is no suggestion or approximation with respect to the time at which the occurrence took place which was the subject of this conversation; that it nowhere appears "whether it was a week, or a month, or a year, or five years, or ten years, before the homicide."

The testimony with respect to the incident in the jail was not introduced as proof of the circumstance narrated. It does not prove or tend to prove, and there was no purpose in its introduction to prove, that the accused at any time threatened his wife with a pistol, and that she sought the protection of her son. Ernest Crawford had testified before the jury that William McCue so stated to him, and Martin's testimony was introduced solely for the purpose of showing that McCue endeavored to induce his son to deny the statement attributed to him by Crawford. If the circumstance to which Crawford referred was inadmissible for remoteness in point of time, or for any other reason, objection to it should have been made when Crawford was upon the stand; but there could be no objection to it when introduced for the purpose indicated.

The precise language of the prisoner on that occasion was as follows: The prisoner said to his son: "You know it is not so about what Ernest Crawford said about my drawing a pistol on your mother." To which the son replied: "You did; and she run in the room and got in the bed with me, and asked me not to let you shoot her."

Nor is the testimony of Martin inadmissible because in effect "an accusation against the prisoner which he then and there controverted and denied." The conversation was brought about by the prisoner, who was apparently seeking to find the means of weakening the force of Crawford's statement, and he said to his son: "You know it is not true that I drew a pistol on your mother." And the denial comes from the son: "You did; and she run in the room and got in the bed with me, and asked me not to let you shoot her."

What was said, with all the attending circumstances, was before the jury, and we are of opinion that there was no error in this ruling of the court.

There are several exceptions to evidence, which seem to us to be immaterial, and to discuss which would unduly protract this opinion. That, for instance, of the witness Covington, who testified that he spoke to petitioner's wife at about 20 minutes before 8 o'clock; that he took off his hat, and bowed to her, but that she did not speak. Of the witness Hurley, who heard the prisoner say that his wife's jealousy diminished his pleasure and enjoyment in life.

The fifteenth exception is to the testimony of Dr. Nelson, who was permitted to testify as to the effects of a blow struck by a sandbag, or other similar instrument.

It hardly requires the learning or experience of a practitioner of medicine to know that if a man was struck by a sandbag a blow sufficient to render him unconscious, there would be at least some slight discoloration or external mark or after-effect consequent upon the blow. This assignment of error is also overruled.

The assignments of error from the sixteenth to thirty-third, inclusive, present a question of much importance in this prosecution.

William McCue, a son of the prisoner, was introduced as a witness by the commonwealth; and, it speedily appearing that he was adverse to the commonwealth and favorable to the prisoner, the commonwealth, alleging that it was surprised, asked and was permitted to introduce evidence to show that the witness had made statements inconsistent with his testimony.

So much of section 3351, Code Va. 1904, as is pertinent to this inquiry, is as follows:

"A party called to testify for another, having an adverse interest, may be examined by such other party according to the rules applicable to cross-examination.

"(1) A party producing a witness shall not be allowed to impeach his credit by general evidence of bad character, but he may, in case the witness shall in the opinion of the court prove adverse, contradict him by other evidence, or, by leave of the court prove that he has made at other times a statement inconsistent with his present testimony, but before said last mentioned proof can be given the circumstances of the supposed statement, sufficient to designate the particular occasion, must be mentioned to the witness, and he must be asked whether or not he has made such statement. In every case the court, if requested by either party, shall instruct the jury not to consider the evidence of such inconsistent statements, except for the purpose of contradicting the witness."

The law just quoted is so comprehensive in its terms that we shall content ourselves with observing that it warrants the action of the court in this case, unless, as the petitioner insists, its operation is to be confined to civil cases. The law of evidence is in general the same in civil and in criminal cases. In each case the object is the same—to place evidence before the jury which will enable it to arrive at a just decision upon the issues. It has long been a subject of investigation before courts, text-writers, and legislatures how far it is permissible for a party to contradict his own witness.

In Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 2, §§ 897 to 908, inclusive, the whole subject is exhaustively discussed, and the views of eminent authorities given.

Lord Ellenborough is quoted as saying in Alexander v. Gibson, 2 Camp. 555: "If a witness is called on the part of the plaintiff who swears what is palpably false, it would be extremely hard if the plaintiff's case should for that reason be sacrificed; but I know of no rule of law by which the truth is on such an occasion to be shut out and justice is to be perverted."

Chief Justice Tindal's remarks in Bradley v. Ricardo, 8 Bing. 58, are cited: "The object of all the laws of evidence is to bring the whole truth of a case before the jury; * * * but, if this contradicting evidence were excluded, that would no longer be the just ground on which the principles of evidence would proceed, but we should compel the plaintiff to take singly all the chances of the tables, and to be bound by the statements of a witness whom he might call without knowing he was adverse, who might labor under a defect of memory, or be otherwise unable to make a statement on which complete reliance might be placed."

The reasoning and authorities range all the way from permission to refresh the memory of an adverse witness by cross-examination to the practice which finds expression in the statute under consideration of proving his inconsistent statements.

In England the subject was referred to a commission composed of eminent jurists, and they reported in favor of the admission of impeaching testimony by proof of contradictory statements. For the admissibility of the proposed evidence it is said that this course "is necessary as a security against the contrivance of an artful witness, who otherwise might recommend himself to the party by the promise of favorable evidence (being really in the interest of the opposite party), and afterwards by hostile evidence ruin his cause; that such a power is necessary for the purpose of placing the witness fairly and completely before the court, and for enabling the jury to ascertain how far he deserves to be believed; that the ends of justice are best attained by allowing the fullest power for scrutinizing and correcting evidence, and that the exclusion of the proof of contrary statements might be attended with the worst consequences. The chief objection to the proposed evidence appears to be that a party, after calling a witness as a witness of credit, ought not to be allowed to discredit him. The objection proceeds upon the supposition that the party first acts on one principle, and afterwards, being disappointed by the witness, turns around and acts upon another, thus imputing to the party something of double-dealing or dishonest practice. But it is evident that this does not apply to the case where a party, having given credit to a witness, is deceived by him, and first discovers the deceit at the trial of the cause. To reject the proposed evidence in such a case and repress the truth would be to allow the witness to deceive both jury and party."

In Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 519, 22 Pac. 818, Judge Elliott said: "The tendency of recent legislation, as well as of modern decisions, has been to relax somewhat the rules of evidence, so as to afford better opportunity for the development of truth. Modern experience has also shown that a party may sometimes be deceived in the character and animus of a witness whom he has called, as well as in the testimony he is expected to give; and he learns, after the witness begins to testify—a very inopportune time—that he has to encounter bitter and unscrupulous opposition where he had expected to receive only fair and honorable treatment. This may be evidenced by reluctance or evasion on the part of the witness in answering questions, or by too great readiness in making or volunteering damaging statements contrary to his previous version of the matter. Under such circumstances * * * in extreme cases, where it is apparent that a witness is giving testimony contrary to the reasonable expectation of the party calling him, such party should be allowed to cross-examine such witness for the purpose of refreshing his recollection, with the view of modifying his testimony or of revealing his animus in the case, * * * and to ask him if he has not theretofore made other or different statements from those he has just given in evidence."

In this whole discussion, as given in Wigmore, the reasoning adduced and the authorities cited apply indifferently to civil and criminal cases; the civil cases being, of course, far the more numerous.

The English statute is given, passed in pursuance of the recommendation of the commission on procedure heretofore referred to: "A party producing a witness shall not be allowed to impeach his credit by general evidence of bad character; but he may, in case the witness shall in the opinion of the judge prove adverse, contradict him by other evidence, or by leave of the judge prove that he has made at other times a statement inconsistent with his present testimony."

"It is easy to imagine," says the author, "the confusion caused by this bungling paragraph; for the showing of an error by ordinary contradiction, provided for in clause is, was already freely permissible without interference by the judge, and whether or not the witness was adverse. * * * As the statute stands, the present class of evidence—self-contradictions—is admissible only by leave of the judge and in case of a witness deemed adverse by the judge. In the United States fortunately only a few jurisdictions have adopted the English statute. But the variety of attitude in the different jurisdictions and the indiscriminate citation of rulings from other courts, together with the indecision of the earlier English precedents, has tended to produce confusion in our law, even within the rulings of the same jurisdiction. The sound and simple remedy would be by statute to abolish all limitation on this kind of evidence; and this step has in some states already been taken."

The English statute quoted was passed in the seventeenth and eighteenth of Victoria. It applied only to civil cases, but by statute of the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth of Victoria it was extended to criminal cases.

In Hickory v. U. S., 151 U. S. 303, 14 Sup. Ct. 334, 34 L. Ed. 170, which was upon an indictment for murder, Chief Justice Fuller says: "When a party is taken by surprise by the evidence of his witness, the latter may be interrogated as to inconsistent statements previously made by him for the purpose of refreshing his recollection and inducing him to correct his testimony; and the party so surprised may also show the facts to be otherwise than as stated, although this incidentally tends to discredit the witness. * * * But proof of contradictory statements of one's own witness, voluntarily called, and not a party, inasmuch as it would not amount to substantive evidence, and could have no effect but to impair the credit of the witness, was generally not admissible at common law.

"By statute in England and in many of the states it has been provided that a party may, in case the witness shall, in the opinion of the judge, prove adverse, by leave of the judge show that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony, and this is allowed for the purpose of counteracting actual hostile testimony with which the party has been surprised."

This citation is of value in two aspects. In the first place it shows what the common law was; it shows the tendency of modern thought upon the subject; and, although made in a case where a man was on trial for his life, rests the statements of law upon adjudications in civil cases.

Under these circumstances the Legislature of Virginia adopted the statute which we are now considering. Its language is broad and general. There is not a suggestion upon its face of the purpose to limit its operation to a particular class of cases. The evils are the same in criminal cases as in civil. It is invoked to-day by the commonwealth. It may be to-morrow the last hope of an innocent man.

Against all this it is urged that the statute is found in the Code under the title of "Proceedings in Civil Cases." Embraced in that title are a number of chapters upon a great variety of subjects, many of which are obviously of a civil nature; others specifically declared to be of that character. In the chapter upon "Evidence," in which section 3351 is found, there are sections which, either from their subject-matter or by their express terms, apply to civil cases. There are other sections which, by their express terms, apply to criminal cases; for example, sections 3346, 3352, and 3352a, the first-mentioned referring to the competency of husband and wife to testify for or against each other in civil and criminal cases. We find, therefore, section 3351 placed in the midst of sections applicable alike by their terms to criminal and civil cases; and the operation of that section not extended upon the one hand, nor limited upon the other, to a particular class of cases, but its application to be determined by other considerations. We cannot think that the mere collocation of this section should override every other consideration, and require the courts to confine it to civil cases, when it is a remedy for an evil as great in criminal as in civil cases, and the consequences of which may be even more serious.

We are of opinion that these assignments of error are not well taken.

A careful perusal of the instructions satisfies us that they fairly submitted to the jury the principles of law by which they should be governed in the consideration of the evidence. It would be impossible to prepare instructions to which an ingenious critic might not present plausible objection. The definition of "reasonable doubt" is attempted by the court. It is a difficult, if not an impossible, task so to define it as to satisfy a subtle and metaphysical mind, bent upon the detection of some point, however attenuated, upon which to hang a criticism. But no unbiased person can read those instructions without having the conviction forced upon him that every safeguard which the benignity of the law throws around a prisoner upon trial was accorded to the petitioner in this case.

Two instructions asked for by the petitioner were refused by the court, one of which undertakes to define reasonable doubt, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that by reasonable doubt is meant such doubt as would cause a man of average prudence to hesitate about a matter of his own of like importance to himself as the case on trial is to the accused."

It would have been impossible for the jury to make any practical application of the proposition sought to be formulated in this instruction. There could be no case of importance to a man such as "the case on trial was to the accused," unless he himself stood upon his deliverance before a jury, charged with a capital offense.

But the instruction was properly refused upon the further ground that the instructions of the court upon the subject of reasonable doubt were ample and correct guides to the jury upon that branch of the case.

The court was asked to instruct the jury "that under the humane policy of the law of this state it is considered infinitely better that ninety and nine (that is, an indefinite number of) guilty persons should escape punishment than that one innocent person should be punished; and therefore it is far better that the jury should err in acquittal than err in convicting."

We have heard it said, and it is sometimes stated in the opinions of courts, that it is better that ninety and nine guilty persons should escape than that one innocent person should be punished. We have no fault to find with the expression as a rhetorical phrase, but as a guide to a jury in reaching a conclusion it is of no value. That no guilty man should escape is equally indisputable, but it would hardly find a proper place in an instruction to a jury. The object of courts and juries is to shield the innocent and to punish the guilty; and in this case the jury were told that the accused was presumed to be innocent until his guilt was established by the commonwealth beyond a reasonable doubt, that this presumption of innocence goes with him through the entire case, and applies at every stage thereof, and that if, after having heard all of the evidence, the jury have a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused upon the whole case, or as to any fact essential to prove the charge made against him in the indictment, it is their duty to give him the benefit of the doubt, and find him not guilty. And, further, that if, upon the whole evidence, there is any reasonable hypothesis consistent with the innocence of the accused, they must find him not guilty; that the failure of the evidence to disclose any other criminal agent than the accused is not a circumstance which may be considered by the jury in determining whether or not he was guilty of the crime wherewith he is charged; that he is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established, and he is not to be prejudiced by the inability of the commonwealth to point to any other criminal agent; nor is he called upon to vindicate his own innocence by naming the guilty person.

It is also to be observed that the court was careful in instructing the jury as to the weight to be given to the evidence of contradictory statements made by the witness William McCue and others. The jury was warned that this evidence was admissible only to contradict the witness, and not to be taken as substantive proof of the facts related by the witness, or, in the terms of the statute, that they were not to consider the evidence of such inconsistent statements except for the purpose of contradicting the witness.

During the closing argument for the prosecution Capt. Micajah Woods, who had assisted the prosecution, arose, and in the presence of the jury said to the court: "With the gracious consent of the gentlemen on the other side and the commonwealth's attorney, I would like to make one statement, not pertaining to the merits of this case, but in view of the attack, which may not have been so intended, but which sounded to me ungenerous—as an ungenerous attack made upon me by the distinguished gentleman, and who has made so able a speech—I desire to say that I refused a large fee in this case to prosecute—"

Counsel for the prisoner objected to the statement, and asked that the jury be discharged in view of that statement.

It appears in the bill of exceptions that counsel for the prisoner had, in his argument, criticised the position of Capt. Woods in acting as prosecutor, under the compulsion of public opinion, of a man he admitted had been his friend for 20 years.

The right of the public prosecutor to have associated with him an attorney to assist in the prosecution is established law in this state, and it is not a proper subject of animadversion. He is as lawfully there to assist the prosecution as counsel for the defense to defend the prisoner; and so long as he keeps within proper bounds he is not open to criticism before the jury. It would be a strange thing if counsel for the accused were permitted to criticize opposing counsel, and that the latter should be obliged to submit in silence under the penalty we are asked to impose in this case. There is no merit in this exception.

The jury having rendered a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, the accused moved to set aside the verdict, among other reasons, because the jury were permitted during the progress of the trial to read, and did read, certain newspapers containing references to and comments upon the case pending the trial of the same.

It appears that "before the jury was sworn, and in response to a request from one of the jurors, the court stated to the members of the jury that they might be permitted to read such portions of the daily newspapers as in no way related to this trial, but that they must scrupulously avoid any parts of said papers as had any reference to this trial, which the said members of the jury then and there severally promised to do; and the sergeants were then instructed to carry out this instruction of the court. At the time this instruction was given neither the prisoner nor his counsel, they being present, made objection, though they were not asked by the court if they had objection."

In Hunter v. State, 43 Ga. 483, after some of the jury were in the box, but the whole not impaneled, and in the presence of the court, those sworn were seen by counsel for accused reading a newspaper which contained an article reflecting upon the counsel for prisoner, and no motion or notice was then taken in regard thereto. It was held that this was not such irregularity upon the part of the jury as would be sufficient to set aside the verdict, and that such acts transpiring in the courtroom, and in the presence of the court and of counsel, when not objected to, will not be favorably regarded after the verdict.

In Bulliner v. People, 95 Ill. 394, counsel for a defendant handed a juror a newspaper to read, after he was sworn, but before the panel was filled, and afterwards on the trial his attention was called to the fact that another juror was reading a newspaper in which was an article purporting to contain a report of the trial, and commenting upon the case unfavorably to the defendant, and made no objection thereto, but stated privately to the court that it was best to say nothing about the matter, as it might give the article undue prominence, and do the defendant more harm than good, it not appearing that the prosecution was responsible for the act. It was held that the irregularity was waived, and could not be urged by the defendant as error to reverse a judgment of conviction; and that a prisoner on trial has no right to stand by and suffer irregular proceedings to take place and then seek a reversal for the same. Like any other defendant, if he neglects in proper time to insist upon his rights, he waives them.

In McKinney v. People, 7 Ill. 556, 43 Am. Dec. 65, it is said: "A prisoner on trial under our laws has no right to stand by and suffer irregular proceedings to take place, and then ask to have the proceedings reversed on error on account of such irregularities. The law, by furnishing him with counsel to defend him, has placed him on the same platform with all other defendants, and if he neglects in proper time to insist upon his rights he waives them."

So it is uniformly held in civil as well as in criminal cases, for, as we have already remarked, the mode of procedure is substantially the same in both. A party who stands by without objection and sees proper evidence excluded or improper evidence admitted without objecting will not be heard to make the objection after verdict. And so with instructions. In other words, litigants are not permitted to play fast and loose with the court. If they are silent when it is their duty to speak, they are not permitted to speak when it is their duty to be silent.

The case under consideration is far stronger than those cited. The court, in the presence of the prisoner and of his counsel, at the instance of the jury, permitted them to have access to newspapers under rules which it prescribed. It does not appear that the limits imposed by the court were exceeded, or that the prisoner was prejudiced by what occurred. But, however that may be, he had no right to sit mute, prepared to abide by the results if they were favorable, or to make objection if they were adverse.

We think it is the safer and better practice to exclude newspapers from the jury. They are called upon to exercise the most sacred duty which can devolve upon a citizen, and in its discharge they must make such personal sacrifice as is necessary to its due performance; but under the circumstances of this case no reversible error is disclosed in this respect.

No one can read the petitions for a writ of error in this case without being satisfied that the accused had every advantage that could accrue to him from the efforts of able and astute counsel. But no one can read the facts presented in evidence without being convinced that no advocacy, however skilled to make the worse appear the better reason, could have brought about any other result than that which has been reached. The evidence precludes every reasonable hypothesis of innocence, and points with unerring certainty to the guilty man. The record discloses a homicide remarkable only for its atrocity, that it was committed by a member of the profession of the law who had been intrusted by his fellow citizens with a responsible office, and that the victim was his wife.

We have gone through the record and discussed what seemed to us to be its more important features. There are exceptions to which we have not adverted. Some of them we deemed unimportant; others as controlled by principles well established, or covered by what we have said with reference to kindred exceptions; and there is but one other view which we are called upon to present.

Running through the petitions, and more particularly the supplemental petition, there is a subtle suggestion that this court has introduced a practice which tends to undermine the rights and abridge the privileges of those who stand accused of crime.

The theory propounded seems to be that a writ of error to the judgment of a trial court is one of the rights of a person convicted of crime; while the truth is that a review by an appellate tribunal, whether upon an appeal or writ of error, is no part of "due process of law."

The inalienable rights of a person accused of crime are thus stated in the Bill of Rights: "That, in all capital or criminal prosecutions, a man hath a right to demand the cause and nature of his accusation, to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses, to call for evidence in his favor, and to a speedy trial by an impartial jury of his vicinage, without whose unanimous consent he cannot be found guilty; nor can he be compelled to give evidence against himself; that no man be deprived of his liberty, except by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers."

Our statute prescribes the rule which controls the action of this court. With reference to appeals and writs of error, section 3468 says: "In a case wherein the court shall deem the judgment, decree, or order, complained of, plainly right, and reject it on that ground, and the order of rejection so states, no other petition therein shall afterwards be entertained."

We have no such practice as an absolute right of appeal in civil or criminal cases. But the law requires a petition, accompanied by a transcript of the record, to be presented to the court, or one of its judges, whose duty it is to examine the errors assigned, and to grant or refuse a writ, as may seem proper. It is as much the duty of the court or judge to deny the petition when of opinion that the decision complained of is plainly right as it is to grant it when any doubt exists as to the propriety of the decision. The statute in its present form is found in the Code of 1849. Just when it took its place in the statute law we are not informed, but the uniform practice of this court and of the general court, its predecessor, as an appellate tribunal in criminal cases, has been in accordance with the letter and spirit of that statute.

In Vance v. Commonwealth, 2 Va. Cas. 162, a case of homicide, which ended in a conviction of murder in the first degree, the report of the case shows that it was highly litigated, and that many errors were assigned; but an application for a writ of error was unanimously refused by the judges of the general court.

Running through the Virginia Cases and other Reports in which the judgments of the general court appear numerous instances will be found of writs of error refused in every description of felony. In some cases opinions are delivered; some are heard upon the petition only, while in others the Attorney General is permitted to reply.

By the Constitution of 1851 the general court was abolished, and appellate criminal jurisdiction was given to the Court of Appeals. Beginning with 1854, our records disclose cases, involving every form of felony and every degree of punishment applicable to that crime, in which the order entered upon the petition is that "the court, deeming the judgment complained of plainly right, doth reject the petition" upon that ground.¹

We think that it has been made sufficiently to appear that our practice is not an innovation upon that of our predecessors;

that we are not perverting or diverting the administration of justice from its ancient and accustomed course; but that we walk in the beaten path prescribed to us from the earliest period in this commonwealth by judges whose names will always be remembered and revered.

While those accused of crime have rights which should be held inviolable, society has rights which are no less sacred. While the accused is entitled to a fair and impartial trial, the safety of the law-abiding citizen demands that the accused, having had a fair and impartial trial, and been adjudged guilty, according to the law of the land, should suffer with certainty and without delay the penalty imposed by the law upon his offense. Therefore, in obedience to the mandate of the statute, and in strict accordance with established precedent, having given careful consideration to the petitions and record, and being of opinion that no error is shown to the prejudice of the accused, we abide by the order entered at a former day of the term, and deny a writ of error.

Writ of error denied.

JOHNSON et al. v. BLACK et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 28, 1905.)

EQUITY — MULTIFARIOUSNESS—PUBLIC OFFICES — PAYMENT OF ILLEGAL SALARIES—SUIT BY TAXPAYER—JURISDICTION—LACHES — LIMITATIONS.

1. The bill in a suit by a number of taxpayers of a county against the members of the board of supervisors and a number of their predecessors in office to compel defendants to restore to the county moneys paid them in excess of their salaries, in which the same defenses were made by each defendant, was not multifarious.

2. Va. Code 1904, p. 398, § 336, provides that all improper accounts presented to the board of supervisors shall be resisted by the commonwealth attorney, and that, when required by six freeholders of the county, he shall appeal from any decision of the board to the circuit court within 30 days. Held, that equity is not without jurisdiction to entertain a suit by a number of the taxpayers of a county against the board of supervisors and a number of their predecessors to compel them to restore to the county moneys paid them in excess of their salaries, on the ground that there is an adequate remedy at law under the statute.

3. The fact that the suit embraced moneys paid for the period of 11 years did not render it barred by laches, though the books of the board had been open to the public.

4. The members of the board of supervisors of a county are not entitled to compensation in excess of that fixed by Va. Code 1904, p. 402, § 848, irrespective of what their services may have been reasonably worth, and irrespective of the custom of their predecessors.

5. In a suit by a number of taxpayers of a county to compel the members of the board of supervisors and a number of their predecessors to restore to the county moneys paid them in excess of their salaries, the county is practically the complainant, and, as against it, defendants could plead limitations.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Suit by Foster Black and others against the board of supervisors of Norfolk county, one Johnson, and others. From a decree in favor of complainants, certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John W. Happer, M. R. Peterson, and F. I. Crocker, for appellants. John B. Jenkins and N. T. Green, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. This suit in equity was brought by Foster Black and five others, resident citizens and taxpayers of the county of Norfolk, against the board of supervisors of that county and the appellants, for the purpose of compelling the appellants to restore to the county treasury certain public moneys which it is charged they had illegally and fraudulently withdrawn therefrom.

The bill alleges that the complainants had recently discovered that for 11 years said board had been continuously violating the law with respect to the compensation of its members, and had illegally and fraudulently during that time allowed and ordered to be paid out of the funds of the county, to the respective members of the board, compensation greatly in excess of that allowed by law. The names of the members of the boards during the time mentioned are set forth as defendants, and among them are the appellants.

There is filed with the bill, as a part thereof, a statement (Exhibit A) taken from the records of the board, which shows that between June 10, 1890, and June 11, 1901, compensation aggregating $16,192.75 had been allowed by the board to its several members; that, of this sum, the appellant W. S. Johnson, who had been in office continuously during that time, had received the sum of $3,042.75; that the appellant John A. Codd, who had been in office from 1892 to 1901, had received the sum of $3,893; that the appellant George E. Wood, who had been in office from 1896 to 1901, had received the sum of $1,932; that the appellant J. C. Lynch, who had been in office from 1896 to 1901, had received the sum of $849.50; and that the appellant D. M. Harding, who went into office in 1901, had received the sum of $62.77. This statement also shows the several sums received by the other nine persons, defendants in the court below, during the respective periods of their occupancy of the office, to have been, according to length of service, in somewhat corresponding proportion to those mentioned. The bill further alleges that, under the law regulating the compensation of members of boards of supervisors, during the time mentioned, no member of such boards, for that time or for any part thereof, could have legally been paid as compensation for his services, as much, or anything like as much, for any one year or for the whole of such time, as the statement Exhibit A shows that the defendants received upon the order of the board of which they were respectively members. It is therefore further alleged that the payments so made to the defendants, and each and every one of them, as shown on said statement, were the result of an illegal, fraudulent, and corrupt combination upon the part of the members of said respective boards of supervisors to divert to the use of themselves, in their individual capacity, money belonging to the taxpayers of the county, which was controlled and held in trust by these several boards of supervisors, as the representatives of the county, for purposes authorized by law; that each of the defendants to whom such overpayments were made, as set forth, had notice of, and participated and acquiesced in, a fraudulent, illegal, and corrupt breach of trust, and are liable in equity therefor, and can be treated therein—each of them—as trustee for the county and its taxpayers for the amounts so overpaid, with interest on the same from the date of such payments, and can be required in this suit to repay the same into the treasury of the county.

It is further alleged that, if the amount of such overpayments can be recovered for the county, it will materially lessen the taxes to be paid by complainants and the other citizens of the county; that complainants had applied to the present board of supervisors of the county to take some steps to recover such illegal payments, but that it had refused to pay any attention to the application, and had treated the same with contempt, thus refusing complainants and the county any hope of relief from action on their part; that further application to said board in this behalf would be a useless waste of time, as five out of its six members are parties defendant hereto, whom complainants wish to compel to refund to the treasury of the county moneys illegally paid to them.

The prayer of the bill is that an account may be taken of the amounts illegally paid to the defendants from the funds of Norfolk county; that a decree may be entered against each of the defendants for the amount so found to have been illegally paid, to be paid into the treasury of the county; and that each of the defendants be declared and held to be a trustee for the county to the extent of such illegal and fraudulent payments; and for general relief.

The defendants filed their several demurrers and separate answers to this bill, and the demurrers were overruled. In their answers they set out the amounts they have received for attendance on the meetings of the boards, and for mileage in going to and returning therefrom, as well as the amounts which they have received for service on committees of the boards, and for other alleged beneficial services rendered the county. They declare that they have faithfully performed their duties as members of the boards upon which they served, and deny that there was any illegal or fraudulent combination among them to divert the funds of the county to their own use, or that they have been guilty of any breach of trust in relation thereto, and claim that under a proper construction of the law, and in view of the arduous duties they have had to perform in such a large and prosperous county as Norfolk, and the manifest benefit of such services to the county, the amounts sought to be recovered were legally and properly allowed and paid to them. They also say that all of their meetings were open to the citizens of the county, and all of their allowances matters of public record, and that the complainants knew, or might, by due diligence have known, of the allowances to themselves at the time they were made. They also plead in their answers the bar of the statute of limitations. Numerous depositions were taken, and certified copies from the records of the boards of supervisors filed.

The circuit court held that the evidence did not justify the charge that the defendants had entered into a fraudulent conspiracy, but only showed that they had followed an illegal custom and precedent of their predecessors in office, in illegally withdrawing from the treasury, of the county compensation in excess of that allowed by law; that the defendants had illegally withdrawn from the county treasury compensation in excess of their lawful right, the amount of which excess compensation the complainants were entitled to have returned to the treasury of Norfolk county, so far as the recovery of the same is not barred by the statute of limitations—being of opinion that the defenses of the statute of limitations were good against any defendant who had not drawn such illegal compensation within three years prior to the institution of this suit. The court, proceeding further, holds that a recovery is barred by the statute as to all of the defendants except W. S. Johnson, against whom a decree is entered for $945.20, with interest on the several parts thereof from the date that each payment was received; John A. Codd, against whom a decree is entered for the sum of $1,283.75, with like interest; George E. Wood, against whom a decree is entered for the sum of $1,070, with like interest; J. C. Lynch, against the administrator of whom decree is entered for the sum of $412, with like interest; and D. M. Harding, against whom decree is entered for the sum of $36.30, with like interest. From this decree, which appoints a receiver to collect these several sums, the five defendants held liable have taken this appeal.

The first assignment of error is to the action of the court in not sustaining the demurrers to the bill.

It is insisted that the bill is multifarious, and should for this reason have been dismissed.

It has been repeatedly said by this court that it was impossible for courts to lay down any general rule as to what constitutes multifariousness; that they are left to decide each case upon its own circumstances, governed only by a sound discretion. The criterion by which courts are guided in considering this question is "convenience in the administration of justice." Each case, if not brought directly within the principle of some preceding case, must be decided upon its own merits, and upon a survey of the real and substantial convenience of all parties, the adequacy of the legal remedy, the situation of the different parties, the points to be contested, and the result which would follow if jurisdiction should be assumed or denied; whether, within reasonable and fair grounds, the suit is calculated to be, in truth, one which will practically prevent a multiplicity of litigations, and will be an actual convenience to all parties, and will not unreasonably overlook or obstruct the material interests of any.

In the case of School Board v. Farish, 92 Va. 160, 23 S. E. 221, this court said: "Courts, in dealing with this question, look particularly to convenience in the administration of justice; and, if this is accomplished by the mode of proceeding adopted, the objection of multifariousness will not lie, unless the course pursued is so injurious to one party as to make it inequitable to accomplish the general convenience at his expense. So that, when we look to see if a bill is multifarious, the first question to be determined is, does the bill propose to reach the end aimed at in a convenient way for all concerned? And if the mode adopted does accomplish the end of convenience, then the question arises, is any one hurt by it, or so injured as to make it unjust for the suit to be maintained in that form?" These views are reiterated with approval in the subsequent cases of Spooner v. Hilbish, 92 Va. 338, 23 S. E. 751; Staudé v. Keck, 92 Va. 544, 24 S. E. 227; Jordan v. Liggan, 95

Va. 616, 29 S. E. 330; and Dillard v. Dillard, 97 Va. 436, 34 S. E. 60.

Considering the bill in the case at bar in the light of these authorities, there is no difficulty in the conclusion that it is free from the vice of multifariousness. The plaintiffs were suing as the representatives of a class, the issues to be determined were common to all of the defendants, and they were in the same situation, so far as the points to be contested were concerned; the same defenses being made by them in their several answers. They have had the opportunity, without the slightest embarrassment or difficulty, to make their defense in a suit in which no possible harm has been or could have been done them; and, lastly, they have been saved a heavy burden of costs to each defendant, which would have been the result of a separate suit brought against each. In short, the ends of justice have been reached with the greatest possible convenience to all concerned, and without injury or even inconvenience to any party to the proceeding.

It is further contended that the demurrers should have been sustained and the bill dismissed because the appellees had an adequate remedy at law.

It has long been a well-established doctrine that courts of equity have jurisdiction to restrain the illegal diversion of public funds at the suit of a citizen and taxpayer, when brought on behalf of himself and others similarly situated, and to compel the restitution of public funds which have been illegally diverted and lodged in the hands of persons not entitled to the same, who have taken them with notice of the wrongful diversion, and the governing body of the subordinate or local government will not act or take the necessary steps to have such funds restored. Bull v. Read, 13 Grat. 78; Redd v. Supervisors, 31 Grat. 695; Roper v. McWhorter, etc., 77 Va. 215; Lynchburg, etc., Co. v. Dameron, 95 Va. 545, 28 S. E. 951; Crampton v. Zabriskie, 101 U. S. 601, 25 L. Ed. 1070; Anderson v. Fisk, 44 Cal. 309; Bailey v. Stracham (Minn.) 80 N. W. 694; Land, Log & L. Co. v. McIntyre, 100 Wis. 245, 75 N. W. 964, 69 Am. St. Rep. 915; Zuelly v. Casper, 160 Ind. 455, 67 N. E. 103, 63 L. R. A. 133; In re Police Dept., 85 Minn. 302, 88 N. W. 977; Shepard v. Easterling (Neb.) 86 N. W. 941.

But the appellants contend that, notwithstanding the well-settled doctrine recognized by the authorities just cited, the appellees have an adequate remedy at law under section 836 of the Code of 1887, which, as amended, is carried into Va. Code 1904, p. 398, § 836.

Courts of equity, having once acquired jurisdiction, never lose it because jurisdiction of the same matter is given to courts of law, unless the statute conferring such jurisdiction uses restrictive or prohibitory words. Filler v. Tyler, 91 Va. 458, 22 S. E.

235; Kelly v. Lehigh, etc., Co., 98 Va. 405, 36 S. E. 511, 81 Am. St. Rep. 736; Steinman v. Vicars, 99 Va. 595, 39 S. E. 227.

There is not a word or expression in the statute mentioned to indicate an intention to take away the jurisdiction that has been exercised for years by courts of equity in this class of cases. The section provides how accounts to be allowed by the board of supervisors shall be made out; that the county shall be represented by the commonwealth attorney, and all improper accounts resisted by him, and, when he thinks proper, or shall be required to do so by any six freeholders of the county, he shall appeal from any decision of the board to the circuit court of the county, causing a written notice of such appeal to be served on the clerk of the board, and on the party in whose favor the claim is allowed, within 30 days after the decision is made. It is thus seen that the right of appeal, under this section, from the allowance of a claim by the board of supervisors, is limited to freeholders, and to the concurrence of six of their number, and its exercise is limited to 30 days from the decision of the board. It cannot be presumed that the Legislature intended by this statute, without restrictive or prohibitory words, to take away the jurisdiction of courts of equity to entertain any taxpayer suing on behalf of himself and other similarly situated for the purpose of preventing the unlawful diversion of public funds, or for the purpose of compelling the restoration of such funds when already diverted.

But it is contended that this question has been settled to the contrary by this court in the cases of Pearson v. Supervisors, 91 Va. 322, 21 S. E. 483, and Manly Mfg. Co. v. Broadbuss, 94 Va. 547, 27 S. E. 438. The sole object of the first-mentioned case was to test the constitutionality of the Virginia election law approved March 6, 1894. To accomplish this, certain citizens and taxpayers of Brunswick county filed a bill alleging that an election had been held under this law, and certain expenses had been incurred thereby; that bills covering these expenses had been presented to and allowed by the board of supervisors of the county, and warrants drawn on the county treasurer therefor. They further alleged that the law under which the election had been held was unconstitutional and void, and that the expenses accruing thereunder were therefore not legal charges against the county, and prayed that the treasurer be enjoined from paying the same. This court held that the law in question was valid. Judge Keith, after concluding his elaborate and able opinion on the constitutional question, which was a complete decision of the case, added these words: "If, however, we had come to a different conclusion as to the constitutional question involved in the record which accompanies the petition in this case, we would still be obliged to refuse the appeal asked for, as the plaintiff had a plain and adequate remedy at law, under section 836 of the Code of Virginia, without resorting to a bill in chancery."

It may be that the remedy for the improper allowance of a claim for election expenses is by an appeal, under section 836, from the decision of the board of supervisors; but it is apparent that the learned judge was not dealing with the question now under consideration, nor was the language relied on necessary to the decision then made. It cannot, therefore, be regarded as militating against the view taken of the case before us.

The last-mentioned case of Manly Mfg. Co. v. Broadbuss, supra, holds that a taxpayer cannot come into a court of equity in a case where no fraud is charged, and where there is no pretense that the board of supervisors was transcending its power, merely to settle an account between a claimant and the board. The facts of the case are wholly different from those in the present case, and Judge Keith, in delivering the opinion of the court, says it is unnecessary to decide that the provision which requires the attorney to appeal at the instance of six taxpayers was intended to be in lieu of the right of taxpayers to resort to a court of equity, and we make no decision upon it. The opinion of the learned judge recognizes the right of taxpayers to come into a court of equity to protect their interests in a great variety of cases, and cites authorities in support of the proposition. These cases are not in conflict with the doctrine we have announced with reference to the jurisdiction of a court of equity in a case like the one before us, and we conclude what we have to say on this subject with the remark that, whatever remedy section 836 may afford as against a claim allowed by the board of supervisors before the same has been paid, it certainly furnishes no remedy for the recovery of moneys illegally diverted from, and already paid out of, the public treasury, which is the object of the present suit.

It is further assigned as ground in support of the demurrers that the appellees were guilty of laches.

The evidence shows that the appellees were not aware that the members of the board of supervisors had been drawing extra compensation until a few months before the institution of this suit, and it is well settled that laches cannot be imputed to those who are ignorant of their rights. It is no answer to say that the books of the board were open to the public, and could have been examined at any time. No duty rested upon appellees to examine the records kept by the board of supervisors. They, in common with other taxpayers, had the right to presume that their chosen representatives and agents would faithfully discharge their public duties within the law that regulated and prescribed those duties, and that they would not illegally divert the public funds to their private use. The appellants represented the public, and they cannot escape liability upon the ground that their constituents did not discover sooner that they were unlawfully withdrawing the money of the taxpayers from the public treasury and appropriating the same to their individual use.

Further detail would extend this opinion, necessarily long, beyond reasonable limits. It must therefore suffice to say that, considering all of the objections made to the scope and purpose of the bill, we are of opinion that the demurrers were properly overruled.

The only compensation provided by law for a supervisor is fixed by section 848 of the Code of 1887, which, as amended, is now found in Va. Code 1904, p. 402, § 848. It is there provided that each supervisor shall receive "three dollars per diem for the time he shall actually attend, and five cents for each mile travelled in going to or returning from the place of meeting; but no per diem allowance shall be made for any time occupied in travelling where mileage is allowed therefor: provided that but one mileage shall be allowed for any one term of meeting of such board; and no supervisor shall be allowed to draw pay for more than ten days' attendance in any one year."

The record shows that during the period covered by this inquiry the members of the board of supervisors of Norfolk county appropriated and received for their private individual use thousands of dollars in excess of the per diem and mileage provided by the plain terms of the statute. The justification offered for this course is that the amount received was for attendance upon committees and for other alleged beneficial services rendered by them to the county in their official capacity, and was no more than these services were reasonably worth, and that their action in this behalf was in accordance with the custom of their predecessors in office. This may not have been regarded by appellants as malfeasance, and it was doubtless not done with an evil intent, but it was none the less fraud, in law, upon the rights of the taxpayers of the county. Services rendered by public officers do not partake of the nature of contracts, and have no affinity thereto. In short, generally speaking, the nature of the relation of a public officer to the public is inconsistent with either a property or a contract right. Loving v. The Auditor, 76 Va. 942; Holladay v. The Auditor, 77 Va. 425; Frazier v. V. M. I., 81 Va. 59; Sinclair v. Young, 100 Va. 284, 40 S. E. 907; Taylor v. Beckham, 178 U. S. 548, 20 Sup. Ct. 890, 44 L. Ed. 1187.

In Dillon on Municipal Corporations, vol. 1, § 283, it is said: "It is a well-settled rule that a person accepting a public office with a fixed salary is bound to perform the duties of the office for the salary. He cannot legally claim additional compensation for the discharge of those duties, even though the salary be a very inadequate remuneration for the services. Nor does it alter the case that by subsequent statutes or ordinances his duties, within the scope of the charter powers pertaining to the office, are increased, and not his salary. Whenever he considers the compensation inadequate, he is at liberty to resign. The rule is of importance to the public. To allow changes and additions to the duties properly belonging or which may properly be attached to an office to lay a foundation for extra compensation would soon introduce intolerable mischief. The rule, too, should be very rigidly enforced. The statutes of the Legislatures and the ordinances of our municipal corporations seldom prescribe with much detail and particularity the duties annexed to public offices, and it requires but little ingenuity to run nice distinctions between what duties may and what may not be considered strictly official; and, if these distinctions are much favored by courts of justice, it may lead to great abuse."

To the same effect is Mechem on Public Officers. This author says that, unless compensation is attached by law to an office, none can be recovered. A person who accepts an office to which no compensation is attached is presumed to undertake to serve gratuitously, and he cannot recover anything upon the ground of an implied contract to pay what the service is worth. In section 862 of this work it is said: "Neither can he recover extra compensation for incidental or collateral services which properly belong to, or form a part of, the main office. An express contract to pay such extra compensation or an express allowance of it is void."

These views are also found expressed in Throop on Public Officers, and by other text-writers.

In a very able opinion in the case of Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Grat. 457, Judge Lee, in discussing this subject, says: "It is certainly a marked feature in our system of offices that the compensation of public functionaries shall be fixed and certain. It is a great and pervading principle of our Code, and is essential to the purity and impartiality of the government. The idea of a perquisite of office, in the sense of a fee or allowance for services beyond the ordinary salary or settled wages, has no place in our legislation, but seems to be repudiated by the most necessary implication. Once to admit it is to open a wide door for imposition and corruption." Further the learned judge says: "He takes the office on the terms and conditions prescribed by the statute, and, when it allows a fixed and definite fee for the service which he is to perform, I think it is very far-fetched and illogical to say that he acquires, also, by virtue of his appointment, a right, as by contract, to a portion of the property of the citizen in respect of which his office is to be exercised, because his predecessors in the office may have been in the habit of taking a like portion without objection or protest on the part of those with whose property they had been called upon to deal. The only contract which, as it seems to me, can possibly be inferred from an appointment to a public office created by statute, with special fees for the services rendered, and its acceptance, is an agreement on his part to perform the duties of the office, and on the part of the public that he shall be entitled to the fees prescribed by the act when the services shall have been rendered."

These principles are by universal consent thoroughly established throughout this country, and the public welfare demands that they should be enforced. Payment from the public funds for all official duties rests alone upon legislative sanction, which is the exclusive compensative power of the government. U. S. v. Shields, 153 U. S. 88, 14 Sup. Ct. 735, 38 L. Ed. 645; Talbot v. East Machias, 76 Me. 415; White v. Inhabitants of Levant (Me.) 7 Atl. 539; Sikes v. Inhabitants of Hatfield (Mass.) 13 Gray, 347; Hillman v. Board of Commissioners (Minn.) 86 N. W. 890; Wight v. Board of Commissioners (Mont.) 41 Pac. 271; Jones v. Commissioners, 57 Ohio St. 189, 48 N. E. 882, 63 Am. St. Rep. 710; Albright v. County of Bedford, 106 Pa. 582; Hope v. Hamilton County (Tenn.) 47 S. W. 487; Stone v. Bevans, 88 Minn. 127, 92 N. W. 520, 97 Am. St. Rep. 506; Snipes v. Winston, 128 N. C. 374, 35 S. E. 610, 78 Am. St. Rep. 666.

In obedience to the foregoing reasoning and the authorities cited, the conclusion is plain that the appellants have, without authority of law, appropriated to their own use the public funds of the county of Norfolk, and that they should be required to restore the same to the public treasury, to the extent that they severally appear to be liable therefor.

Under rule 9 of this court (45 S. E. vi), the appellees assign as cross-error the action of the circuit court in sustaining the pleas of the statute of limitations, set up in the answers of the appellants as a defense in part to the bill.

This is a civil proceeding for the recovery of certain sums of money claimed to be due by the appellants to the county of Norfolk, and the county is practically the complainant. The appellants are only constructive or implied trustees, and in such cases it seems to be well settled that the bar of the statute applies.

The right expressed in the maxim, "Nul-lum tempus occurrit regi," is an attribute of sovereignty, and cannot be invoked by counties or other subdivisions of the state. As to such subdivisions of the state the statute runs in the same manner and to the same extent as against natural persons. Wood on Lim. of Actions, § 53; Dillon on Mun. Corp. vol. 2, § 668; Armstrong v. Dalton, 15 N. C. 568; Clements v. Anderson, 46 Miss. 581; County of St. Charles v. Powell, 22 Mo. 525, 68 Am. Dec. 637; City of Paile v. Scholte, 24 Iowa, 283; May v. School District (Neb.) 34 N. W. 377, 3 Am. St. Rep. 266; Mount v. Lakeman, 21 Ohio St. 643.

In a note to Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 591, in the Va. Rep. Ann. 273, it is said: "Statutes of limitations, run against public corporations, whether they are municipal or mere agencies of the state. Such corporations are more or less branches of the government, and necessarily are clothed with the attributes and incidents of sovereignty; yet, when they have power to sue and be sued, to have a common seal, to take and hold property, and transact business, they are governed by the same laws and regulations, and subject to the same limitations, as natural persons, unless exempt by positive law." Citing Western Lunatic Asylum v. Miller, 29 W. Va. 328, 1 S. E. 740, 6 Am. St. Rep. 644, and McClanahan v. Western Lunatic Asylum, 88 Va. 466, 13 S. E. 977.

These authorities fully sustain the conclusion reached by the learned judge of the circuit court, that the appellants were entitled to the benefit of their plea of the statute of limitations.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that there is no error in the decrees appealed from, and they are affirmed.

PEDDLERS—LICENSE—PEDDLING BY CORPORATION—LIABILITY OF OFFICERS—SALES.

1. A corporation may be punished criminally for peddling through the medium of an unlicensed agent.

Code 1904, p. 2223], making sales by peddlers unlawful unless a license has been issued.

Error to Corporation Court of Manchester.

One Crall and one Ostrander were convicted of peddling without a license, and they bring error. Affirmed as to appellant Crall and reversed as to Ostrander.

R. Randolph Hicks, for plaintiffs in error.
The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

WHITTLE, J. Plaintiffs in error were tried and convicted upon information, in the corporation court of the city of Manchester, for peddling goods, wares, and merchandise in that city without having first obtained a license as required by statute.

It appears that the L. B. Price Mercantile Company, a Missouri corporation, domiciled at Kansas City, had established storerooms or depositories for its goods in some twenty-odd states of the Union. Among them, two were located in this state—one in the city of Norfolk, and the other in the city of Richmond. The plaintiff in error Crall was the vice president of the company, in general charge of its business in the Southern States, and with headquarters at Norfolk; while the plaintiff in error Ostrander, under the supervision of Crall, was in charge of the Richmond depository.

Two theories are presented as to the company's methods of conducting its business, to sustain each of which evidence has been adduced.

The contention of plaintiffs in error is that they were doing an installment business through agents, who were supplied with samples and order books, and whose duty it was to exhibit the samples and to canvass for purchasers, turning in all orders received by them to those in charge of the company's depositories; that thereupon the orders were filled by another agent, who delivered the goods, collected a certain part of the purchase price, and took from the purchaser a written agreement providing for future payments in monthly installments, and stipulating that the goods were not to be removed from the place of delivery or sold or disposed of until fully paid for.

The opposing theory of the commonwealth is that the course of business of the company was to deliver to its agents goods, wares, and merchandise, to be carried by them from place to place, and left with the purchaser on "general leases"—that is to say, to be paid for in installments—the L. B. Price Mercantile Company retaining title until the entire purchase price was paid.

The company dealt in rugs, curtains, bed spreads, blankets, covers, dress patterns, clocks, plated ware, wringers, albums, pictures, and other wares usually sold by peddlers.

The statute upon which the prosecution is founded is as follows:

"Any person who shall carry from place to place any goods, wares or merchandise, and offer to sell or barter the same, or actually sells or barter the same, shall be deemed to be a peddler, and any person licensed as a peddler may sell any personal property a merchant may sell or he may exchange the same for other articles; and whenever a license is granted to a peddler to sell such goods, wares or merchandise his license shall be valid for one year from date of its issue. Said license shall not be transferable, and any person so licensed shall endorse his name on the said license, and such license shall confer authority to sell at any house or place within the county or city in which the license was granted. Any peddler who shall peddle for sale or sell or barter without a license shall pay a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars for each offense, one-half of which shall go to the informer; and any persons selling or offering to sell as a peddler shall exhibit his license on a demand of any citizen of the county, city or town in which he sells or offers to sell or barter; and upon his failure or refusal to do so he shall be subject to the penalties of peddling without a license. This section shall be construed to include persons engaged in peddling lightning rods. All persons who do not keep a regular place of business (whether it be in a house, on a vacant lot or elsewhere) open at all times in regular business hours, and at the same place, who shall offer for sale goods, wares and merchandise, shall be deemed peddlers under this act. And all persons who keep a regular place of business open at all times in regular business hours, and at the same place, who shall personally, or through their agents, offer for sale or sell, and at the time of such offering or sale deliver goods, wares and merchandise, elsewhere than at such regular place of business, shall also be deemed peddlers as above; but this section shall not apply to those who sell or offer for sale, in person or by their employees, ice, fuel, meats, fowls, fish, game, vegetables, fruits or other family supplies of a perishable nature grown or produced by them; nor to merchants who keep a regular place of business open at all times in regular business hours and at the same place, without a city or town, who shall sell such articles to merchants only residing and doing business in a city or town." Acts 1902-03-04, p. 484, c. 271 [Va. Code 1904, p. 2223].

At the trial, the whole matter of law and fact having been submitted to the court, the judgment of conviction was rendered against Crall and Ostrander. The case is therefore before this court as upon a demurrer to evidence, and the evidence of the commonwealth seems quite sufficient to sustain the charge that the sales in question were made by the L. B. Price Mercantile Company through their agents, and elsewhere than at their regular place of business.

The law is well settled that a corporation may be punished criminally for peddling through the medium of an unlicensed agent. While a peddler's license cannot issue to a corporation as such, it is competent for a corporation desiring to peddle its goods to take out license in the name of a designated agent, and such agent may lawfully peddle the goods of the principal. Standard Oil Co. v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 55 S. W. 8.

This seems to be conceded; but it is insisted that where a corporation is guilty of a violation of the peddlers' act the punishment must be visited only upon the corporation and the agent who actually makes the sales.

This statement of the law is too narrow, and, if followed, would in many instances afford immunity to the chief offenders, the officers of the corporation, without whose assistance it would be impossible for the corporation to engage in the prohibited business. A corporation can act alone through its officers and agents, and where the business itself involves a violation of the law the correct rule is that all who participate in it are liable. "The Law of Crimes," Clark & Marshall, pp. 395-397; 1 Bish. on Crim. Law (7th Ed.) § 892; City of Wyandotte v. Corrigan (Kan.) 10 Pac. 99, 102; Standard Oil Co. v. Com., supra; Hays v. Com. (Ky.) 55 S. W. 425, 426.

"When the agent performs the illegal act under an absent principal's direction, either express or implied, this imposes responsibility on the principal.

"In misdemeanors the act may be charged to have been done by the principal himself without reference to an agent." 1 Whar. Crim. Law (9th Ed.) § 246.

"A principal is prima facie liable for the illegal acts of an agent done in a general course of illegal business authorized by the principal." Id. § 247.

In this case it is contended that the plaintiff in error W. F. Crall was vice president and general manager of the L. B. Price Mercantile Company, in charge of all its business in the Southern States. He was the vice principal, and the trial court was warranted in the conclusion that he was cognizant of the fact that the subordinate agents of the company were peddling its goods without license.

The case is unaffected by the circumstance that the transaction was denominated a lease, and that title to the goods was to remain in the seller until the rent was paid. The agreement was accompanied by a delivery of the goods, and, by its terms, title was to vest in the purchaser upon payment of the deferred installments of rent. Such a transaction is a sale in contemplation of the peddlers' act. City of South Bend v. Martin (Ind. Sup.) 41 N. E. 315, 29 L. R. A. 531; Ry. Co. v. Erwin, 84 Ind. 457; Lanman v. McGregor, 94 Ind. 301.

For these reasons the judgment of the corporation court of the city of Manchester must be affirmed as to the plaintiff in error W. F. Crall.

The record presents quite a different case as to the plaintiff in error C. O. Ostrander. He was only found guilty under the second charge in the information, namely, of the unlawful sale, on October 20, 1902, of a piece of dress goods to one Lucy J. Clarke.

It appears from the evidence that this sale was made before Ostrander became manager of the Richmond store, and he cannot be held responsible therefor.

The judgment as to him must therefore be reversed and annulled; and this court will enter such judgment as the corporation court ought to have entered, adjudging the said C. O. Ostrander not guilty of peddling goods without a license, as charged in the information, and ordering that he be acquitted and discharged, and go hence without day.

STAFFORD v. BOARD OF CANVASSERS OF MINGO COUNTY.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, Dec. 20, 1904. Dissenting Opinion, Feb.
1, 1905.)ELECTIONS—CONTEST—EVIDENCE—BALLOTS —SIGNATURES OF POLL CLERKS.

1. Certificates of the results of an election made by the commissioners at the precincts are prima facie evidence of the result of the election. The ballots, if identified as the same cast, are primary and higher evidence; but, in order to continue the ballots as controlling evidence, it must appear that they have been preserved in the manner and by the officers prescribed by the statute, and that while in such custody they have not been changed or tampered with.

2. If the ballots at an election precinct have the appearance of having been tampered with, the evidence of poll clerks and commissioners may be used before a canvassing board upon a recount to show that the ballots are all void because of the want of signatures of both poll clerks, each in his own handwriting, upon all the ballots at such precinct, but not to show that the ballots have not been altered, or to show the contents of the ballots; nor can that or other evidence be used to otherwise repel the prima facie case of tampering arising from such appearance of the ballots. If it appear from such evidence that all of such ballots are void for such defect, then the ballots of such precinct cannot be recounted, nor can the result be declared from the certificates made by the officers conducting the election. In such case the election at that precinct is void.

Poffenbarger and Sanders, JJ., dissenting in part.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition of John L. Stafford for a writ of mandamus to the board of canvassers of Mingo county. Mandamus granted.

J. H. Holt, Geo. J. McComas, and S. D. Stokes, for petitioner. Sheppard & Goodykoontz, Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, and S. U. G. Rhodes, for respondents.

BRANNON, J. John L. Stafford and John A. Sheppard were contesting candidates for the office of prosecuting attorney of Mingo county at the election in November, 1904. After the board of canvassers had canvassed the returns of the election, it happened that the candidates demanded a recount of the ballots, including all the precincts in the county. In the progress of the recount it was found that a ballot box in which ballots of Matewan Precinct had been inclosed, they being in two sacks in which they had been placed by the canvassers, who wrote their names over the sealing places, had been broken open, there being large openings in them, and the sacks of ballots which had been put in the box had the ends partly torn off, including the names written over the sealing places by the canvassers. As these sacks of ballots thus bore the unmistakable appearance of having been tampered with—a fact not denied in this case—Sheppard moved the board not to recount the ballots of Matewan Precinct, and to declare the result at that precinct by the certificates made out by the officers who conducted the election at that precinct. Then Stafford offered to prove that the ballots in the sacks were the identical ballots cast by the voters at Matewan Precinct, and to show by evidence that, notwithstanding their appearance, they had not been tampered with, and that upon the canvass the said board had found the box broken in the same condition it presented when it was before the board on the recount, and that the board had, after the canvass, properly resealed the ballots before returning them to the box, and that the box was in the same condition in which it was when delivered by the clerk to the sheriff, the said box having been delivered to the sheriff, as stated in the opinion in another case between the same parties, this day decided, 49 S. E. 364. The board of canvassers refused to hear the proposed evidence, and refused to recount the ballots of Matewan Precinct, and declared the result of the election thereat upon the face of the certificates of the officers conducting the election. Stafford now comes to this court, asking a mandamus to compel the board of canvassers to reverse the action of said board of canvassers and compel them to hear the evidence proposed by Stafford.

It is undenied and undeniable that the sacks of ballots at Matewan Precinct bore unmistakable appearance of having been tampered with. The tops of the sacks were partly torn off, and the names of the members of the board of canvassers, which they had written across the sealing places of the sacks, were gone. Under principles stated in Dent v. Board, 45 W. Va. 750, 32 S. E. 250, the appearance and condition of the sacks of ballots raised the presumption of unlawful tampering, and excluded the ballots from recount, and called for the declaration of the result of the election at that precinct upon the certificate returned by the precinct officers. We are of the opinion that the oral evidence proposed by Stafford is not admissible. There stands the prima facie case of tampering presented by the very appearance of the broken sacks. The canvassers knew that they had been so tampered with, as they themselves had but recently sealed them in the sacks when they canvassed the returns of that precinct. When you propose to introduce oral evidence to repel the prima facie case of tampering, what is the character of such evidence; where will it lead? It opens a broad field, and presents a case judicial in character, proper for a court of contest. It opens the field of uncertainty; and that very uncertainty itself discredits the ballots for the purposes of a recount by such a body as a board of canvassers. It would make that board a court of contest, vested with full judicial power to hear and weigh all evidence that might be offered, so it bear any relevancy to the matter in controversy. We think this position is conformable to the functions assigned to the board of canvassers and principles governing their proceedings in Brazie v. Commissioners, 25 W. Va. 213.

But the petition states that the ballots at Matewan Precinct are void, and not entitled to be counted either on the face of the certificate made by the officers of election or on the ballots, from the fact that the two poll clerks did not write their names on the ballot sheets, each with his own hand, as required by statute. If this be so, then, as held in Kirkpatrick v. Deegans, 53 W. Va. 275, 44 S. E. 465, no valid ballots were cast at that precinct, the election there would be void, and its returns could not be counted for any candidate. The candidate asserting such to be the case ought to have the right to show this. He may do so by the evidence of the poll clerks or of the commissioners of the precinct. The ballots at that precinct ought to have been opened and inspected by the board of canvassers, in order that they and the candidate interested might know the facts, and adduce evidence to prove the nullity of the election at that precinct in the manner indicated. But he cannot adduce evidence—any evidence whatever—to identify the ballot sheets, or any of them, in order to repel the prima facie case of tampering arising from the appearance of the sack which contained those ballots. If it be found that none of the ballots at the precinct are valid, then the whole precinct is rejected. If, however, there be some void ballots because of the defect aforesaid, and some not subject to that defect, those not subject to that defect cannot be counted, but the result must be declared from the certificates returned by the officers of election. While the evidence of the poll clerks and commissioners may be heard to prove that the ballot sheets are the same used by the voters at the election, yet it cannot be used to prove the contents of the ballots, and thus verify the count made from them. Evidence cannot be introduced to prove the contents of the ballots to repel the prima facie evidence of tampering arising from the appearance of the sacks containing the ballots. I have said that, in case some of the ballots be found to be void for want of the names of the poll clerks properly signed, those not subject to that defect cannot be recounted; so neither can the result shown by the certificate made by the officers of election be altered or affected by those ballots not properly signed by the poll clerks, unless the canvassers can see by the test now to be stated that there has been no actual tampering. We think that there is one test only which will demonstrate whether the faces of the ballots have been tampered with. The case of Dent v. Board of Com'rs, 45 W. Va. 750, 32 S. E. 250, says that when there is appearance of tampering, in case of disagreement between the certificate and the result shown by the ballots, the certificate controls. This allows the canvassers to ascertain whether there is such disagreement, and does not discard the ballots unless there is such disagreement. If there be some ballots void for want of proper signing by poll clerks, and others not so void, the canvassers must make comparison between the result shown by the certificate and that shown by the ballots. If there is no disagreement, thus indicating that there has been no actual tampering, then the votes shown by the void ballots as cast for each of the candidates between whom recount has been asked shall be subtracted from the total vote shown by the certificate as cast for them, respectively, and the result shown by the certificate, after such subtraction, shall be taken as the result. If, however, there be disagreement between the certificate result and the result shown by the ballots, the certificate must be taken as showing the result at the precinct.

The admission of the testimony of the poll clerks and precinct commissioners for the purpose of showing that the ballot sheets have not been properly signed by the poll clerks is no exception to the general rule against the admission of extrinsic testimony hereinbefore stated. It is founded upon the statute, Code 1899, c. 3, § 66. At any rate, it is justified by that statute. It tells the precinct commissioners to reject ballots having that defect. For the purpose of proving that defect, they may call upon the clerks who are present, as well as upon their own knowledge of the facts. Now, a recount is simply doing over again what the precinct commissioners have done. To do that over, they must have the same powers that are vested in the precinct commissioners. Therefore they may call as witnesses the clerks and commissioners.

The defendants filed two pleas in abatement to the effect that Stafford had obtained from the judge of the circuit court of Mingo county an alternative writ of mandamus commanding the board of canvassers to reject each and every ballot cast at Matewan Precinct upon which the names of the poll clerks had not been written each in his own hand. The theory under this plea in abatement is that the pendency of the mandamus before the circuit court of Mingo county would prevent this mandamus from issuing from this court. We do not think so. The mandamus in the circuit court is limited to the rejection of ballots having the defect aforesaid, whereas the mandamus sought for from this court has broader scope, in that it asks an inspection of the ballots at Matewan, and the admission of evidence to repel the charge of tampering with the ballots—a matter to which the proceeding of the circuit court does not in terms apply, and only inferentially—and asks relief under circumstances different from that existing in the circuit court, which proceeded upon the assumption that the element of viciousness in all the ballots, arising from their having been tampered with, does not exist.

The scope of the relief which may be granted upon the mandamus in the circuit court is not clearly as broad as that which may be afforded in this case. We should not refuse to entertain this writ unless we can see very clearly that relief as broad and effectual can be given upon the mandamus in the circuit court. "If the whole relief sought in the second suit is not attainable in the first, or if the relief which may be given or the remedies available in the second suit are more extensive than can be attained in the first, a plea to the second suit of the pendency of the first is not good." 1 Cyc. 29.

The objection that the canvassers have declared the result, issued the certificate, and adjourned, is no defense. Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. 690.

A mandamus giving relief to the extent above indicated is awarded.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting in part from decision). From so much of the decision as requires a comparison to be made between the result shown by the certificate of the precinct election officers and the result shown by the ballots, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the vote shown by the void ballots can be deducted from the certified returns, and directing, under certain conditions, that such deductions be made, I dissent. I believe this much of the conclusion reached by a majority of the court to be in conflict with certain principles stated in the opinion as sound and universally recognized law. The board of canvassers is not a judicial body. It is incompetent to deal with the question of fraud. Before it no evidence is admissible for the purpose of overcoming the presumption of viciousness arising from the fact that the ballots have been tampered with. If inferences arising from comparison of the ballots with the certificate or otherwise are allowed to be used as evidence for that purpose, I see no reason why any other relevant evidence might not as well be admitted for that purpose, and the board of canvassers held to be a judicial body, with all those powers which are denied to it by the case of Brazile v. Commissioners, 25 W. Va. 213. I place the power to hear testimony of the poll clerks, election commissioners, and others present at the election, for the purpose of identifying the papers used at the election and of obtaining complete returns, upon the statutory provisions which seem clearly to authorize it. I place the right to hear the evidence of such officers as to the manner in which the clerks' signatures were indorsed upon the backs of the ballots upon a statutory provision also, and I believe this to be the full extent of the powers of a board of canvassers to hear evidence respecting the election and its returns. The comparison would be obviously inconclusive of the question as to whether or not the ballots have been changed on their faces. Votes for candidates may have been stricken off of good ballots and put on void ones, and vice versa, without altering the whole number of good and bad votes. For instance, a candidate may have a total of 100 votes—50 on ballots properly signed by the poll clerks, and 50 on ballots not so signed. On their faces these ballots may be so manipulated and altered as to give that candidate 60 votes on void ballots and 40 on good ones, whereby he would sustain a loss of 10 votes, although the total of good and bad votes would remain unaltered. Complaint is made because the record indicates that there are only a few ballots in the precinct which have been properly signed by the poll clerks. But the court cannot lay down a rule for a special case. It must be the same whether there be few or many bad ballots. No principle is perceived under which the rule governing the admission of evidence in the case of a close contest, in which only a few votes would change the result, can be varied or departed from so as to meet a case in which it takes a large number to change the result.

SWIFT & CO. v. WOOD et al.

STATUTES—INTERPRETATION—RE-ENACTMENT — NOTICE FOR JUDGMENT—SERVICE—COMPUTATION OF TIME—SUNDAYS.

1. When a statute has been construed by the courts, and is then re-enacted by the Legislature, the construction given it is presumed to be sanctioned by the Legislature, and thenceforth becomes obligatory upon the courts.

2. Section 5, cl. 8, of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 6], provides that, where a statute requires a notice to be given or an act done a certain time before any proceeding, there must be that time exclusive of the day for the proceeding, but the day on which the notice is given or act done may be counted. Section 8211 [page 1686] provides that a notice of a motion for judgment must be returned to the clerk's office within five days after service. Held, that a notice for judgment served on the 21st and returned on the 26th day of the month is not returned within five days after service, and a judgment by default upon such notice is not valid.

3. In computing time, Sunday is to be included, unless the last day falls on Sunday.

Error to Corporation Court of City of Newport News.

Action by Swift & Co. against Wood and others. From an order setting aside a judgment for plaintiffs, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Wm. C. Stuart, for plaintiffs in error. R. M. Hudson, for defendants in error.

HARRISON, J. On the 16th day of December, 1903, notice was served upon the plaintiffs in error that the defendants in error would on the 21st day of December, 1903, move the corporation court of the city of Newport News to set aside and declare null and void a pretended or alleged judgment obtained by the plaintiffs in error on March 11, 1901, for $263.64 and interest.

The judgment sought to be set aside under this notice had been obtained against the defendants in error, on motion, under the proceeding provided for by section 8211 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1686]; and, among other grounds assigned for setting it aside, they asserted that the notice upon which the judgment was obtained had not been returned to the clerk's office, as provided by the statute, within five days after its alleged service. The notice was served February 21, 1901, and returned to the clerk's office on the 26th of that month. The plaintiffs in error insist that this return of the notice was within five days, as contemplated by the statute.

This question has been settled in this state for many years by the decision of this court in the case of Turnbull v. Thompson, 27 Grat. 306. In that case the objection was made that the original process commencing the suit was served on the defendant February 8, 1862, and that the judgment became final on the 8d of March, 1862, in violation of the statute which declares that no judgment by default on scire facias or summons shall be valid if it becomes final within one month after the service of such process. Judge Staples, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The month indicated by the statute is, of course, a calendar month; and, if the 8d day of February—the day of the service of the process—is to be included in computing the time, then the judgment did not become final within a month after the service of process." The learned judge then proceeds as follows: "Without undertaking now to discuss the doctrines of the common law in respect to the days to be included or excluded in the computation of time under statutes, it is sufficient to say that every difficulty in regard to that question has been removed by the provisions of the eighth clause of section 17, c. 16, p. 115, Code 1860. That section declares that, where a statute requires a notice to be given or any other act to be done a certain time before any motion or proceeding, there must be that time, exclusive of the day for such motion or proceeding, but the day on which such notice is given or such act is done may be counted as part of the time." By virtue of this statute the judgment was held not to have become final within one month, and was sustained as valid.

The construction put upon this statute has received legislative approval and sanction; the same section, unchanged, having been re-enacted as section 5, cl. 8, with the Code of 1887, and is now found, without amendment, in Va. Code 1904, § 5, cl. 8. When a statute has been construed by the courts, and is then re-enacted by the Legislature, the construction given to it is presumed to be sanctioned by the Legislature, and thenceforth becomes obligatory upon the courts.

Mangus v. McClelland, 93 Va. 786, 22 S. E. 364.

Under the decision in Turnbull v. Thompson, supra, and the construction there put upon the statute, a notice served on the 21st day of February, 1901, and returned to the clerk's office on the 26th day of that month, is not a compliance with the statute which requires such notice to be returned to the clerk's office within five days after service of the same.

Plaintiffs in error further contend that the 24th day of February, 1901, was Sunday, which was not a juridical day, and therefore cannot be counted in computing the time. This position is not tenable.

Judge Lewis, speaking for this court in the case of Rowles v. Brauer et al., 89 Va. 466, 16 S. E. 356, holds that when a statute prescribes a certain number of days within which an act is to be done, and says nothing about Sunday, it is to be included, unless the last day falls on Sunday, in which case the act may generally be done on the succeeding day, but if the act may be lawfully done on Sunday, and the last day falls on Sunday, then Sunday is not to be excluded.

The provision of section 8211 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1686] with respect to returning the notice to the clerk's office within five days after its service is not, as contended, merely directory. This statute furnishes a summary remedy for obtaining a judgment for money, and where the judgment is by default, as in the case at bar, its terms must be strictly complied with; otherwise the judgment will not be valid.

For these reasons, the judgment complained of must be affirmed.

Sands & Sands, for plaintiff in error. Meredith & Cocke, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. Plaintiff in error, Ellen J. Farley, a young lady of 23 years of age, was on the 5th day of November, 1900, and for some months prior, in the employ, as a clerk or saleswoman, of Isaac and Moses Thalhimer, in their dry goods store, conducted on Broad street, in the city of Richmond, under the firm name of Thalhimer Bros.; and on the morning of the 6th of November, 1900, she was discharged from her employment by Moses Thalhimer on the alleged ground that she had on the day before been guilty of the theft of a handkerchief and two yards of ribbon from a different department of the store to that in which she was employed.

This action is brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendant in error, Moses Thalhimer, to recover damages for slanderous and insulting words alleged to have been used by defendant in error on the occasion of the discharge of the plaintiff in error, and on a subsequent date, January 17, 1901, when she visited the store of Thalhimer Bros. to collect a balance due her on her salary at the time of her discharge.

The declaration contains four counts. The first count alleges that on the morning of November 5th plaintiff in error purchased at the store of Thalhimer Bros. a handkerchief and two yards of ribbon, and openly deposited the same in an open cabinet drawer until the evening of that day, when she carried them with her when she left the store after that day's employment; that, on her return the next morning, defendant in error called her "around to one side" of the store, and falsely and maliciously said to a Miss Chisholm, another employé, in the presence of a Miss Allen and others, as follows: "Miss Chisholm, is this your friend? If so, I suppose you will be glad to cut the acquaintance of a common thief, won't you? That is what she is. Do you know what I would like to do with you, anyway? I would like to take you downstairs, and have you stripped, and take a cowhide and strike you from your head to your heels." "There goes a thief, a thief." The second count alleges the same words as insulting and tending to a breach of the peace. The third count sets forth that the plaintiff in error on January 17, 1901, went to the store of Thalhimer Bros. to secure the balance of her wages, and that then and there, in the presence of Mrs. A. L. Pugh, Mrs. James Farley, and others, defendant in error used the following words: "You won't get it. It took you a long time to find out that I owed you anything, and it will take you a still longer one to collect it. You know how to make it. Go ahead and make it. I see you are looking for trouble, and you can get it good, and plenty of it. I am fixed for you. I will let you down easy. I called you a thief before, and I call you one now, and a good one at that. That girl is a thief. I caught her stealing in my store, and I can prove it. If I had gone over to her mother's house, I would have found out." The fourth count alleges the same words as insulting and tending to a breach of the peace.

Defendant in error, responding to the demand of plaintiff in error for a statement of his defenses, answered: "First, not guilty; 2nd, that, while he did not use the language set forth in the declaration, he did accuse her of having stolen a handkerchief and a piece of ribbon from the store of Thalhimer Bros.; third, that the charge was true; fourth, privileged communications; and it is agreed, as to the second defense, the defendant bears the same responsibility as if a plea of justification had been entered formerly."

At the trial, after the evidence on both sides was offered, certain instructions were asked for by both plaintiff in error and defendant in error, in both sets of which the question whether the words alleged as slanderous were spoken maliciously or not was left for the determination of the jury; but the court rejected all of the instructions asked for, and gave in lieu thereof its own instruction, as follows:

"The jury are instructed that it appearing from all the evidence that the words charged in the first and second counts of the declaration to have been spoken by the defendant were, if spoken at all, spoken in the defendant's place of business to the plaintiff or to one or more of his employés—they must be regarded as privileged communications.

"And it further appearing from all the evidence that the words charged in the third and fourth counts of the declaration to have been spoken by defendant, if spoken at all, were spoken to the plaintiff and her friends whom she had brought with her as participants with her in an interview sought by them with the defendant in his place of business, they must equally be regarded as privileged communications.

"And there being no evidence to justify an imputation to the defendant of actual malice, the jury must find for the defendant."

The jury returned their verdict in these words: "We, the jury, upon the issue joined, find for the defendant, upon the instructions of the court."

It seems too well settled in this state to admit of extended discussion that, while it is within the province of the trial court to determine whether or not the occasion when alleged slanderous or insulting words were spoken or written was privileged, whether they were spoken or written with or without malice is a question for the jury, under proper instructions. Dillard v. Collins, 25 Grat. 353; Chaffin v. Lynch, 83 Va. 106, 1 S. E. 803; s. c., 84 Va. 884, 6 S. E. 474; Strode v. Clement, 90 Va. 557, 19 S. E. 177; Reusch v. Roanoke, etc., Co., 91 Va. 534, 22 S. E. 358; Brown v. N. & W. R. Co., 100 Va. 619, 42 S. E. 664, 60 L. R. A. 472; Tyree v. Harrison, 100 Va. 542, 42 S. E. 295.

It is true, as was held in Reusch v. Roanoke, etc., Co., supra, the court may properly refuse an instruction submitting the question of malice to the jury where "there is no legal evidence in the record to suggest malice," but, where there is evidence tending to show malice in the utterance of the words spoken, or in the published communication, that question cannot be properly taken from the jury.

"Where the defendant acts in performance of a duty, legal or social, or in defense of his own interests, the occasion is privileged; * * * but strong or violent language, disproportionate to the occasion, may raise an inference of malice, and thus lose the privilege that would otherwise attach to it." Tyree v. Harrison, supra.

It is also true, as contended by the learned counsel for defendant in error, that, where the words complained of were privileged communications, the burden is upon the plaintiff to prove actual malice before he can be entitled to a recovery. The plaintiff in such a case must show malice, either by construction of the spoken or written matter, or by facts or circumstances connected with that matter, or in the situation of the parties, adequate to authorize the conclusion. Dillard v. Collins, supra. But though the occasion is privileged, and strong and violent language is used, disproportionate to the occasion, it may raise an inference of malice, and thus lose the privilege that would otherwise attach to it; and whether such an inference is to be drawn from the language used, or the circumstances in which it is used, etc., is a question for the jury. The question of good faith, belief in the truth of the statement, and the existence of actual malice, remains, also, for the jury. Tyree v. Harrison, supra, and authorities cited.

As was said in the opinion in Dillard v. Collins, supra: "The law holds the ægis of its protection not only over the person and property of the citizen, but vigilantly guards as equally sacred his personal reputation and character. And where one assails the character of his fellow man, and would secure himself from responsibility upon the ground that what he has spoken or written was only done confidentially, and with no intent to injure, and without malice, he must be careful that what he said or wrote comes within the well-defined qualifications which the law attaches to confidential or privileged communications."

We do not mean to question at all the soundness of the ruling in Reusch v. Roanoke, etc., Co., supra, and other authorities cited and relied on by defendant in error, that the trial court may properly refuse an instruction submitting the question of malice to the jury "when there is no legal evidence in the record to suggest malice," etc., or may not instruct the jury in such a case that there is not such evidence in the record, but to say that when there is any legal evidence tending to prove that the language spoken or written was disproportional in strength and violence to the occasion when spoken or written, though the occasion was privileged, may raise an inference of malice, thereby destroying the privilege that would otherwise attach to it, and that, where there is such evidence in the record, the question of malice in the use of the words spoken or written cannot be properly taken from the jury.

As the case at bar has to be remanded for a new trial because of the error in not leaving to the jury the question whether the words alleged as slanderous were spoken maliciously or not, and in giving the court's own instruction, above set out, taking that question from the jury, we refrain from reviewing the evidence further than is necessary, in our opinion, to justify that conclusion.

It is an admitted fact that the plaintiff in error on November 5, 1900, obtained a handkerchief and a piece of ribbon from the stock of Thalheimer Bros., and carried them away with her that evening when she quit work. Therefore an important question in the case was whether she paid for them, or took them without making payment. She claimed that she did pay for them, while defendant in error insisted that she did not. In her testimony she swears to the use of the words, and as to the circumstances in which they were used, on November 6, 1900, as alleged in the first and second counts of the declaration; adding that defendant in error also said: "That accounts for the handkerchief you lost in the store, that you said your mother had bought up the street, that had our private mark on it." That when she was dismissed, defendant in error snatched a handkerchief from the front of her dress, and followed her through the store, waiving the handkerchief, saying, "There goes a thief, a thief," and that, when she was about to go out of the store, he jumped in front of her and said, "Don't you ever dare, as long as you live, to darken those doors again."

As to the charge in the third and fourth counts of the declaration, plaintiff in error testified as follows:

"Well, on the 17th of January father was sick, and I was out of employment, and could not get work, and I needed this money; and, being on the street with my aunt, I asked her to go in with me as I asked Mr. Moses [Thalhimer] for the money, and she consented to go with me; and when we went in I asked for Moses Thalhimer—asked one of the girls—and when he came to me I told him that when he discharged me he owed me for a week and three days, and I had come for a settlement. He replied: 'You won't get it. It took you a long time for you to find out that I owed you anything, and it will take you still longer to collect it.' He says: 'You know how to collect it. Go ahead and collect it.' He says: 'I find you are looking for trouble, and you will get it.' 'I let you down easy.' He said, 'You came into this store once before—for what?' He said, 'You had a gall to come in here before all these ladies, who know what you are.' He asked 'my aunt if she was mother. She replied, 'No.' He said: 'I caught that girl stealing in my store, and I can prove it. She is a thief, and a good one at that.' There were present Mrs. Pugh and my aunt, and there were two or three customers right near us. I don't remember who they were. They were near enough to turn around and listen to the conversation that passed. Then there was some other conversation, after which I left without getting the money."

The plaintiff in error was corroborated in her statement as to the occurrences of January 17, 1901, very fully, by her aunts, Mrs. Pugh and Mrs. Farley, who accompanied her to Thalhimer Bros.' store, and to some extent, at least, by other witnesses as to the occurrences of November 8, 1900, while defendant in error, testifying in his own behalf, denied the use of the language charged in the declaration, and the statements made by plaintiff in error, but insisted that the charge he made that the handkerchief and ribbon had been stolen was true, and he is corroborated by other witnesses examined in his behalf. Therefore there was a conflict in the evidence throughout on every material question in the case, and it was for the jury to determine the credibility of the witnesses, and the weight to be given to their statements. In other words, there was evidence tending to sustain the theory of plaintiff in error, and hence the question of whether there was malice on the part of defendant in error should have been submitted to the jury.

We are therefore of opinion that the circuit court erred in taking from the jury the question whether the words alleged as slanderous were spoken maliciously or not, and the judgment complained of must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had in accordance with this opinion.

WHEELWRIGHT et al. v. COMMON-WEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 28, 1905.)

RAILROAD—PARALLEL LINES—CONSTITUTION—STATUTE—CONSTRUCTION.

1. Under Const. § 166 [Va. Code 1904, p. cxli], providing that the Legislature shall have power to prevent, by statute repealable at pleasure, any railroad from being built parallel to the present line of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company, and the act concerning corporations (Acts 1902-04, p. 453, subc. 2, § 12 [Va. Code 1904, p. 542]), enacted pursuant thereto, providing that no railroad company chartered under the act shall have power to build any railroad parallel to its line, the paralleling of a short portion of that line for local purposes is not forbidden; the intent of the law being to prevent competition between Richmond and Washington, the termini of the roads.

Application by Thomas S. Wheelwright and others to the State Corporation Commission for a charter for the Richmond & Chesapeake Bay Railway Company. From an order refusing the charter, the applicants appeal. Reversed.

Munford, Williams, Hunton & Anderson, for appellants. Wm. A. Anderson, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

CARDWELL, J. Thomas S. Wheelwright and others presented to the State Corporation Commission articles of association, in order that they might be incorporated under the corporate name of the Richmond & Chesapeake Bay Railway Company; the articles of association presented being in accordance with the requirements of section 2 of subchapter 2 of an act concerning corporations, which became a law on the 21st day of May, 1903. Acts 1902-04, pp. 437-484, c. 270 [Va. Code 1904, pp. 533-543, § 1105b].

The purposes of the incorporation are the construction and operation of two railroads—one from the city of Richmond to a point on the Rappahannock river near Tappahannock, and, crossing the Rappahannock river, to have its terminus on the Chesapeake Bay at some point within the county of Northumberland or the county of Lancaster; the other line, from the city of Richmond to a point on the Chesapeake Bay within the counties of Gloucester, Mathews, or Middlesex, as may be selected by the company. As to both lines, the articles of association, in describing the route, provide that it shall be from within the city of Richmond, "thence through the counties of Henrico and Hanover, via the town of Ashland, or such other route as may be selected by said company." Following the words just quoted, there is a further description of the routes along which the proposed lines are to be run, but it is not necessary to the determination of the question presented to this court that they be set out here.

The town of Ashland is in Hanover county, about 16 miles north of the city of Richmond, and the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company has its line of railroad running from the city of Richmond to the town of Ashland, and beyond, through the county of Hanover, and further north. Under the proposed charter the applicants can construct and operate a railroad parallel to the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad line as far as the town of Ashland, and up to the point where the latter road crosses the county line of Hanover county, the distance of which parallel line would be 20 miles, or a little more.

The application for a charter to construct this so-called parallel line to Ashland, thence to Tappahannock and other points northeast of Richmond, was refused by the State Corporation Commission, not because the charter applied for would in fact conflict with section 12 of subchapter 2 (page 453 [Va. Code 1904, p. 542]) of the act concerning corporations, supra, but might possibly conflict therewith, the commission "perceiving no other objection to issuing the charter."

From the order of the Corporation Commission refusing to issue the charter, an appeal is taken to this court.

Section 166 of the present Constitution [Va. Code 1904, p. cclxi] gives the right to every railroad company in this state, subject to such reasonable regulations as may be prescribed by law, to parallel, intersect, connect with, or cross with its roadway any other railroad or railroads, but provides further as follows: "Nothing in this section shall deprive the General Assembly of the right to prevent by statute, repealable at pleasure, any railroad from being built parallel to the present line of the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad Company." Pursuant to section 166 of the Constitution, the Legislature enacted section 12 of subchapter 2 of the act concerning corporations, supra, which provides: "No railroad company chartered under this act, or whose charter may be amended under this act, shall have power to build any railroad parallel to the line of the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad."

The contention of appellants is that the intention of the statute was to forbid the issuing of a charter to build a railroad reasonably and substantially parallel with the entire line of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company, and that the statute cannot and should not be so construed as to prevent railroads running from Richmond City to other parts of Virginia from running a short distance in the same direction of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad, and that such lines could not and would not in any way interfere with the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad.

It is manifest from the opinion of the Corporation Commission, made a part of the record before us, that the commission considered the contention of appellants just set out as having great force, but denied the charter only for the reason, as the opinion states, that they deemed it best that the statute in question should be construed by this court, and its purpose and meaning finally fixed and settled. The opinion says:

"The great bulk of the business of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad consists of through traffic, and it is doubtless true that the running either of an electric or steam railroad from Richmond to Ashland would not interfere with the business of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad, but might, on the contrary, relieve it of local passenger business between Richmond and Ashland, which it would prefer to have handled by a local road. While it rather seems to us that the intention of the statute was not to forbid the chartering of a road such as that now asked for, yet we are of opinion that we should deny the charter asked for in these articles of incorporation. If the charter is granted and the corporation created, there seems to be no way in which the commission can recall the charter, and it is extremely doubtful whether the validity of the charter could be called in question by any one—even by the commonwealth itself—after the commission has issued it. In this particular case the commission takes this action because it has been intimidated by the applicants that if the charter is not granted an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court of Appeals. The commission deems it its duty to have the Court of Appeals pass upon this question as early as practicable, in order that it may be finally fixed and settled. Other applications may come before the commission, and, although it would be inclined to grant them, it would greatly prefer, before finally putting its own construction upon this statute, to have its proper interpretation and meaning passed upon by our Court of Appeals."

In the original charter granted by the General Assembly February 25, 1834 (Acts 1833-34, p. 127, c. 111), to the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad, to construct its road from Richmond City to the town of Fredericksburg, it was provided, among other things, that the General Assembly, in the event of the completion of the said railroad within the time limited by the act, would not, for the period of 30 years from the completion of said railroad, allow any other railroad to be constructed between the city of Richmond and the city of Washington, or for any portion of said distance, the probable effect of which would be to diminish the number of passengers between the one city and the other upon the railroad authorized by the act, or to compel the company, in order to retain such passengers, to reduce the passage money: "provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be construed as to prevent the Legislature, at any time hereafter from authorizing the construction of a railroad between the city of Richmond and the town of Tappahannock, or Urbana, or to any intermediate points between said city of Richmond and the said towns," etc.

On the 27th of March, 1848 (Acts 1847-48, p. 188, c. 154), the Legislature passed an act authorizing the Louisa Railroad Company, formerly chartered, and which had constructed and was operating its road between Louisa Court House and the junction with the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad, in Hanover county, about 25 miles north of the city of Richmond, to extend its road westward, and also from the junction to the dock in the city of Richmond; and in the case of Richmond, etc., Railroad v. Louisa Railroad Co. the validity of the last-named act was called in question, as impairing the contractual rights of the first-named road, entered into between its original incorporators and the state; but the superior court of chancery for the Richmond circuit and this court took the opposite view, which view, on an appeal taken from the refusal of an appeal by this court from the decree of the superior court of chancery denying an injunction to restrain the defendant from extending its road across the complainants' road at the junction to the city of Richmond, was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. 13 How. 71, 14 L. Ed. 53.

The last-named court, in its opinion, after stating the well-settled rules of construction of all such acts, and referring to the provision contained in the original charter of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company, above set out, says: "Construing this act with these principles in view, where do we find that the Legislature has contracted to part with the power to construct the railroad, even between Richmond and Fredericksburg, for carrying coal or other freight? Much less can they be said to have contracted that no railroad connected with the western part of the state shall be suffered to cross the complainant's road or run parallel to it in any portion of its route. Such a contract cannot be elicited from the letter or spirit of this section of the act."

It will be observed that the act here under consideration makes no reference to building a railroad, the line of which might parallel a part of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad, but makes reference only to the building of railroads parallel to the line of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad. Since, by an inspection of a map of the state of Virginia, it appears that a railroad cannot be built from the city of Richmond to the town of Tappahannock or Urbana, or for the benefit and development of that portion of Virginia in which those towns are situated, without paralleling to some degree the railroad owned and operated by the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company, to construe the statute as inhibiting this would be equivalent to saying that the constitutional convention and the Legislature intended that there should be no railroad constructed from the city of Richmond to the northeastern portion of the state—a section as much in need of railroad facilities as any portion of the state is now or has been, and as much deserving and as much entitled to such facilities as any other section of the state. Such a construction would result disastrously to the state's interests, in that it would prevent the construction of local railroad lines, even for a mile or two miles north of the city of Richmond, in any direction, for they would, in a sense, parallel the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad, or at least a portion thereof, if they ran in a northern direction from Richmond. If such was the purpose of the Legislature, it is inconceivable that it would not have been so declared in express terms.

It is obvious, also, that it is greatly to the interest of the city of Richmond and of the whole section through which appellants' contemplated road would pass that it be built, while, so far from interfering with the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad, such a road, by bringing the citizens and products of that section of northeast Virginia which now has no railroad to Richmond or to Ashland, and delivering the same to the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad for transportation to other points, would be of great benefit to that road, and would do it no possible injury. In fact, it should be stated in this opinion that the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company entertains this view, and in no way is it opposing the granting of the charter desired by appellants.

For the want of modern transportation facilities, the counties in the northeastern section of the state are so cut off from Richmond as to be almost entirely tributary to the city of Baltimore—certainly to make the latter city more easily and conveniently reached than the former. The whole state has an interest in the industrial development of that section, and the facilities to be afforded by the railroad which appellants propose to construct should not be denied to a people having none such, if any other construction of the statute in question can be reasonably adopted.

Statutes which interfere with legitimate enterprise, or limit the right to construct or operate legitimate industries, must be construed strictly. And in like manner, statutes which constitute an exception from a well-defined statutory policy are given a strict construction. Sutherland on Stat. Constr. §§ 370, 407.

By constitutional provisions and numerous statutes since 1865, whatever may have been the policy of the state prior to the Civil War, by which the state lent its resources and credit to works of internal improvements, the policy declared is that the greatest opportunity shall be given to private corporations to build railroads and other works of internal improvements for the development of the interests of the state. And while the Legislature has been careful to provide for the protection of the state's interest, as a stockholder, in the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad, neither in the policy in vogue since 1865, nor in the present Constitution, nor in the statute under consideration, are there any words or phrases used that would justify a denial of the charter applied for by appellants. The learned Attorney General frankly stated when this case was submitted for the consideration of this court that it was not, in his opinion, to the interest of the commonwealth to oppose the charter, and that it was the purpose of neither the constitutional provision nor the act in question to prevent the construction of such lines of railroad as proposed by appellants; that neither the letter nor the spirit of the act would be violated by the granting to them of the charter they ask. This was practically the view taken by the State Corporation Commission, in which we fully concur.

The purpose of section 166 of the Constitution and of the act was merely to protect the interest of the commonwealth in the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad by guarding against competition in the transportation of passengers between the city of Richmond and the city of Washington, and not to prohibit the granting of a charter to build a railroad line such as is contemplated by appellants, although the railroad they purpose building, strictly speaking, will parallel the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad for a short portion of its line, but not its entire line, whereby the road, when built, would become a competitor of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad for its through traffic between Richmond and Washington.

Whether or not the legislative act under consideration inhibits the granting of a charter to build a railroad paralleling the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad for a greater distance than is proposed by appellants, and whereby such paralleling road, when built, would become a competitor of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad for its through traffic between Richmond and Washington, we are not called upon to express an opinion in this cause, nor has it been our purpose, in anything that has been said, to do so.

It follows that the order of the State Corporation Commission appealed from must be reversed, and the cause remanded to the commission, that it may issue the charter applied for by appellants.

RICHMOND ICE CO. v. CRYSTAL ICE CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 23, 1905.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—DESTRUCTION OF BUILDINGS—LIABILITY FOR RENT—STATUTE—JURY QUESTION—INSTRUCTION—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—REMARK OF COURT—ERROR.

1. In an action for rent error cannot be based on the cross-examination of one of defendant's witnesses over the objection that the lease was in writing, and could not be contradicted or varied by parol, where the cross-examination was not as to the contents of the lease, but as to the purpose for which defendant had leased the premises.

2. Where, in an action for rent, there was evidence that the premises were rented merely to get an objectionable competitor of defendant out of business, counsel for plaintiff had a right to comment thereon in argument, though the testimony of a witness to show such fact had been excluded.

3. Where there was evidence as to what purpose the premises were rented for, but the testimony of a witness to show such fact had been excluded by the court, there was no error prejudicial to defendant in the court stating that the evidence was improperly excluded, when objection was made by defendant to a comment on such fact by counsel for plaintiff in argument to the jury.

4. Under the direct provisions of Code 1887, § 2455 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1207], the reduction in rent to which the tenant is entitled on the destruction of leased buildings without his fault is the diminished value of the leased premises to the tenant for his purposes.

5. Charges requested, which are covered by the instructions given, are properly refused.

6. In an action for rent, where the tenant relied on Code 1887, § 2455 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1207], providing that in case of the destruction of leased buildings without fault on the part of the tenant he shall be entitled to a reduction in rent equal to the diminished value of the leased premises for his purposes, and the evidence showed that the premises had been rented to keep a competitor from using them, it sustained a finding that the value of the leased premises for the tenant's purposes had not been diminished during the period in which the rent demanded accrued.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by the Crystal Ice Company against the Richmond Ice Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

S. S. P. Patterson for plaintiff in error.
Leake & Carter, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This is the second time this case has been before this court. Upon the former writ of error (89 Va. 239, 37 S. E. 851), after disposing of certain questions of pleading and practice, it was held that the liability of the tenant, the plaintiff in error, to pay the rent stipulated for in the contract sued on, was limited by the terms of section 2455 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1207], which allows a reduction of the rent where buildings are partially destroyed, without the fault or negligence of the tenant; and the action was remanded for a new trial.

When the case went back to the circuit court, the tenant, the Richmond Ice Company (plaintiff in error), filed a special plea of set-off, in which, after setting out the lease, it averred that, after leasing the premises in the declaration mentioned, a substantial portion of the buildings and structures used in connection therewith was demolished or destroyed, without fault or negligence on its part, by the action of ice, or an ice gorge, in James river, on which the premises were located, so that since the buildings were destroyed there have not been on the premises buildings of as much value to the tenant for its purposes as those which were so destroyed, by reason of which the leased premises are worth at least the sum of $80 per month less than they were before such destruction; and this sum, which amounts to $800, it offers to set off against the plaintiff company's demand.

Upon the trial of the cause there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The first error assigned is that the court erred in permitting the questions set out in bill of exceptions No. 2 to be answered by one of the defendant's witnesses (its general manager) on cross-examination.

The questions and answers objected to are as follows:

"Q. Were not you and the Crystal Ice Company engaged in business together at the time you made this lease?

"A. Interested in the same company; yes, sir.

"Q. And was not the purchase of this property from Warner Moore made by the Crystal Ice Company in consequence of a suggestion coming from you, or from your company, that it would be well to get Warner Moore out of business?

"A. I cannot answer positively about that. I knew there were negotiations going on in the formation of the Mutual Ice Delivery Company by Mr. Wingfield and myself. The first suggestion of the formation of the Mutual Ice Delivery Company came from Mr. Wingfield. Of course, I was willing to go into it, and I did. The object of the purchase of the property was to get Warner Moore out of the way."

The only objection made to this evidence was "that the lease is in writing, and its terms contain all of the agreements made by the parties," and that it cannot be contradicted, added to, or varied by parol evidence.

The questions to which objection was made do not refer to the contents of the lease, and the answers do not contradict, add to, or vary its terms in any manner. This being the only objection made to the evidence, it was properly overruled, even if the evidence had been objectionable on other grounds, as it clearly was not under the issue in this case.

The next error assigned is based upon bill of exceptions No. 3, which is as follows, leaving off the final parts:

"Q. How did your company come to buy this property?

"A. The property in dispute?

"Q. Yes, sir.

"A. On June 4, 1895, I was approached by Mr. Landerkin, who represented the Richmond Ice Company, and he said that Warner Moore & Co. had been a disturbing element in the ice business previous to that, and in the coal business also, by reason of his being a cutter of rates, which demoralized trade; and if we, who were interested in the ice business, would buy out the real estate of Warner Moore & Co., on which he had an option, they would guaranty to pay us interest at six per cent. on the investment in rental of the property"—which question and the answer thereto were at the time objected to by counsel for the defendant, and the objection sustained. But during the progress of the argument of the case, when plaintiff's counsel was making his closing argument and while he was stating to the jury that the purpose for which the premises were rented was to get Warner Moore & Co. out of the ice business as a competitor, objection was made by counsel for defendant to this line of argument on the ground that this question, when asked by plaintiff of witness Wingfield, on his examination, had been ruled out as improper, and the counsel for plaintiff said he was arguing on the evidence of Mr. Landerkin, the court overruled this objection, and said in the presence of the jury that, if its attention had been called to the statute, the objection of defendant to this question asked by plaintiff of Wingfield would not have been sustained, and permitted the counsel to continue his argument on that line. To this action of the court the defendant, by counsel, then and there objected and excepted."

There was evidence in the case tending to show for what purpose the premises were rented, and as that question was a material one in ascertaining what reduction in the rent, if any, the tenant was entitled to, as will be hereafter shown in considering the motion to set aside the verdict, counsel had the right to argue it. The statement of the court, in the presence of the jury, that it had improperly rejected evidence offered by the landlord, which it did not then admit, could not, so far as we can see, have prejudiced the tenant. The court did not err, therefore, in overruling the objection.

The landlord asked for three and the tenant for two instructions. The court rejected all of them, and gave two instructions of its own. The refusal of the court to give the tenant's instructions and the giving of its own in lieu thereof is assigned as error.

Upon the former writ of error it was contended by the landlord that the covenant in the lease by the tenant "to keep the plant and buildings in repair during the term of this lease" was not covered by section 2455 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1207], but was controlled by the common-law rule, and bound the defendant to rebuild and pay the rent without any abatement. But this court said, in disposing of that contention, that, taking the lease as a whole, "it seems clear that the intention of the parties was that the repairs to be made by the lessee during the lease were only the ordinary repairs indicated by the particular description used, such as broken glass, bursting water pipes, etc. It follows from what has been said that the liability of the lessee to pay rent provided for by the contract is prescribed and limited by the terms of section 2455 of the Code, which must be given full force and effect in determining the rights of the parties."

Section 2455 of the Code is as follows:

"No covenant or promise by a lessee to pay the rent, or that he will leave the premises in good repair, shall have the effect, if the buildings thereon be destroyed by fire or otherwise without fault or negligence on his part, or if he be deprived of the possession of the premises by the public enemy, of binding him to make such payment or erect such buildings again, unless there be other words showing it to be the intent of the parties that he should be so bound. But in case of such destruction, there shall be a reasonable reduction of the rent, for such time as may elapse until there be again upon the premises buildings of as much value to the tenant for his purposes as what may have been so destroyed; and in case of such deprivation of possession, a like reduction until possession of the premises be restored to him."

There was evidence tending to show that, if the tenant had made ordinary repairs on the wharf—that is, such repairs as would have to be made to correct wear and tear—it would not have been destroyed by the ice gorge.

It was clearly the duty of the tenant to make that kind of repairs under the terms of the lease as construed by the court on the former writ of error.

Whether or not the wharf was destroyed without fault or negligence on the part of the tenant was one of the questions to be passed upon by the jury, yet the tenant, in its instruction No. 2, erroneously assumed that it owed no such duty. By its instruction No. 1 the tenant asked the court to tell the jury that if, upon the facts hypothetically stated, it was entitled to a reduction of the rent, the plaintiff could only recover what the leased premises are reasonably worth generally, without the use of such buildings and structures, whereas the amount which a tenant is entitled to have the rent reduced under the statute is the diminished value of the leased premises "to the tenant for his purposes," caused by such destruction. For that reason the tenant's instruction No. 1 was erroneous.

The instructions given by the court are as follows:

(1) "The jury are instructed that they should find for the plaintiff any unpaid amount of the sum of one hundred dollars, stipulated in the lease as a monthly rent, and may allow interest on any such monthly installment from the time said monthly rent was due, unless they shall believe from all the evidence that the value to the defendant of the premises for its purpose was diminished without any fault or negligence of the defendant by reason of destruction of any building or structure on the premises by the ice or ice gorge set out in the defendant's special plea, in which event the jury should allow the defendant such abatement of the stipulated rent as they may believe from all the evidence to be a reasonable reduction of the rent on account of such destruction; but if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the injuries to the leased premises caused by said ice gorge spoken of herein were caused by the fault or negligence of the defendant, or that the premises were not rendered less valuable to the defendant thereby, they should make no reduction in the said rent on that account."

(2) "If the jury believe from all the evidence that any of the buildings or structures upon the leased premises were destroyed without fault or negligence of the defendant by the ice or ice gorge in defendant's plea set out, and were not, before the bringing of this suit, replaced in whole or in part, and that in consequence thereof the value of the premises to the defendant for its purposes was diminished, they are instructed that the defendant should be allowed a reasonable abatement therefor, and the plaintiff is only entitled to recover the agreed rent of $100 per month, less a reasonable estimate for defendant's damages occasioned by such destruction of buildings or structures."

These instructions cured the defects pointed out in the rejected instructions offered by the tenant, and fairly and fully instructed the jury upon the law as applicable to the evidence in the case.

The next and remaining assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence.

The jury allowed no reduction of rent, although it was clearly proved that there had been a destruction of the wharf and some structures on or connected therewith. At common law, where there was an express agreement to pay rent, as in this case, there could be no reduction of the rent on account of the destruction of the buildings on the leased premises. One of the reasons for that rule was that such liability was requisite to stimulate the tenant to the proper care of the premises, and to guard against frauds which the landlord is often not in a condition to establish. 2 Minor's Inst. 60, and cases cited.

Section 2455 of the Code modifies the common-law rule so as to allow a reduction of the rent on account of the destruction of buildings where they were destroyed without fault or negligence on the part of the tenant. It is not sufficient, to entitle him to a reduction in the rent, that the buildings on the leased premises have been destroyed, but it is made a condition to that right that they were destroyed without fault or negligence on his part.

It was therefore necessary for the tenant in its pleadings to aver (as it does) and prove that fact. That it was required to prove a negative does not affect the question, since the existence of that fact was necessary to the relief sought. 1 Greenleaf on Ev. §§ 78, 81; 1 Taylor on Ev. §§ 364 to 366. See, also, Reusens v. Lawson. 91 Va. 226, 253, 21 S. E. 347, and authorities cited.

Upon the question of whether or not the wharf was destroyed without fault or negligence on the part of the tenant the evidence is conflicting, and of such a character that a verdict in favor of the landlord on that point could not be disturbed by the court.

In order to maintain the issue on the part of the tenant, it was not only necessary for it to prove that the wharf had been destroyed without fault or negligence on its part, but that the value of the leased premises for its purposes was thereby diminished. The object for which the premises in question were leased, the use (or, rather, the nonuse) made of them by the tenant before, at the time of, and subsequent to the destruction of the wharf, clearly appear from the evidence of the manager of the tenant company, one of its own witnesses. Upon his cross-examination, among other things, that witness testified as follows:

"Q. So that, for going on two years you had not used this property at all?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. At the time the accident happened it had not been of any use to you at all?

"A. I was not using it, but it was a help to us.

"Q. In what respect?

"A. Because no one else could use it being in the business. That is the reason the place was bought in the first instance by the Crystal Ice Company—to get some one else out. * * *

"Q. Was not the inducement offered by your company to the Crystal Ice Company that if they would buy this property you would pay them a rent equal to six per cent. per annum on what it cost them?

"A. Yes, sir. There was three thousand tons of ice there. * * * The arrangement was that the Crystal Company would buy the property from Mr. Moore at a cost of $16,500, I think, and that the Richmond Ice Company would buy the ice on hand, the coal he had on hand, his horses and wagons, in fact all of his personal property, and in addition lease the property from the Crystal Ice Company for ten years for $1,200 a year.

"Q. And that was done to get Warner Moore out of business?

"A. There was three thousand tons of ice there. There is no question about the lease. We rented the property for ten years, and paid the rent for forty-three months.

"Q. And you say that before the flood—before the property was injured—you had not used the property for nearly two years?

"A. Do you know why?

"Q. Will you tell me?

"A. Because when we bought the property we were handling Kennebec river ice to furnish our quota to the Mutual. After handling northern ice for, I think, two years, Mr. Wingfield having a surplus at his factory, I made a contract with him. I figured I could better afford to pay rent and take ice from him, and do away with northern ice.

"Q. You had no further use for the property?

"A. No, I paid rent until the gorge.

"Q. So for two years before the gorge you had no use for this property, and did not use it?

"A. Exactly.

"Q. How did the gorge hurt you?

"A. It hurt me by preventing me from disposing of it to anybody else.

"Q. Did you try to dispose of it?

"A. No.

"Q. It seems you had two opportunities to dispose of it?

"A. Yes.

"Q. You had two opportunities to dispose of it after the gorge and did not think it prudent to do so?

"A. No, because I thought I had better pay the rent and have the management of it. * * *

"Q. And although you had an offer twice after this thing happened, once at $600 and once at $700, you decided not to take it?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. And you had not been using the property for two years—about two years—before the ice gorge?

"A. For good business reasons I did not. I thought I could make more money by not using it."

From this evidence and other evidence it appears that the object of the tenant in making the lease was to get rid of a rival in business, and to stop the use of the premises for the purposes for which they were constructed; that they were not in use when the wharf was destroyed; that they had not been in use for more than one year—perhaps as much as two years—prior to that time; and that they were not used afterwards during the period in which the rent accrued which is sought to be recovered in this action; and the reason given is that the tenant could make more money by not using them.

Under the facts and circumstances disclosed by the record the jury were warranted in reaching the conclusion that the value of the leased premises for the tenant's purposes had not been diminished during the period in which the rent demanded accrued, and that it was therefore not entitled to any reduction in the rent.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and that it must be affirmed.

STULTZ v. PRATT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 2, 1905.)

QUO WARRANTO—RETURN OF WRIT—RETURN TO SPECIAL TERM—STATUTES.

1. Va. Code 1904, p. 1633, § 3060, provides, in section 3032, that there may be tried at special term any civil case not tried at the last preceding term, any motion cognizable by the court, any criminal case which could be tried at a regular term, and any controversy ready for hearing at law or in chancery, though it could not have been heard at the preceding term; and section 3024, p. 1612, provides that, where the reasons stated in a petition for quo warranto are legally sufficient, the writ shall be returnable to the next term of the court. Held, that a writ of quo warranto may not be returned to a special term, the phrase "next term" in section 3024 referring to a regular term, and the matter not being within section 3062.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Henry County.

Quo warranto proceedings on the relation of Thomas G. Pratt to determine the right of Brice Stultz to the office of superintendent of the poor for the county of Henry. From a judgment overruling a motion to quash the writ, respondent appeals. Reversed.

H. G. Mullins and John W. Carter, for appellant. Gravely & Gravely, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court for Henry county, rendered at a special term thereof, in a proceeding of quo warranto instituted by the attorney for the commonwealth for that county, at the relation of Thomas G. Pratt, against Brice Stultz, to determine which of the two was the legal and rightful superintendent of the poor for that county.

The petition for the writ was presented to the judge of that court in vacation, as was authorized by section 3023, p. 1612, Va. Code 1904, and was made returnable to the first day of the next term of the court, namely, the 15th day of February, 1904, which was a special term.

On that day the defendant, Stultz, appeared, and moved the court to quash the writ on the ground that the same was not legally returnable to or cognizable by the court at that term. But the court overruled his motion, to which action of the court he excepted. Thereupon, by consent of parties, the cause was submitted to the court for decision in vacation, and on the 29th of March following a vacation judgment was entered in favor of the relator. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The action of the court overruling the motion to quash the writ is assigned as error. As the question raised by that assignment of error goes to the jurisdiction of the court to render the judgment complained of, it will be first considered.

By section 3060, p. 1633, of the Code of 1904, it is provided how and when special terms of circuit courts may be appointed.

Section 3062 declares what class of cases and controversies may be tried at such special terms: (1) Any civil case which could lawfully have been, but was not, tried at the last preceding term that was or should have been held; (2) any motion for a judgment, or other motion cognizable by such court, whether it was pending at the preceding term or not; (3) any criminal case which could be tried if it were a regular term; (4) and any cause or matter of controversy at law or in chancery then ready for hearing, or which may be made ready by consent of parties, may with the consent of parties to such cause or controversy, although it could not have been lawfully heard at the preceding term that was or should have been held.

It is clear, we think, that the proceeding in this case is not within either of the classes of cases or controversies which it is provided may be heard at a special term, and that the writ could not be made returnable to that term, unless, as is contended, section 3024, p. 1612, authorizes it. That section provides that, where the reasons stated in the petition for a writ of quo warranto are sufficient in law in the opinion of the court or judge to whom it is presented, the writ shall be awarded by the court or judge, as the case may be, returnable to the next term of the court. As the "next term" of the court was the special term, it is insisted that was the term to which the writ was properly returnable.

The word "term" in some instances may include both regular and special terms. But, as a general rule, when a statute speaks of terms of court, the regular terms fixed by law are meant, and not the special terms appointed by the courts or judges. See Com. v. Sessions of Norfolk, 5 Mass. 435; Smith v. Cutler, 10 Wend. 590, 25 Am. Dec. 580; Tompkins v. Clackamas, 11 Or. 364, 366, 4 Pac. 1210; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Pl. & Pr. 600.

There is no more reason for holding that the words "next term," in section 3024, include "special term," than there would be in holding that they should receive the same meaning when used in other sections of the Code, where they are never construed to include special terms.

By section 3287, p. 1731, it is provided that every office judgment in a case where there is no order for an inquiry of damages, and every nonsuit or dismissal entered in the clerk's office, shall, if not previously set aside, become final, if the case be in a circuit court, on the last day of the next term, or the fifteenth day thereof, whichever shall happen first.

In section 3446, p. 1829, it is provided that, where an injunction is dissolved, the bill shall stand dismissed of course, with costs, unless sufficient cause be shown against such dismissal at the next term of the court after the dissolution.

To hold that the word "term" in sections

3287 and 3446 includes special terms would result in great injustice and wrong. Litigants know when regular terms of court come. They are fixed by law. They prepare their cases and put in their defenses accordingly. They may not, and generally do not, actually know anything of the time when special terms may be appointed; yet, if the construction insisted upon were correct, office judgments and dismissals in the office would become final, and bills would stand dismissed if a special term intervened before the next regular term.

The true rule of construction is, we think, that, where the word "term" is used in a statute with reference to courts, it should be construed to mean a regular term fixed by law, and not a special term fixed by the court, unless it is otherwise expressly provided or clearly implied from the act.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the writ in this case was made returnable to the special term without authority of law, and that the motion to quash should have been sustained, and the proceeding dismissed. For this error the judgment complained of must be reversed, and this court will enter such order as the circuit court ought to have entered.

KLOSS v. COMMONWEALTH.

PEDDLERS—TAKING ORDERS BY SAMPLES—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

1. A traveling salesman, who carries samples and takes orders for brooms from merchants in lots of a dozen or more, and afterwards delivers the brooms, which are shipped to him from the factory, is not a peddler requiring a license, within Act April 16, 1903, § 50, as amended May 13, 1903 [Va. Code, 1904, pp. 2223-2224], defining as such all persons who carry goods from place to place for sale, and all persons who offer goods for sale without having a regular place of business.

2. A revenue law requiring peddlers to obtain a license, being penal in so far as it imposes a penalty for a violation of its provisions, must be strictly construed.

Error to Corporation Court of City of Fredericksburg.

John Kloss was convicted of carrying on the business of peddler without a license, and brings error. Reversed.

Chas. L. Page, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

BUCHANAN, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the corporation court of the city of Fredericksburg affirming a judgment of the mayor of that city finding John Kloss, the plaintiff in error, guilty of carrying on the business of a peddler without first having obtained a license therefor as required by section or paragraph 50 of the tax bill approved April 16, 1903, as amended by an act approved May 13, 1903 (Appendix to Va. Code 1904, pp. 2223, 2224).

That section, so far as it is material to a consideration of this case, is as follows: "Any person who shall carry from place to place any goods, wares or merchandise, and offer to sell or barter the same, or actually sell or barter the same, shall be deemed to be a peddler. * * * All persons who do not keep a regular place of business (whether it be in a house, on a vacant lot, or elsewhere), open at all times in regular business hours, and at the same place, who shall offer for sale goods, wares and merchandise, shall be deemed peddlers under this act. And all persons who do keep a regular place of business open at all times in regular business hours, and at the same place, and who shall personally or through their agents, offer for sale or sell, and at the time of such offering or sale deliver goods, wares and merchandise, shall also be deemed peddlers as above. * * *"

The evidence shows that the plaintiff in error was the traveling salesman of one Chalkley, who carried on the business of a broom manufacturer in the city of Manchester. The salesman's method of doing business was to go from place to place; his employer shipping him from the factory, by rail, to the freight depot at each place on the salesman's route, brooms in such quantities as would, in their opinion, be sufficient to supply the trade at such point. The shipments were so timed as to reach the salesman on his arrival at each place. From the shipments so made, the salesman would select one or two brooms as samples, and with these go around and drum the town for orders; taking orders only from merchants, and never for less than dozen lots. After taking all such orders as he could get in the place, the salesman would go to the freight depot, and there "shape up" his brooms, and fill the orders taken by delivering the goods. It further appears that this method of selling brooms was an established feature of the business of broom manufacture, rendered necessary to avoid injury to the brooms by bending and breaking the straw when shipped in small lots from the factory.

The only question presented here is whether the plaintiff in error, in doing the acts he did without a license, came within the provisions of the statute quoted.

It was conceded by the Attorney General in oral argument, and properly so, that the business in which the plaintiff in error was engaged was not within the spirit of the act in question. Nor do we think that it is clearly within the letter of that law. If the plaintiff in error had gone from place to place in the state and taken orders for the brooms manufactured by his principal, and sent such orders to the latter at his place of business in Manchester, to be filled by him, the plaintiff in error could not be regarded as a peddler. Neither would he be a peddler if, instead of sending such orders to his principal to be filled, he had notified him of the amount of brooms necessary to fill the orders taken, and the brooms had been shipped to him from the factory, or he had gone to the factory and gotten the goods, and filled the orders theretofore taken by him.

¶ 1. See Hawkers and Peddlers, vol. 26, Cent. Dig. §§ 3-4.

In the case of Rex v. McKnight, 10 Barn. & Cres. 734, the accused was in the employ of a tea dealer, and was sent by his master about the neighboring country once every fortnight soliciting orders, and on subsequent occasions was sent to deliver small parcels of tea in pursuance of those orders. This was held not to be an exposing for sale, or a carrying to sell, within the meaning of the hawkers' and peddlers' act, so as to subject the defendant to a penalty for trading without a license.

In Village of Stamford v. Fisher, 140 N. Y. 187, 35 N. E. 500, the defendant had a wagon, with which he made trips to the village, filling his previous orders and taking new ones at the various houses. It was held that this failed to establish a violation of the town ordinance prohibiting all persons "from hawking or peddling in the public streets" of the village.

In Com. v. Ober, 12 Cush. 493, it was held that it was not a violation of the Massachusetts statute concerning hawking and peddling for an agent to go about delivering to traders in the country goods made by his principals, in Boston, which had been previously ordered by such traders. See, also, Com. v. Farnum, 114 Mass. 267.

In Com. v. Eichenberg, 140 Pa. 158, 21 Atl. 258, it was held that one who travels through the county as the employé of a store kept therein, and without a license solicits orders, and afterwards delivers goods to the person ordering, is not a peddler, within the meaning of the peddlers' act involved in that case.

In State v. Frank, 130 N. C. 724, 41 S. E. 785, 89 Am. St. Rep. 885, it was held that one who travels from house to house on foot, exhibiting samples of goods and taking orders, which he sends to his principals, in another state, who ship them to him, and he afterwards delivers such goods, is not a peddler.

The plaintiff did not carry brooms from place to place for sale. He was merely the salesman of a manufacturer who had a regular place of business, and who shipped from the factory to each point the salesman visited goods to fill such orders as he secured at such place. The goods with which orders were filled at each place where the salesman took orders were shipped directly from the factory to such place, and not from one place along the salesman's route to another.

The mere fact that brooms were shipped from the factory, the principal's place of business, so as to enable the salesman to fill the orders after they were taken by him, instead of having the goods shipped to him after the orders were taken, does not, it seems to us, work such a change in the character of the business as to make the plaintiff in error a peddler, within the meaning of our statute, where such a method of business was adopted, not for the purpose of evading the revenue laws, but because that mode of delivery was an established feature in the business of manufacturing brooms.

The rule is universal, except where otherwise provided by statute, that penal statutes are to be construed strictly, and are never to be extended by implication. This rule applies with full force to a case like the present, for, while the statute on which the prosecution is based is a revenue law, yet, in so far as it imposes penalties for a violation of its provisions, it is a penal statute, and must be construed accordingly.

"No man," said the court in Harris v. Com., 81 Va. 240, 243, 59 Am. Rep. 666, "incurs a penalty unless the act which subjects him to it is clearly within the spirit and the letter of the statute imposing the penalty." Sutherland on Statutory Constr. § 348.

It follows from what has been said that we are of opinion that the judgment complained of is erroneous, and must be reversed, and the prosecution dismissed.

RICHMOND PASSENGER & POWER CO. v. ALLEN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 2, 1905.)

STREET RAILWAYS—VEHICLES—CARE—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A street railway company operating its railway upon a public street cannot run down a vehicle from behind, under any ordinary circumstances, without negligence or willful wrong.

2. It is not negligence to drive a vehicle, with curtains down on the sides and rear, upon the tracks of a street railway in a public street.

8. Where, upon the whole record, a different verdict could not have been found, the judgment will not be reversed because of error in giving or refusing instructions.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by Sally W. Allen against the Richmond Passenger & Power Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Henry Taylor, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Smith, Moncure & Gordon, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This action was brought by Mrs. Sally W. Allen against the Richmond Passenger & Power Company to recover damages for injuries resulting to her from the alleged negligence of the defendant company in running one of its cars upon the vehicle in which she was riding.

¶ 1. See Street Railroads, vol. 44, Cent. Dig. §§ 190-194.

It appears that Mrs. Allen, a few minutes after 6 o'clock on the morning of the 5th of December, 1902, was driving a Dayton wagon, with side and rear curtains down, along Lester street, in the city of Richmond, in a westerly direction; that upon this street the defendant company was operating a double-track street car line, and that she was driving upon the track upon which it ran its west-bound cars; that she had been driving upon that track for several squares when one of the defendant company's cars ran into the rear of her wagon, tilting the wheels, and shoving the wagon upon the horse, causing him to run away, and resulting in the injuries complained of.

The plaintiff and her companion in the wagon both testify that they heard no bell, and had no warning of the approach of the car until their vehicle was struck. The motorman testifies that the gong was sounded, but when or where does not appear. He further states that he was running at a moderate rate of speed; that the morning was dark and cloudy, and his headlight was burning. He gives as a reason why he did not stop his car before running upon the wagon that there was a curve in the track, which threw the light away from the track, and not upon the wagon in front of him, so that he could not see the wagon; and that he did all he could to stop after he saw it. It clearly appears, however, from this motorman's own evidence, that it was sufficiently light for him to have seen the wagon without the aid of the headlight, for he testifies that he stopped as soon as he struck the wagon, and saw the horse, while it was running away, until the wagon struck an east-bound car a square or more distant and was turned over; all of which he thinks occurred in two minutes. From a map filed by the defendant, it seems the track was straight for several squares east of where the wagon was struck, and very slightly, if at all, curved at that point.

If the motorman did not see the plaintiff's wagon moving along in front of him, it was, under the facts and circumstances disclosed by his own evidence, because he was not keeping a proper lookout. Under the facts shown by the record the defendant company was clearly guilty of negligence in the management of its car.

A street car company operating its railway upon a public street cannot run down a vehicle from behind, under any ordinary circumstances, without negligence or willful wrong. Vincent v. Norton & Taunton St. Ry. Co., 180 Mass. 104, 61 N. E. 822; Richmond Traction Co. v. Clark, 101 Va. 382, 386-388, 43 S. E. 618.

The plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence under the facts of this case. It is not negligence to drive a vehicle, with curtains down on sides and rear, upon the tracks of a street railway in a public street. The duty she owed the car coming up behind her was to get off the track when she knew of its approach. She did not know of it. If the gong was sounded, or any other warning given, neither she nor her companion heard it. They were not bound to keep an impossible watch to the rear to avoid an injury which, under any ordinary circumstances, could only result from culpable negligence or willful wrong on the part of the defendant company. Vincent v. Norton & Taunton St. Ry. Co., supra; R. & P. Ry. Co. v. Rubin, 102 Va. 809, 47 S. E. 834; Richmond Traction Co. v. Clark, supra.

Upon the whole record a different verdict could not have been rightly found. It is therefore unnecessary to examine the propriety of the rulings of the court in giving and refusing instructions, since a decision of that question could not affect the result. Southern Ry. Co. v. Oliver, 102 Va. 710, 47 S. E. 862; Moore v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 103 Va. —, 48 S. E. 887, and cases cited.

The judgment complained of is plainly right, and must be affirmed.

GLOBE FURNITURE CO. v. TRUSTEES OF JERUSALEM BAPTIST CHURCH.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES—CONTRACTS BY TRUSTEES —JUDGMENT—LIEN.

1. Va. Code 1904, p. 773, § 1398, validates conveyances for the use of any religious congregation as a place of worship, and provides that the land shall be held for no other purpose. Section 1399, p. 774, provides for the appointment of trustees, on application of the congregation, to effect the purpose of a conveyance, and that the legal title shall vest in the trustees. Section 1405, p. 776, provides that a congregation may sell or incur church property, the proceeds to be disposed of as the congregation may wish; and section 1406 provides that trustees may effect an incumbrance on or a sale of such real estate, on the wish of the congregation, the court to make an order for proper reinvestment of the proceeds; and by section 1402, p. 775, the trustees may sue in their own name to recover any land, and be sued in relation to the same. Held, that the trustees have no power of their own volition to alien or incur the real estate, and a judgment against the trustees of a church for the price of pews purchased by them for the church was binding on the trustees individually, but not on the real estate, or the proceeds of a sale thereof.

Appeal from Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Suit by the Globe Furniture Company against the trustees of Jerusalem Baptist Church. From a decree in favor of defendants, complainant appeals. Affirmed.

P. A. Agelasto and W. W. Old, for appellant. A. B. Seldner, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. The question involved in this case is whether or not the judgment asserted constitutes a lien upon the lot, and nouse of worship thereon, of the appellees, or upon the proceeds of sale thereof.

It appears that two of the trustees of the church bought of the appellant certain pews and church furniture, which were delivered and placed in the church. The debt thus created not having been paid, suit was brought by the appellant, and judgment by default obtained against the several trustees of the church. The object of the present chancery suit is to enforce this judgment as a lien upon the real estate of the church, or upon the proceeds of the sale of a part of its church lot to the city of Norfolk.

Churches in Virginia are not incorporated, and, under the policy of our law, cannot be. The property they are permitted to hold, and its use, are fixed by statute. Church trustees are creatures of statute, and their powers are limited by the law that authorizes their appointment.

Section 1398 of the Code of 1887, as amended and found in Va. Code 1904, p. 773, validates every conveyance, devise, or dedication for the use and benefit of any religious congregation as a place for public worship which has been made since January 1, 1877, or shall thereafter be made, and provides that the land shall be held for such use or benefit and for such purpose, and not otherwise.

Section 1399 of the Code, as amended and carried into Va. Code 1904, p. 774, provides the method of appointment of trustees, upon the application of the proper authorities of the congregation, in order to effect or promote the purpose of such conveyance, devise, or dedication, and that the legal title to such land shall, for that purpose and object, be vested in the trustees.

Section 1405 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 776] provides how a congregation may proceed to sell or incumber church property; and section 1406, as amended and found in Va. Code 1904, p. 776, provides how trustees may, by suit in the proper court, effect an incumbrance upon, or a sale or exchange of, such real estate, provided it shall appear to be the wish of the congregation.

Section 1402, as amended and found in Va. Code 1904, p. 775, provides that church trustees may sue in their own names to recover any land or other property held by them in trust, or damages for any injury thereto, and be sued in relation to the same.

It is very plain that this section has no reference to suits of the character we are considering, but relates only to suits by or against the trustees touching the property, the legal title to which is vested in them.

It is clear from the statute law to which we have adverted that the trustees of a church merely hold the legal title to the real estate conveyed, devised, or dedicated for the use and benefit of the religious congregation at whose instance they have been appointed, and have no power of their own volition, and in their capacity as trustees, to either alien or incumber such real estate.

The judgment asserted is valid as to the individuals against whom it was obtained, but it has no validity as a lien upon the real estate of the appellees. If the church property could be incumbered by this method, the statutes mentioned would be useless, and it would be in the power of church trustees appointed merely to hold the legal title to sweep away their house of worship without the authority or even knowledge of the religious congregation that had acquired it.

If the judgment constitutes no lien upon the real estate of the congregation, it for the same reason is no lien upon the proceeds of that part thereof taken for street purposes by the city of Norfolk. When the sale is made at the instance of the congregation, under section 1405, the proceeds are to be disposed of by the court in such manner as the congregation may desire. And when the sale is made at the instance of the trustees, under section 1406, the court is to make the necessary order for the proper reinvestment of such proceeds.

We have dealt with the legal rights of the parties to this litigation. It is hardly necessary to add that nothing we have said has been intended as approving the course of this congregation in failing to pay for pews and other church furniture used and enjoyed by them. Such conduct is in the highest degree reprehensible.

The lower court committed no error in sustaining the demurrer to the original and supplemental bills filed by the appellant, and the decree complained of must therefore be affirmed.

NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. v. TOWN OF SUFFOLK.

BUSINESS LICENSE—RAILROAD COMPANIES—MUNICIPAL AUTHORITY—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

1. Suffolk Town Charter, § 18, providing that "whenever any business, trade, occupation, calling, or any other thing, is to be done within the town for which a state license is or may be required, the council may require a town license to be had for doing the same," authorizes an ordinance imposing a license tax on a railroad company doing business in the town, though it is for a failure to transact its business as provided by Code 1887, § 1200, in addition to its common-law liability, amenable, under section 1201, to a fine.

2. Suffolk Town Charter, § 18, providing for an occupation tax, as applied to the business of a railroad company, is not in conflict with Const. art. 10, § 4 [Va. Code 1904, p. cclxii, § 170], permitting the Legislature to impose license tax on any business which cannot be reached by the ad valorem system.

Error to Circuit Court, Nansemond County.

Action by the town of Suffolk against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company to recover a license fee. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Geo. S. Bernard, Legh. R. Watts, and Jos. I. Doran, for plaintiff in error. J. U. Burges, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This controversy involves the construction of section 18 of the charter of the town of Suffolk, and the validity of an ordinance passed in pursuance thereof, imposing a license tax of $50 on the plaintiff in error for the privilege of conducting its business in that town.

The language of the charter pertinent to this inquiry is as follows: "Whenever any business, trade, occupation, calling, or any other thing, is to be done within the town of Suffolk for which a state license is or may under the Constitution of this state or the Constitution and laws of the United States be required, the council may require a town license to be had for doing the same."

Conceding the soundness of the proposition that the intention of the state to clothe a municipal corporation with a portion of its own sovereignty in the matter of levying taxes must be manifested in plain and unambiguous terms, the court is nevertheless of opinion that the phraseology of the charter in question measures up to that requirement. Language substantially the same as that employed in this instance has been so repeatedly and so recently construed by this court to confer upon a municipality a general power of taxation, subject only to such limitations as may be imposed by the Constitution of the state or of the United States, that a discussion of the subject would be unprofitable. Ould & Carrington v. City of Richmond, 23 Grat. 464, 14 Am. Rep. 139; Humphreys v. City of Norfolk, 25 Grat. 97; City of Norfolk v. Norfolk Landmark Co., 95 Va. 564, 28 S. E. 959; Newport News, etc., R. Co. v. City of Newport News, 100 Va. 157, 40 S. E. 645; Woodall v. City of Lynchburg, 100 Va. 318, 40 S. E. 915; Blanchard v. City of Bristol, 100 Va. 469, 41 S. E. 948; City of Norfolk v. Griffith-Powell Co., 102 Va. 115, 45 S. E. 889; Gordon v. City of Newport News, 102 Va. 649, 47 S. E. 828.

It is sought, however, to distinguish this case from the foregoing authorities on the theory that the Legislature cannot be presumed to have intended to authorize the town of Suffolk to impose upon the plaintiff in error a license tax, enforceable by fine, for doing a business which it was required by statute to transact under pain of forfeiture. (The sections of the Virginia Code of 1887, relied on—sections 1200 and 1201—have since been repealed. Acts 1904, p. 55.)

The argument is more specious than sound, and, carried to its logical conclusion, would have afforded a ready means of escape from taxation to a large class of businesses of a quasi public nature, for the exercise of which a license tax might have been imposed under the Constitution of 1869; for example, ordinary keepers, express, telegraph, and telephone companies, street railroad companies, and the like.

The statute is declaratory merely of the common-law duty of transportation companies; and for a failure to discharge that duty, independently of statute, they would be liable in damages to any person injuriously affected by the omission. The differentiating features, therefore, between a railroad company and other common carriers, is that for a failure to discharge the duties enumerated in section 1200 the former was, in addition to its common-law liability, amenable, under section 1201, to a forfeiture of not less than $25 nor more than $100, recoverable by the injured party by motion or action. So far, consequently, as the argument that the Legislature cannot be presumed to have intended to delegate to the town of Suffolk authority to demand a license tax of a railroad company for doing that which the law required it to do is concerned on principle the argument is equally applicable to all other public service corporations.

That the business of railroad companies may be subjected to a license tax is distinctly declared in the cases of Anniston v. Southern Ry. Co., 112 Ala. 557, 20 South. 915, and Florida Cent. R. R. Co. v. City of Columbia (S. C.) 32 S. E. 408.

In Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 378, 2 Sup. Ct. 265, 27 L. Ed. 419, it was said: "That the power of the state to authorize any city within its limits to enforce a license tax on trades or callings generally, especially those which are quasi public, cannot be disputed; and that, whether a license fee is exacted under the power to regulate or the power to tax, is a matter of indifference if the power to do either exists." See, also, Postal Tel. C. Co. v. City Council of Charleston, 153 U. S. 692, 14 Sup. Ct. 1094, 38 L. Ed. 871.

It must be observed that the ordinance under consideration does not make the payment of the license tax a condition precedent upon which the right of the plaintiff in error to carry on its business depends. It merely imposes the tax, and the ability to fine for a violation of the ordinance is a remedial incident of the original power. Blanchard v. City of Bristol, supra.

This is made plain by the case of Home Ins. Co. v. City of Augusta, 93 U. S. 123, 23 L. Ed. 825, where, in discussing the character of a license tax, the court said: "This court (in the License Tax Cases, 5 Wall. 462, 18 L. Ed. 497) held that the payment required was a special tax, levied in the manner described; that the penalty provided was a mode of enforcing its payment; and that the license, when issued, was only a receipt for the tax. * * * In the ordinance in question the tax is designated 'a license tax,' but its payment is not made a condition precedent to the right to do business.

No special penalty is prescribed for its non-payment, and no second license is required to be taken out. Had the ordinance been otherwise in these particulars, we have seen, viewing the subject in the light of the License Tax Cases, that the result would have been the same."

Finally, it is insisted that, if the Legislature, by section 18 of the charter, intended to give the town council power to require a railroad company to take out a license and pay a tax for the privilege of doing business therein, the section is unconstitutional, because contrary to the provisions of section 4 of article 10 of the state Constitution [Va. Code 1904, p. cclxii, § 170].

That section, it will be recalled, after authorizing the levy of a license tax upon certain specified businesses, concludes: "and all other businesses that cannot be reached by the ad valorem system."

With respect to the foregoing provision this court said, in Gordon v. City of Newport News, supra: "The Legislature, or a municipality possessing full powers of taxation under its charter, must decide primarily whether a particular business can or cannot be reached by the ad valorem system; and with the exercise of their discretion the courts may not interfere, except in case of a plain departure from the constitutional requirement. The question is one of power, and not of policy, so far as the courts are concerned; and they are without authority to control legislative discretion, even if, in their opinion, it is violative of sound principles of political economy, unless in its exercise it contravenes some provision of the Constitution of the state or of the United States. Subject only to that limitation, the discretion of the legislative department of the government in the administration of the fiscal affairs of the commonwealth is exclusive and supreme."

It not only cannot be affirmed that the imposition of a license tax on the business of the plaintiff in error is "a plain departure from the constitutional requirement," but, under similar charters, such action on the part of city councils has been sanctioned by this court in the analogous cases of Newport News, etc., R. Co. v. City of Newport News, supra, and Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. City of Norfolk, 101 Va. 125, 43 S. E. 207.

In the latter case the court said: "A city ordinance imposing a privilege tax on a telegraph company is not in conflict with section 4, art. 10, of the Constitution of this state [Va. Code 1904, p. cclxii, § 170], permitting the Legislature to impose a license tax on any business which cannot be reached by the ad valorem system. The tax imposed by the ordinance is a tax imposed upon the privilege of doing business in the city, and is wholly different from a property tax. It is immaterial that the state taxes the property of the company on the ad valorem system. The two subjects of taxation are wholly ly different, and both may be taxed without being obnoxious to the objection that it is double taxation."

The above authorities show conclusively that the last contention is without merit, and cannot be maintained.

It must be remembered that this case arose under the Constitution of 1869, and what has been said with respect to the power of the defendant in error to impose the license tax in question has no reference to a case arising under the present Constitution.

For these reasons the judgment of the circuit court of Nansemond county is without error, and must be affirmed.

WILLIAMSON et al. v. PAYNE et al.

APPEAL AND ERROR—AMOUNT—BURDEN—TRUST DEED—PERSONAL PROPERTY—DESCRIPTION—COSTS.

1. Generally speaking, the value or amount in controversy must be made to appear affirmatively on appeal, but where the original demand is pecuniary and in excess of the jurisdictional amount, and is alleged by the appellee to have been reduced below that amount by payment, the onus rests upon him to make that fact appear.

2. Costs of executing the trust and of drawing and recording the deed are, when secured by the deed, to be considered part of the amount in controversy, when the deed is attacked.

3. Where there is a description of the property mortgaged, and the description is true, and by the aid of such description and the surrounding circumstances a third person would, in the ordinary course of things, know the property was mortgaged, the description is sufficient.

4. The recording of a trust deed of personal property, which furnishes a stranger with a means of identifying the property, gives constructive notice.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Henry County.

Bill by one Williamson and others against one Payne and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Hairston & Gravely, S. A. Anderson, and Geo. H. Marshall, for appellants. L. W. Anderson, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. The facts of this case necessary to be stated are as follows: Appellants, who are creditors by deeds of trust of the Franklin Log & Lumber Company, together with their respective trustees, filed a bill in equity in the circuit court of Henry county for an injunction to restrain the grantors in said deeds and other persons from removing or in any manner interfering with the trust property. The bill further prays for the appointment of a receiver, and for the sale of the trust subject, and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the debts secured.

At the December term, 1903, the court awarded an injunction and appointed a receiver in accordance with the prayer of the bill, and also directed the receiver to take possession of the trust property, sell the live stock at public auction, and to deposit the proceeds of sale in bank, subject to the order of the court.

At the same term the appellee Cassell recovered a judgment against the Franklin Log & Lumber Company for more than $300, and, having subsequently caused an execution to issue on the judgment, intervened in the suit in equity, and asserted priority of lien for the execution to the demands of appellants upon the property in controversy.

From a decree in the cause sanctioning that contention, this appeal was allowed. The ground of decision of the circuit court was that, while the deeds in question were valid and binding between the parties, the property conveyed was not sufficiently described for the recordation of said deeds to affect third parties with constructive notice of the identity of the property conveyed.

Before considering the case in that aspect, it will be necessary to notice the contention of appellee that each of the amounts in controversy, exclusive of costs and interest accrued since the decree appealed from, is less in value or amount than $300, and that this court is consequently without jurisdiction to entertain the appeal.

The demand asserted by Williamson, with interest to the date of the decree, is $475; but it is said that the amount in controversy as to him is the original demand, less the sum directed to be paid him by the decree under review, which payment, it is alleged, reduces his debt to less than $300.

The property in dispute had been sold by the receiver under a former order of the court, and the decree appealed from directs him, out of the proceeds, to pay to the appellee Cassell the amount of his execution, including interest and costs, and his costs in this suit expended, and, after paying all other unpaid costs, to pay the residue to the appellant Williamson. What that residue amounts to, the record does not disclose.

"Generally speaking, the value or amount in controversy must be made to appear affirmatively. If it cannot be ascertained, the appeal will be dismissed, and the burden is on appellant to establish the jurisdiction." 2 Cyc. 535.

On the other hand, where the original demand is pecuniary and in excess of the jurisdictional amount, but is alleged by the appellee to have been reduced below that amount by payment, the onus rests upon him to make that fact appear. Fink Bros. & Co. v. Denny, 75 Va. 663; Filler v. Tyler, 91 Va. 458, 22 S. E. 235.

The debt of the appellant Clement amounts, with interest to the date of the decree, to $293; and his deed of trust also secures the expenses of executing the trust and drawing and recording the deed, which, it is conceded, raise his demand beyond the jurisdictional amount. That these latter items are proper to be considered in arriving at the amount in controversy, see 2 Bar. Chy. Pr. (2d Ed.) p. 1208.

So that, if appellee's apprehension of what constitutes the amount in controversy in this case is correct, the allegation that appellants' respective demands are less than $300 is not sustained.

On the merits of the case, the decision of this court in Hardaway v. Jones, 100 Va. 481, 41 S. E. 957, is relied on to show the insufficiency of the description of the property to affect Cassell with constructive notice under the registry act.

In that case the deed of trust conveyed four mules, without further description. It did not state where or in whose possession they were, nor did it mention the residence of either the grantor, the trustee, or the beneficiary. The deed was acknowledged before a notary public in Scott county, and was put to record in that county. Within less than one month after the deed had been recorded, the grantor removed the mules to Wise county, and sold them, for a valuable consideration, to a purchaser residing in that county, who had no actual notice of the deed of trust. A few days thereafter the trustee demanded possession of the mules, and, upon the refusal of the purchaser to surrender them, brought an action of detinue for their recovery, which resulted in a judgment in his favor. That judgment was reversed on appeal; this court, as remarked, holding that the description of the property was inadequate to affect innocent third parties with constructive notice under section 2468 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1228].

It must, however, be observed that there are many distinguishing features between that deed and the deeds drawn in question in this case.

The two deeds convey the same property, and, with the exception of dates, amounts, trustees, and beneficiaries, are practically identical in form. Both deeds show that the grantors resided in the county of Henry, and the trustees and beneficiaries in the town of Martinsville. The horses, mules, oxen, and wagons were conveyed in the same clause, with a definitely described lumber plant, consisting of an engine, boiler, and sawmill, and would naturally have been regarded as parts of that outfit. The deeds further show that the property was to remain in the possession of the grantor until default was made in the payment of the debts secured. And finally it appears that the deeds were executed and duly recorded in the clerk's office of the county court of Henry county before the recovery of Cassell's judgment.

The doctrine of Hardaway v. Jones is that a deed of trust or mortgage conveying chattels constitutes constructive notice to third persons, when the description in the deed or mortgage is such as would enable them to identify the property, aided by the inquiries which the deed or mortgage itself indicates and directs. And the court in that case, at page 485, 100 Va., page 958, 41 S. E., observes: "In no case that we have seen has the recordation of a deed of trust been held to be constructive notice, which contained no description of the animals conveyed, except their number, which did not state in whose possession the property was, or where it was located or might be found, or where any party to the deed resided."

The converse of that proposition is also true—that the recordation of a deed which furnishes a stranger with the obvious means of identifying the property, which these deeds afford, does give constructive notice.

The registry of the deeds in question affected Cassell with constructive notice of the following facts: That his debtors resided in the county of Henry; that they had conveyed their property to trustees, in trust, to secure the debts described in the deeds; that the trustees and creditors were all residents of the town of Martinsville; that the property constituted part of a sawmill outfit which belonged to his debtors; and that the whole of it was in that county and in the possession of the grantors.

The written description of personal property in mortgages, taken alone, rarely furnishes strangers adequate means of identifying the property, and information thus imparted must usually be supplemented or aided by extraneous inquiry.

That would have been equally true in this instance, even though the sex, color, and names of the live stock conveyed had been specified in the deeds. Hence the reasonableness of the rule that a deed is sufficiently definite when it enables a stranger to identify the property, aided by proper inquiry, such as the instrument itself indicates and directs.

The same is true with respect to the description of land in an action of ejectment. It is not required that the designation should be so certain that the officer will know from an inspection of the record of what he is to give possession, but, in executing the writ of possession, he may supplement the information obtained from the record with knowledge acquired from the plaintiff. Howdeshell v. Krenning, 103 Va. —, 48 S. E. 491.

In a leading case on the subject under consideration—Willey v. Snyder, 34 Mich. 60—Chief Justice Cooley says: "Written descriptions of property are to be interpreted in the light of the facts known to and in the minds of the parties at the time. They are not prepared for strangers, but for those they are to affect—the parties and their privies. A subsequent purchaser or mortgagor is supposed to acquire a knowledge of all the facts, so far as they may be needful to his protection, and he purchases in view of that knowledge. * * * Descriptions do not identify by themselves. They only furnish the means of identification. They give certain marks or characteristics—perhaps historical data or incidents—by the aid of which we may single out the thing intended from all others, not by the description alone, but by that explained and applied." See notes to Barrett v. Flach (Iowa) 41 N. W. 310, 14 Am. St. Rep. 238, where many illustrations of the doctrine will be found.

In Estes v. Springer, 47 Mo. App. 99, it was held: "Notwithstanding the description in a chattel mortgage is faulty, in that it does not locate the property and does not state who is the owner, yet such fault is cured where other portions of the instrument show the residence of the mortgagor, and that the property is in his possession, and that it shall not be moved from the county in which the mortgagor's residence is fixed, and that upon default it shall be sold in such county."

Also in Shaffer v. Pickrell, 22 Kan. 619: "A chattel mortgage in which the description of the property is as follows, 'Two hundred and fifty stock hogs owned by the said B. D. Mott, in Franklin county, Kansas,' and which contains the provision that until default be made, or until such time as the mortgagees shall deem themselves insecure, the mortgagor, said Mott, is to continue in the peaceable possession of all the property, all of which, in consideration whereof, he engages shall be left in as good condition as the same now is, and taken care of at his own cost and expense, is not void for uncertainty."

See, to the same effect, Brown v. Holmes, 13 Kan. 482; Wells v. Wilcox, 68 Iowa, 708, 28 N. W. 29; Everett v. Brown, 64 Iowa, 420, 20 N. W. 743; Bank v. Johnson, 79 Iowa, 290, 44 N. W. 551; Eddy v. Caldwell, 7 Minn. 225 (Gil. 166).

The rule fairly deducible from the authorities seems to be that: "Where there is a description of the property mortgaged, and the description is true, and by the aid of such description and the surrounding circumstances the third person would, in the ordinary course of things, know the property was mortgaged, the description should be held sufficient." Mills v. Kansas Lumber Co., 28 Kan. 578.

For these reasons, the decree appealed from, to the extent to which it establishes appellee's execution as a superior lien to appellants' deeds of trust on the property involved in this litigation, is erroneous, and must be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Henry county for further proceedings to be had therein not in conflict with this opinion.

JONES v. COMMONWEALTH.

ARSON—EVIDENCE.

1. Evidence that a fire was incendiary, and that the accused had an opportunity to commit the crime, and ill feeling toward the owner of the property, without more, cannot sustain a conviction.

Error to Circuit Court, Clark County.

John Jones was convicted of arson, and brings error. Reversed.

Chas. M. Broun and F. B. Whiting, for plaintiff in error. Wm. A. Anderson, Atty. Gen., and W. T. Lewis, for the Commonwealth.

CARDWELL, J. John Jones was indicted in the circuit court of Clark county for burning in the nighttime the dwelling house and two frame outhouses, the property of Clay Carr. Upon this indictment he was tried, found not guilty of burning the dwelling house, but guilty of burning the two frame outhouses, and sentenced to a term of nine years in the penitentiary.

A number of exceptions were taken by the prisoner at the trial to the rulings of the court, but upon the view of the case taken by this court we deem it only necessary to consider whether the evidence warrants the conviction of the prisoner.

It appears that Clay Carr's residence is situated a little over half a mile northwest of Boyce; that just a little northwest of the dwelling there was stable barn, just 50 steps (supposed to be 50 yards) from the wing of the dwelling; that the barn was 78 feet long and 36 feet wide, with 12-foot stables on each side and a 12-foot driveway the full length of the barn, the door to which was only fastened with a hook, and not locked; that just 16 steps north of that barn is another barn, three stories, 27 feet square. The latter was used to store machinery, corn, and some hay at the time of its destruction by fire. On the west side of the barnyard fence, running its full length, there was a rick of fodder, which ran south and north, and butted upon the northwest side of the stable barn, which rick was supposed to contain 20,000 bundles of fodder; and just over the fence east of that was a large straw rick, butting up against the south side of the barn, and supposed at that time to have had 15 tons of straw in it.

On the night of March 18, 1904, these barns and the straw and fodder ricks were discovered to be on fire by Carr's neighbors, between 10 and 11 o'clock, and, it being in a very dry season, the barns, with their contents, live stock, etc., and ricks were speedily consumed—certainly by 20 minutes after 11 o'clock. During the progress of the fire the shedroom of the dwelling house, it being covered with shingles, caught on fire several times, but these fires were extinguished. Just at what time this fire originated, and whether it originated in one of the barns, or the straw, or fodder rick, is not disclosed by the evidence.

After stating that he was waked up by the ringing of the farm bell by one of his neighbors, and then discovered that something was on fire, Mr. Carr testifies that he went out, and found his stable barn had fallen in, and there was only a little frame of it standing; that the fodder rick had burned down, and the straw rick about half as high as it was before; and that after he had been out, as he supposes, about a half hour, or more, he remembered that he had his watch, and upon looking at it found that it was 20 minutes past 11 o'clock; so that the fire necessarily had been in progress some time prior to 10:30 o'clock, as the stable barn had been almost entirely consumed, as well as the straw and fodder ricks, when he first went out of the house, and the fence around the lot almost entirely consumed. He further says that he was at his barn at 9 o'clock, which was his usual custom, and everything was then all right.

It further appears that prior to July 19, 1903, and for about two years, the prisoner had been in the employ of Carr on his farm; that on that day they had some disagreement, and the prisoner left, going to his home—that is, to his father's, where he lived—which is about 900 yards from Carr's residence; that about one week afterwards the prisoner returned to Carr's house for the purpose of having a settlement with him of the wages he claimed to be due him; that upon this settlement Carr was of opinion that he owed the prisoner $4, while the prisoner claimed that the balance due him was $6, whereupon Carr paid the prisoner $4, and they parted, the prisoner saying as he walked away, "I will get even with you."

Between Carr's residence and Jones' house there is a field belonging to one Bowles, which Carr had rented for the year 1903, and there is a fence which divides this field from the lot of land owned by the prisoner's father, in which there was a gap, which had been established by him.

On December 17, 1903, while in the Bowles field attending to some other matters, Carr discovered that this gap was down, whereupon he went to the gap, dismounted from his horse, and put it up. About the time he finished putting up the gap and was tying the wire to hold it in place, he heard a rustling in the weeds behind him, and as he turned around the prisoner grabbed him in the throat with one hand and shook his fist in Carr's face, and said with an oath, "If you put that gap up again, I will knock you into jelly." Upon being asked what he meant by this attack upon Carr, the prisoner replied that he had no right to be in the field at all: that Bowles had said he had no right to put it up, as it was the prisoner's father's gap. After some further colloquy between the par-des, and Carr had gotten upon his horse and started away, the prisoner dared him to get off, and, upon being told by Carr that he was going to Justice Struder and get a warrant, the prisoner replied, "Damn old Struder; I can whip him and you both." Carr did get out a warrant for the prisoner, and he was that evening tried by Justice Struder, found guilty of an assault, and required to pay as a fine and costs $11.85; and it is testified to on behalf of the commonwealth that after the trial of the warrant, and Carr had left for his home, the prisoner was heard to say to some one, "Never mind, I will get even with him." Whether he had reference to Carr or to the justice who had imposed a fine upon him is left entirely to conjecture.

The next morning after the fire, Carr, in looking about his premises, discovered a horse's track coming to his place from the direction of the Bowles field, and, supposing that it might have been made by the horse owned by the prisoner, attempted to follow it, but upon investigation he found that the track was made by the horse of a neighbor who came to the fire that way. That track was made by a shod horse.

On Tuesday following the fire Carr discovered other tracks across his lawn in front of his house, which were prints of a bare-footed horse. These tracks were first discovered about 100 yards from the barn, and within the lawn, which was covered by sod. This track was followed to within 11 steps of a gate that goes into the lawn, and there the track had been destroyed by cattle passing over it. The distance he could follow the track was about 150 yards altogether, and was going from, rather than towards, the prisoner's house, and could not be tracked nearer than 900 yards from his house. At the time of the fire the prisoner's father owned a horse which was unshod, and about the size of a horse that would have made a track similar in size to the track found on the lawn.

On Saturday, the 26th of March, eight days after the fire, two persons, witnesses in this cause, took the horse just referred to, and which it was shown that the prisoner was riding at Boyce on the evening of the fire, to Carr's lawn, and a comparison made of the size of its feet with the tracks found by Carr on Tuesday morning. They say that they put three of the feet into these tracks and that they appeared to make "a perfect fit"; and that the length of the step of the horse was the same, apparently, as the step of the horse that made the tracks in question. There was nothing, however, peculiar about the horse's feet to distinguish the tracks made by it from tracks that may have been made by some other horse.

It further appears that Mrs. Pyle, who lived on Carr's premises, a short distance from the buildings that were burned, on the night of the fire had occasion to go out on the porch and get water for her sick child, and while there heard Carr's dogs barking furiously in front of Carr's residence, and heard a voice, but could not say whether it was the voice of a man or a woman. Upon hearing this voice the dogs ceased barking, and she states that about that time she heard a horse going towards Carr's gate, which seemed to be running very rapidly. This witness went back into her house, and after being asleep, she does not know how long, she was aroused by the ringing of the farm bell, which she says was about 11 o'clock, and that was the first she knew of the fire.

With reference to his dogs, Carr states that they were good guards—one a shepherd's dog and the other a bulldog; and he was asked to state if they knew the prisoner well, to which he answered, "Yes, sir; he had worked for me over two years, and they knew him. Q. Were they in the habit of following him? A. They were with the wagon. I have known them to follow him with the wagon time and again." It further appears that no one noticed the presence of these dogs about the fire, or on Carr's premises, until the fire was pretty well over, when one of them appeared, and seemed very much subdued. The prisoner is not shown to have been on Carr's premises since his visit there in July prior to the fire above mentioned, nor is it shown that these dogs were seen following him thereafter, nor any circumstance tending to show that he retained at the time of the fire the control over them that he had when living with Carr.

We have stated above all the facts testified to on behalf of the commonwealth, with the exception as to the time the prisoner left Boyce on the night of the fire, as to which there is great conflict. George Harrison testifies that he saw and talked with the prisoner at Boyce, and by an estimate made by him of the time at which he left the prisoner sitting in a store at Boyce he judged that it was about a quarter past 9; while the prisoner claimed, and was corroborated by a number of witnesses who lived in the house with him, that he reached home at 9 o'clock, and was in bed by a quarter past 9, and that he never left the house thereafter that night. Harrison says, with reference to his clock, that he kept it regulated by the trains, and usually set it once or twice a day in order to keep it running with the time of the railroad.

So that the conflict in the evidence as to the time when the prisoner left Boyce only involves a difference in the estimates made of some 15 or 20 minutes, which was sufficient for the prisoner to have reached his home by 9 o'clock, and it appears by the evidence of the commonwealth that he was seen riding towards his home by the public road, and the usual route for him to have taken, though also the route to Carr's place, a little before or a little after 9 o'clock.

Effort was made to prove that the prisoner was not at home at 10 o'clock, and that circumstance is relied on here; but the record shows that the statement of the witness Henry Taylor upon that point was ruled out by the trial court; and Willie Harris, who was at the time with Henry Taylor, who had stated that Harris called at prisoner's home for him about 10 o'clock, and got no answer, testifies that he and Taylor passed prisoner's home about 8 o'clock, and upon his (Harris') calling for him learned that he had gone to Boyce.

Much stress is laid upon the fact, admitted by the prisoner, that he knew nothing of the fire until next morning, when he had started out to his work; but this circumstance loses its criminating force when it is testified to by a witness for the commonwealth, Henry Taylor, who was at the time working for Carr, and had left his house the night of the fire after supper, that he and another slept in a room with a window next to Carr's, and in a house on an adjoining lot to the prisoner's, but nearer to the scene of the fire, and knew nothing of it till they went out of the house about 5 o'clock the next morning.

"The prisoner is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established, and he is not to be prejudiced by the inability of the commonwealth to point out any other criminal agent, nor is he called upon to vindicate his own innocence by naming the guilty man. He rests secure in that presumption of innocence until proof is adduced which establishes his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and, whether the proof be direct or circumstantial, it must be such as excludes any rational hypothesis of the innocence of the prisoner." McBride's Case, 95 Va. 828, 30 S. E. 454.

"The rule in criminal cases is that the coincidence of circumstances tending to indicate guilt, however strong and numerous they may be, avails nothing unless the corpus delicti—the fact that the crime has been actually perpetrated—be first established. So long as the least doubt exists as to the act, there can be no certainty as to the criminal agent." 1 Starkie on Ev. 510.

"Evidence only that a fire was incendiary, that the defendant had an opportunity to commit the crime, and that he cherished ill feelings towards the owner of the property destroyed, does not warrant a conviction." Garner v. Commonwealth, 26 S. E. 507, 2 Va. Dec. 458.

In that case a millhouse was burned. Tracks were discovered the next morning about the mill, and led from it in the direction of the prisoner's house, which corresponded in measurements and other characteristics with the prisoner's footprints (were in fact his tracks), and there was ill feeling between the owner of the mill and the prisoner. The opinion in that case, by Keith, P., says: "The utmost that can be said of the proof is that it shows the burning of the mill as the act of an incendiary, that the prisoner had the opportunity to commit the crime, and that he cherished ill feelings towards the owner of the property destroyed. These circumstances were sufficient to cause the prisoner to be suspected of the crime, and rendered an investigation of it proper, to ascertain whether or not he had any connection with it, but * * * falls short of that degree of proof which warrants a conviction, or which will sustain a verdict under our statute, which requires us to consider the motion for a new trial as upon a demurrer to the evidence by the prisoner. There is no evidence whatever which connects the prisoner with the crime charged, and all that is shown in the record may be true (doubtless is true), and, at the same time, be entirely consistent with the innocence of the accused."

In Pryor's Case, 27 Grat. 1009, the proof was that the fire in question was the work of an incendiary; that the accused had made threats, which might have been reasonably construed as an intended purpose on his part to do the owner of the property burned an injury; tracks were found near the burned building which corresponded in size and other respects with the tracks made by the accused, and the evidence was that the tracks were made by one wearing a shoe similar to that of the accused. These tracks were traced in the direction of the accused's house for more than half a mile. In the opinion in that case it is said that the only circumstances in the case which tend to raise a suspicion against the accused are that a track was found on the morning after the barn was burned, which witnesses said they recognized as the track of the accused. This was considered by the court as only the opinion of the witnesses, and not proof; and upon the whole case it was considered that the facts proved were plainly insufficient to warrant the verdict of the jury, and a new trial was granted.

In the case at bar it is frankly and properly conceded that the facts as to the horse's tracks alone would not have been sufficient to justify a conviction, the tracks disclosing no peculiar formation of the hoof of the horse making them. We say that this was properly conceded, because it is admitted that between the time that the tracks were made and the following Saturday there was not only weather producing freezing at night and thawing in the day, but there had been a very heavy rain; and the uncontradicted proof adduced by the prisoner from experienced men (blacksmiths included) was that, unless there was some peculiar formation about the horse's hoof, which would make an impression in a track, it would be impossible to identify a track as having been made by any particular horse. As we have seen, there was no peculiar formation about the hoof of the horse ridden by the prisoner on the evening of the fire, and it was simply a track that might have been made by any number of horses requiring a No. 2 shoe, as it is shown this horse required.

There is no direct evidence tending to prove that this fire was the work of an incendiary, and not the result of an accident, and there is no attempt whatever to prove that it could not have originated in any other mode than that of an incendiary fire.

"Where a building is burned, the presumption is that the fire was caused by an accident, rather than by the act of the accused, accompanied by a deliberate intent." 3 Cyc. 1003.

It is true, as counsel contend, and unfortunately so, "that, in the nature of things, it is generally extremely difficult to prove by direct testimony that an incendiary who sets fire to his neighbor's property actually started the conflagration," and this kind of proof is not required to convict of the crime of arson; but the coincidence of circumstances relied on to convict, however strong and numerous, must conclusively prove (1) the fact that the crime has been perpetrated, and (2) that the accused is the guilty party.

If we were to concede that the evidence in this case was sufficient to show that the fire was incendiary, that the defendant had an opportunity to commit the crime, and that he cherished ill feelings towards Carr, the owner of the property destroyed, this, according to the authorities which we have already cited, is not sufficient to warrant a conviction; and this, in our opinion, is all that the evidence for the commonwealth, considered under the rule governing its consideration, establishes. The most that can be said of the evidence is that it is sufficient to raise a suspicion of the guilt of the accused, but, in our opinion, it is plainly insufficient to warrant the verdict of the jury.

Therefore the judgment of the circuit court of Clark county, refusing to grant the prisoner a new trial, must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

POWELL v. PIERCE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 2, 1905.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—COVENANTS TO RENEW OR PAY FOR BUILDINGS—SATISFACTION—ESTOPPEL.

1. Where a lease gave the lessor the option of renewal for a second term upon six months' notice, and the lessor covenanted that, if he did not renew, he would pay the lessee the value of buildings which the latter had agreed to build on the land demised or else the lessee should hold over as tenant from year to year, subject to the ordinary notice to quit at the end of the year, at which time the lessee should pay for the buildings, and the lessee remained in possession after the end of the first term without having received any notice of renewal, and so held until after the expiration of the period of time which would have constituted the second term, the lessor was then entitled to possession on giving due notice to quit, without paying for the buildings, as the covenant to continue the lease or pay for the buildings was then satisfied.

2. The lessee, having failed, at the end of the first term, to exercise his right to refuse the second term on default of notice of renewal, waived such notice, and could not, after having accepted all the benefits of a formal renewal for the full period of the second term, assert that he was a tenant from year to year, and thus obtain pay for the buildings.

Error to Hastings Court of Portsmouth.

Forcible entry and detainer by one Powell against one Pierce. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. C. Marshall and John W. Happer, for plaintiff in error. Burroughs & Bro., for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The writ of error in this case is to a judgment of the court of hustings for the city of Portsmouth, rendered in behalf of the defendant in error, plaintiff in the trial court, in an action of unlawful detainer to recover possession of a lot, with the buildings and improvements thereon, situated in the city of Portsmouth.

It appears that by a lease bearing date October 4, 1867, the lot in question was demised to the defendant for the term of ten years from January 1, 1868, at a yearly rent of $185, the lessee also covenanting to pay all taxes accruing upon the property during the continuance of the lease, and to erect upon the lot a two-story brick building, not to be worth less than $1,500, and to be completed within six months from the date of the lease. It was further stipulated that at the expiration of the first term it should be optional with the lessor to continue the lease for a second term of ten years, on the same terms, upon giving six months' notice of his purpose to renew prior to the expiration of the first term. The lessor also covenanted, if the lease was not so continued, to pay the lessee the full value of the buildings erected by him upon the property in cash, the same to be valued by three disinterested persons, each party to choose one, and the two so chosen to select the third. It was further agreed that if, from any cause, the lessor should fail to pay for the buildings according to the terms of his covenant, the lessee should have the right to hold over as tenant from year to year, subject to the ordinary notice to terminate the tenancy at the end of any year, at which time the lessor should pay for the buildings; and until such payment no increase of rent was to be demanded, and the tenancy was in all respects to be according to the terms of the lease. It also appeared that the lessee took immediate possession under the lease, and erected the buildings in accordance with its terms.

The six-months notice of lessor's election to continue the lease was not given, but the lessee remained in the quiet and undisturbed possession of the premises, and continued to pay taxes and the rent reserved, and the lessor continued to receive the rent, until January 1, 1903. At that date the lessee was in arrears for rent to the amount of $252.50; and on July 1, 1902, the lessor served notice upon him that he was at that time a tenant from year to year, and that the tenancy would expire January 1, 1903, at which time he would be expected to surrender possession of the premises. Until the date of that notice nothing had been said by either party as to the termination of the tenancy, or that the premises were held on terms other than those prescribed in the lease; nor had any demand been made by the lessee with respect to paying for the buildings.

The error assigned is that by the terms of the lease the lessor was not entitled to recover possession of the premises until the buildings were paid for.

On the other hand, it is insisted by the defendant in error that this case is ruled by the decision of this court in Pierce v. Grice, 92 Va. 763, 24 S. E. 392.

Both cases involve the construction of building leases; the lessor was the same in each; the first terms of ten years' commenced at the same time; and the option to renew for a second term of ten years on the terms of the first lease was in both instances vested in the lessor, with a stipulation that upon the failure of the lessor to renew for the second term he should pay the lessee the value of the buildings. In both cases, at the end of the first term of ten years, nothing was said by either party with regard to renewing the leases; but the lessees continued to hold possession of the premises to the end of the second term, paying rent and taxes, and the lessor receiving the rent in the same manner as during the first term.

In Pierce v. Grice, after the expiration of the second term of ten years, the lessor brought an action of assumpsit against the lessee to recover the sum of $300 annually, for the period of five years next preceding the institution of the suit, for the use and occupation of the buildings erected upon the leased premises. The ground upon which the defendant denied liability was that the buildings in question were his property, and that the plaintiff had, therefore, no right to recover any amount for their use and occupation. But the court held "that a contract of lease for a period of ten years, with the option to the lessor at the end of that period to renew for another period of ten years upon like conditions, or else pay for the buildings erected by the lessee, is satisfied by one renewal for the period of ten years."

The plaintiff in error maintains that the lease in the case in judgment is to be distinguished from that in Pierce v. Grice in this: that in the latter case it was merely left optional with the lessor to continue the lease, while in this case the lessor was required to give six months' notice, previous to the termination of the first term, of his election to continue the lease. Attention is also called to the fact that upon a failure to give the required notice and pay for the buildings the lessee was to become a tenant from year to year, subject to the ordinary notice to terminate the tenancy at the end of any year, at which time the lessor was to pay for the buildings.

With respect to these contentions it is not perceived that the difference between the leases materially affects the question at issue. The failure of the lessor to give the six-months notice of his intention to renew the lease entitled the lessee, at the expiration of the first term, January 1, 1878, to decline to accept the second term, and to at once demand pay for the buildings. But he impliedly waived that notice, and, having accepted all the benefits that could have accrued from a formal renewal of the lease for the full period of the second term, he cannot now be permitted, by shifting his position, to reap the additional advantage of receiving pay for the buildings, on the theory that he was holding all these years as tenant from year to year. If it was his purpose to stand on the letter of his contract, fair dealing required that he should have repudiated responsibility under the second lease for want of notice, and insisted on his right to pay for the buildings when that right first accrued, and not after he had received the full benefits of the lease.

It may be said here, as was remarked in Pierce v. Grice, under substantially the same state of facts: "As the lease was continued for twenty years, the full period which the lessee was entitled to, the lessor had, at the expiration of that time, the right to the possession of the leased premises, including the storehouse."

For these reasons, the judgment complained of is without error, and is affirmed.

SAVAGE et al. v. BOWEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 2, 1905.)

CONTESTING OF WILL—PERSONS ENTITLED—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—DISCRETION OF COURT—ATTESTATION OF WILL.

1. The grantee of an heir of testator has such an interest in the controversy as entitles him to contest a will found and filed for probate after the grant, by which testator devised the land to the grantor's children.

2. The will by which testator devised land to the children of her son, S., not having been probated, S. took the land as heir, and afterward conveyed it to plaintiff. After the death of S. his wife filed the will for probate, and it was admitted on her evidence as attesting witness. Plaintiff then brought suit to set aside the will. Held, that for the purpose of affecting her credibility it could be shown by the wife of S. that she joined S. in the deed to plaintiff.

3. Allowing a witness to be recalled for the purpose of laying the foundation for impeachment by contradiction is within the discretion of the court.

4. It is within the discretion of the trial court to allow bank officers to testify as experts as to handwriting and the difference in inks used in writing and signing a paper.

5. In a suit to set aside a will the admission of evidence as to the enhanced value of the land affected is error.

6. Code 1887, § 2544 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1297], provides: no will shall be valid unless in writing signed by the testator, or by some other person in his presence, and by his direction, so as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature; and, unless it be wholly written by the testator, his signature shall be made or the will acknowledged by him in the presence of at least two competent witnesses, present at the same time, who shall subscribe to the will in the presence of testator. Held that, if the attesting witnesses each signed the will in the presence of testator and of the other, it was not necessary that testator expressly requested each witness to sign the same.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mecklenburg County.

Action by E. T. Bowen and another, administrators of George L. Savage, deceased, against the children of George L. Savage. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

R. T. Thorp, C. T. Baskerville, and Reekes & Goode, for appellants. W. E. Holmes, A. L. Holladay, and E. P. Buford, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. Ann C. Savage, of Mecklenburg county, departed this life in July, 1883, leaving a will, whereby she devised her tract of land in that county to her grandchildren, who are the appellants here. This will was dated the 7th day of June, 1883, and was in the following words:

"In the name of God, Amen. After the Bowen debt becomes due and is settled, then I give to G. L. Savage's children my tract of land on which he, Bowen, has a deed; it contains sixty acres more or less. I want Geog's children to have my land and its benefits: this is my wish and will."

Then follows the signature of the testatrix and those of two attesting witnesses, namely, N. C. Bugg and T. A. Savage.

On the 20th day of January, 1902, the will, upon the testimony of the subscribing witnesses thereto, was admitted to probate in the county court of Mecklenburg county.

In March, 1902, E. T. Bowen and B. E. Cogbill, administrators of George L. Savage, deceased, who are the appellees here, filed their bill in the circuit court of Mecklenburg county, in which they allege that Ann C. Savage died intestate, leaving surviving her George L. Savage as her only child and heir at law, and that upon her death the tract of land mentioned in the alleged will descended to him as her sole heir at law and next of kin; that after the death of his mother George L. Savage and his wife had sold and conveyed the land to the complainant Bowen by deed with general warranty dated December 4, 1890, and that he is now the owner of the same, as will appear from such deed, duly executed, recorded, and filed with the bill as a part thereof; that the estate of George L. Savage is interested in the matter of this alleged will by reason of his general warranty in the said deed to the complainant Bowen. They further allege that the paper in question, admitted to probate in the county of Mecklenburg, is not the true last will and testament of Ann C. Savage, and that, in view of their interest in the land passing by such pretended will, they desire to impeach the same and have it set aside. The grandchildren of Ann C. Savage, who are the children of George L. Savage, deceased, are made parties defendant; and the prayer of the bill is that the alleged will may be declared null and void, and the complainants granted all the relief provided for under section 2544 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1297], and such other further and general relief as the nature of their case may require.

The defendants demurred to and answered the bill, denying its material allegations, and insisting that the complainants had no interest in the estate of Ann C. Savage or the probate of her will, and further insisting that the controverted paper was the true last will and testament of Ann C. Savage.

The demurrer having been overruled, a jury was impaneled to try the following issue: "Whether any, and, if any, how much, of what was offered for probate at the January term, 1902, of the county court of Mecklenburg county, a copy of which, marked '1,' is filed with the plaintiffs' bill, is the last true will and testament of said Ann C. Savage." Upon this issue devisavit vel non the jury found for the contestants that the paper in question was not the true last will and testament of Ann C. Savage.

A motion to set aside the verdict was overruled, and the decree appealed from entered, adopting and approving the finding of the jury.

The demurrer was properly overruled. The allegations of the bill show such an interest in the subject-matter as entitles the appellees to impeach the will. Controversies of this character usually arise between persons claiming as heirs at law on the one hand and as devisees under the contested will on the other. George L. Savage, as heir of Ann C. Savage, would have had the right to impeach the will, and no reason is perceived why those claiming under and through him are not entitled to his rights in that respect.

The second assignment of error is that the court erred in admitting improper testimony.

Without referring in detail to the several bills of exceptions embracing these objections, we are of opinion that there was no error in proving by the witness T. A. Savage the deed from George L. Savage and wife to the complainant, E. T. Bowen, filed with the bill, and that the witness T. A. Savage had united with her husband, George L. Savage, in this deed conveying the land in question to Bowen. This evidence was admitted solely for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the witness T. A. Savage, who was one of the attesting witnesses in the will; and the contestants had the right to ask any question which tended to test the accuracy, veracity, or credibility of the witness. Va., etc., Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 62, 34 S. E. 976.

We are further of opinion that there was no error in allowing the witness A. W. Bracey to be recalled for the purpose of laying the foundation to contradict him, and afterwards permitting the introduction of witnesses to contradict him. The examination of witnesses lies chiefly in the discretion of the trial court, and its exercise is rarely, if ever, to be controlled by an appellate court. Much latitude of discretion should be allowed the trial court in the matter of recalling witnesses, and its action will not be reversed except for palpable error. Burke v. Shaver, 92 Va. 345, 23 S. E. 749.

We are further of opinion that there was no error in admitting the testimony of the two bank officers and the clerk of the circuit court as expert witnesses. These witnesses were introduced to state whether or not, in their opinion, the body of the will, the signature thereto, and the name of the attesting witness N. C. Bugg, were written in the same ink as the name of the attesting witness T. A. Savage, and which, in their opinion, was the older writing.

They testify to their long experience in handling and examining written papers and in comparing signatures and writings. It is the practice in this state to admit such evidence for the purpose mentioned. Indeed, with our courts, located as they are for the most part in the country, no better evidence on the subject is attainable. It would be impossible in most cases to secure a chemist or manufacturer of ink to say which of two writings was the older, or written with the older ink. Whether a witness is qualified to testify as an expert is largely a matter in the discretion of the trial court, and its ruling allowing a witness to testify will not be disturbed unless it clearly appears that he was not qualified. Richmond Locomotive Wks. v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. 509.

We are further of opinion that it was error to admit the evidence objected to tending to show the enhancement in the value of the land in controversy since its purchase by the complainant Bowen. The sole issue before the jury was whether or not the controverted writing was the true last will and testament of Ann C. Savage. The value of the land could have no bearing upon that question, and the evidence tending to show its enhancement was irrelevant, and calculated to divert the minds of the jury from the real issue.

The third assignment of error relates to the court's action with respect to the instructions.

The instructions given by the court, taken together, are predicated upon the view that it is essential to the due execution of a will that the attesting witnesses should have been requested by the testator to act in that capacity. They convey the impression—which appears to have been the view of the court—that the request must have been express; and that, although every other statutory requisite may appear to have been complied with, the instrument will not be valid unless there shall also appear to have been an express request made by the testatrix to the witnesses to attest the same as and for her last will and testament, and that each should know that the other had been so requested.

The requirements for the due execution of a will are found in section 2514 of the Code, and are as follows: "No will shall be valid unless it be in writing and signed by the testator, or by some other person in his presence, and by his direction, in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature; and moreover, unless it be wholly written by the testator, the signature shall be made or the will acknowledged by him in the presence of at least two competent witnesses; present at the same time; and such witnesses shall subscribe to the will in the presence of the testator—but no form of attestation shall be necessary."

The purpose of the statutory requirements with respect to the execution of wills was to throw every safeguard deemed necessary around a testator while in the performance of this important act, and to prevent the probate of a fraudulent and supposititious will instead of the real one. To effectually accomplish this, the statute must be strictly followed. It is, however, quite as important that these statutory requirements should not be supplemented by the courts with others that might tend to increase the difficulty of the transaction to such an extent as to practically destroy the right of the uninformed layman to dispose of his property by will.

As said by Judge Moncure in the case of Parramore v. Taylor, 11 Gratt. 220: "The law of wills should be plainly written, and no room should be left for doubt or implication. It is a law of almost universal application, and must often be acted on by unlearned persons in a situation which precludes the possibility of obtaining professional aid. The most important family settlements, which are often postponed to the last day or hour of life, may depend upon an observance of its requisitions. How important, then, that it should impose no needless requisition; none that is not productive of some substantial good; and that it should plainly express what it means."

Prof. Minor, in his Institutes, says: "The statute is peremptory in requiring that the witnesses shall subscribe their names in the presence of the testator, and at his request." 2 Minor (4th Ed.) p. 1017.

A casual glance at the statute shows that there is no peremptory requirement that the will shall be attested at the request of the testator; indeed, the word "request" does not appear in the statute. If the learned author means that the plain implication from the language used is that the witnesses must be requested by the testator to attest the will, and it be true, as contended, that such request is necessary to the validity of a will, then the question arises, how is the fact that the request was made to be evidenced? We are of opinion that it may appear from the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, as well as by an express and formal announcement of the invitation.

In the case at bar it appears that T. A. Savage was the daughter-in-law of the testatrix, and that they lived together in the same house; that the will was executed in a small room, 10 by 12 or 14 feet. It further appears that the will was written by T. A. Savage at the earnest request of the testatrix. This witness, who was not asked if she had been requested by the testatrix to witness the will, testifies that when N. C. Bugg, who had been sent for to witness the will, arrived, she handed the will to the testatrix, who raised up in her bed without assistance, and signed the will in the presence of N. C. Bugg and herself; that, after the testatrix had signed the will, Mr. Bugg signed his name as witness, at the bed; and that she then took the will, and went over to the bureau, and signed her name under Mr. Bugg's at the bureau; that the testatrix signed and acknowledged the will in the presence of N. C. Bugg and herself; that N. C. Bugg signed his name thereto in the presence of the testatrix and herself, and that she signed her name thereto in the presence of the testatrix and N. C.

Bugg; that the testatrix, from the position occupied by her on the bed, could have seen the witness sign her name to the will at the bureau without changing her position, and simply by looking; that Mr. Bugg, from his position at the bed, could have seen her sign her name by simply turning his head; that the testatrix was in clear and strong mind at the time, mentally as sound as a dollar. The witness N. C. Bugg says that he was sent for to witness the will; that when he arrived the testatrix said to him: "Napoleon, I want you to witness my will. I want to give what I have to George's children, because I do not think he will take care of it;" that he did not see the testatrix sign the will, but that she acknowledged it as her will to him, in the presence of Mrs. T. A. Savage; that the testatrix raised up in bed, and her mind was clear and all right; that he went around to the foot of the bed and signed the will; that he signed it in the presence of Mrs. T. A. Savage and of the testatrix; that after he had signed it Mrs. T. A. Savage took the paper, and went with it to the bureau; that he could have seen her if he had turned his head and looked, but that he did not see her sign the paper; that the testatrix, from her position on the bed, could have seen Mrs. T. A. Savage sign the paper without change of her position, as the bureau sat in front of the bed. This witness further states that he does not remember anything being said about Mrs. T. A. Savage witnessing the will; that, if anything was said about it, he did not recollect it; that he did not know T. A. Savage was to be a witness; thought that Mr. Gregory was to be the other witness.

It is clear from the evidence that the testatrix knew that two witnesses to the will were necessary, and she and the two whose names are signed to the will were the only persons present at the time of the transaction. From this testimony, if true, the implication is plain that the witness T. A. Savage signed the will at the request of the testatrix, and the jury should have been instructed that, if they believed the same, it constituted all the proof necessary to show that T. A. Savage had been requested by the testatrix to attest the will.

The fourth instruction goes a step further, and tells the jury that it is necessary for them to believe from the evidence that the testatrix had authorized or requested T. A. Savage to subscribe her name to the paper as an attesting witness before she attested the same.

The vice in this instruction, in addition to the inference that an express request was necessary, is the proposition that such request must have been made at some time prior to the act of attesting the will. This position is not tenable. The request might have been made at the time the will was being subscribed as well as before; or the testatrix might have acquiesced in and ratified the act of attestation at the time it was done. In this case the witness T. A. Savage wrote the will at the urgent request of the testatrix, and signed it as a witness in the plain view and conscious presence of the testatrix, without objection on her part; and yet the jury are told that, though they believe these facts, they must find against the validity of the will.

In addition to the general objection pointed out, the sixth instruction is erroneous, because it, in effect, tells the jury that at some time prior to the signing each of the witnesses must have known that the other was to be an attesting witness, and each must also have known that the other had been requested to act in that capacity. This instruction imposes unnecessary requirements, not called for or suggested by the statute, which would be likely to defeat the probate of many otherwise valid wills. The witness T. A. Savage, who wrote the will, may have been asked to attest it before N. C. Bugg came to the house, and, unless the request was repeated in his presence after his arrival, and at some time prior to the act of signing, the jury could not, under this instruction, find in favor of the validity of the will.

As said by Judge Moncure in Parramore v. Taylor, supra: "Nothing is more common or natural than for a scrivener to subscribe a will as a witness before his fellow witness is called in to join him in the attestation; or for a witness called on to attest a will, after doing so, to turn his back, and walk off, without noticing what is done by others afterwards."

In the matter of executing a will the statutory requirements must be complied with, but substance must not be sacrificed to form, and the end of the law to the means used for attaining it.

For these reasons the decree appealed from must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial of the issue devisavit vel non in accordance with the views herein expressed.

GLENN v. WEST.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 2, 1905.)

QUIETING TITLE—RIGHT TO SUE—HOLDER OF EQUITABLE TITLE—TRUSTS—SUITS AGAINST TRUSTEES—PARTIES DEFENDANT.

1. One who has merely an equitable title to land, and who is out of possession, cannot maintain a bill to quiet title against a party in possession claiming under a tax title, between whom and himself no privity in title or right exists. He must first acquire the legal title from the trustee, and then bring ejectment against the adverse claimant.

2. The holder of an equitable title, who sues to procure the outstanding legal title of his trustee, cannot, in such suit, implead an adverse claimant in possession, in order to quiet title against such adverse claimant.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Bill by William B. West against Joseph E. Glenn. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

S. A. Anderson and W. H. Werth, for appellant. Long & West, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. The first assignment of error in this case calls in question the action of the chancery court of the city of Richmond in overruling the demurrer to the bill.

The bill sets forth that the house and lot in controversy was held by Barnett Wicker, as substituted trustee under a deed dated in 1851 for the benefit of Elizabeth Ann Probst for life, and at her death to be conveyed by the trustee to the child or children living at that time of the life tenant and Geo. W. Probst; that Elizabeth Ann Probst died in September, 1883, leaving Charles S. Probst as the only surviving child of herself and Geo. W. Probst; that the trustee, Wicker, died at some time prior to the year 1861, and that James F. Phillips had been appointed as his administrator c. t. a.; that no conveyance had ever been made of the house and lot to Chas. S. Probst, but that he had taken possession thereof as the equitable owner upon the death of his mother, and had, in July, 1886, sold and conveyed his title and interest therein to Willard E. Brown, who remained in possession until November, 1899, when he was ousted by the appellant, Joseph E. Glenn; that, after being so ousted, he (Brown) had conveyed, by deed dated March 28, 1902, his interest in the property to the appellee, Wm. B. West. The bill then alleges that the house and lot were listed for taxation in the name of B. Wicker, trustee for E. A. Probst, etc.; and that it had been sold for the delinquent taxes for the years 1876, 1877, and 1878, and bought in by the commonwealth; that, not having been redeemed as provided by law, the appellant had, in pursuance of the statute, made application for the purchase thereof, and that on the 28th day of November, 1899, the clerk of the hustings court for the city of Richmond had executed a tax deed conveying the property to the appellant, and that this tax deed had been duly recorded. It is further alleged that, inasmuch as the taxes for which the property was sold had accrued during the period of the life tenancy, the tax deed to the appellant did not "effect or divest" the title of the appellee, who was successor under the several conveyances mentioned to the right and title of the remainderman, Chas. S. Probst.

The bill further charges that the administrator c. t. a. of the trustee, Wicker, should be required to convey the house and lot in question to the appellee, but that after diligent inquiry his whereabouts could not be ascertained.

The prayer of the bill is that the appellant, Jos. E. Glenn, and the administrator of Barnett Wicker, deceased, be made parties defendant; that the deed establishing the trust under which the property was held by Elizabeth and Chas. Probst be construed and enforced according to its purpose and effect; that the tax deed from the clerk to the appellant be set aside and annulled, and that the administrator of Barnett Wicker be required to convey the property to the appellee; that the appellant be required to account for rents and profits during the period of his occupancy of the premises; and for general relief.

Stripped of verbiage, the purpose of the bill is to procure the outstanding legal title in James F. Phillips, administrator of Barnett Wicker, trustee, and at the same time, by way of removing a cloud from that title, to have canceled and annulled the deed of a third party who is in possession, holding as purchaser from the commonwealth.

The complainant admits that he has only an equitable title to the property in question, and admits that the defendant is in possession under a tax title deed. The parties are strangers, and no privity in title or right exists between them, nor is any fact stated in the bill that connects the defendant in any way with the equity alleged by the complainant.

The doctrine is well settled that only those who have a clear legal and equitable title to land, with possession, have a right to claim the interference of a court of equity to give them peace, or dissipate a cloud on the title. A person out of possession cannot maintain such a bill, whether his title is legal or equitable; for, if his title is legal, his remedy at law, by action of ejectment, is plain, adequate, and complete, and, if his title is equitable, he must acquire the legal title, and then bring ejectment. Kane v. Va. Coal & Iron Co., 97 Va. 329, 33 S. E. 627; Otey v. Stuart, 91 Va. 714, 22 S. E. 513; Smith v. Thomas, 99 Va. 86, 37 S. E. 784; Orton v. Smith, 18 How. 263, 15 L. Ed. 333; Frost v. Spitley, 121 U. S. 552, 7 Sup. Ct. 1129, 30 L. Ed. 1010.

The bill being without equity against the defendant, his possession is good against all the world except the true owner. As the bill asserts no equity against him, he has the right to stand on his possession until compelled to yield to the true title. The plaintiff cannot deprive him of that right by neglecting to acquire the legal title, and upon the ground of his equitable title ask the aid of a court of equity. The plaintiff can turn the defendant out of possession only upon the strength of the legal title, which he must first acquire. Having done this, a court of law is the proper forum in which to bring his suit. Fussell v. Gregg, 113 U. S. 550-555, 5 Sup. Ct. 631, 28 L. Ed. 993, citing Hipp v. Babin, 19 How. 271, 15 L. Ed. 633; Parker v. W. Mfg. Co., 2 Black, 545, 17 L. Ed. 333; Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 373, 21 L. Ed. 174; Lewis v. Cocks, 23 Wall. 466, 23 L. Ed. 70; Killian v. Ebbinghaus, 110 U. S. 568, 4 Sup. Ct. 232, 28 L. Ed. 248.

This is not, as contended, a case in which a court of equity, having acquired jurisdiction for one purpose, will, in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits, proceed to administer complete relief. The appellee is asserting in a court of equity a purely equitable claim against the personal representative of B. Wicker, trustee, and he cannot in such a suit implead the appellant, against whom he has no equity, for the purpose of enforcing a purely legal claim. The appellee has the right to prosecute his suit for the purpose of recovering the outstanding legal title to the property in question, but when that is secured his remedy is at law.

For these reasons the decree complained of must be reversed, and such decree entered here as the lower court ought to have entered, sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill as to the appellant, Joseph E. Glenn, but without prejudice to the rights of either party in such further proceedings as the appellee may be advised to take.

SWINDELL & CO. v. FIRST NAT. BANK.

CONTRACT—VALIDITY—ACTION ON NOTES—PLEA OF RECOUNPMENT—NEW TRIAL.

1. A contract between a bank and a lumber manufacturer, whereby the bank agreed to advance to him a certain sum of money, but the manufacturer was not bound to take the whole or any part of said sum unless he found it necessary in conducting his business, is unilateral, in that there was no binding obligation on the part of the manufacturer to borrow any definite sum of money.

2. Where, in a suit to recover on certain promissory notes, the sole defense is a plea of recoupment claiming damages for a breach of a contract which appears from the evidence to have been unilateral, a verdict for the plaintiff is demanded by the evidence, and any possible errors in admitting or excluding testimony relating to the breach of such contract, or any error in the charge of the court respecting the same, cannot afford cause for ordering a new trial.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; B. B. Bower, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank against Swindell & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

T. S. Hawes, Townsend & Dickenson, and Albert H. Russell, for plaintiff in error. Donaldson & Donaldson, Byron Bower, and A. G. Powell, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. The First National Bank brought a suit against E. Swindell & Co., a partnership, to recover the amount due on certain promissory notes executed by that firm. The defendant filed a plea of recoupment, alleging, in brief, that the partnership was engaged in the manufacture of lumber, and required a large amount of money with which to conduct its business; that the partnership entered into a contract with the bank, whereby it was to advance to the firm $20,000, as called for from time to time, in order that it might carry on its business successfully, the firm being induced by the bank to sever its financial relations with another banking institution and to get its advances from the plaintiff bank; that the bank did advance the money for which the notes sued on were given, but later, without cause or excuse, committed a breach of the contract by refusing to advance any further sums of money to the partnership, and that by reason of such breach the firm had been unable to profitably conduct its business, and had been damaged in the sum of $10,000. On the trial of the case the defendant admitted the execution of the notes, and assumed the burden of proof. Evidence was introduced to the effect that an arrangement had been made with the bank whereby it was to advance money to the partnership to enable it to carry on its milling operations; but it affirmatively appeared from the testimony of the member of the firm who made this arrangement with the bank, and upon whose testimony the defendant wholly relied as establishing the making of the alleged contract, that the partnership was "to take $20,000, if necessary, to run [its] business," but not otherwise, and "more, if necessary, to the amount of $30,000," it being optional with the firm whether it would "take the $20,000 or not." The plaintiff denied entering into any such contract, and introduced evidence tending to show that it had merely advanced money to the defendant partnership on particular occasions, in the same way as it had done to other customers, relying on Swindell & Co. to reimburse it when remittances for shipments of lumber were received by that firm. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant filed a motion for a new trial, therein complaining of various rulings and charges of the court. To the overruling of this motion the defendant excepts.

1. An essential requisite of a contract dependent on mutual promises for a consideration is that the obligations imposed should be reciprocal. One promise must need be the complement of the other. The performance of the promise or agreement to perform by one party enjoins a duty on the opposite party to execute his reciprocal obligation. If the contract be such that performance by one of the parties of his promise does not confer the right to demand the correlative obligation from the other, it is lacking in mutuality. The contract between the bank and the plaintiff in error, as averred in the plea of recoupment, was mutual and binding. By its terms the bank agreed to loan, within the lumber season, $20,000, and the plaintiff in error agreed to borrow that sum. However, when the plaintiff in error undertook at the trial to establish the contract set out in this plea, the testimony offered failed in a vital particular. The member of the firm who claimed to have made the contract with the bank was the only witness offered to prove it. This witness testified that the bank agreed to loan $20,000 to his firm, but his firm was not to borrow the money unless its business necessities required it. In the course of his testimony he said: "We were to take $20,000, if necessary, to run our business; we were not to take it if not necessary; more, if necessary, to the amount of $30,000. It was with us whether we were to take the $20,000 or not." The contention of the plaintiff in error, as proven by this witness, might be elaborated after this manner: "We are not bound to borrow any money unless we need it, but the bank must keep in reserve the necessary funds to meet the demands of our business, up to the amount of $20,000. If we do not happen to need it, we are under no obligation to borrow, and the bank cannot expect any remuneration for maintaining a state of readiness to meet possible sudden demands for money; yet, if the demand is made, and the money is not loaned, the bank is liable to us in damages for a failure to make the exacted loan." A contract of this kind is manifestly unilateral, without consideration, and incapable of enforcement. McCaw Manufacturing Co. v. Felder, 115 Ga. 408, 41 S. E. 684, and authorities cited.

2. The execution of the notes sued on having been admitted, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, unless the plea of recoupment was sustained by evidence. As pointed out in the preceding division of this opinion, the evidence discloses that this plea was in fact based upon the violation of a unilateral contract. This amounted to no defense at all. Therefore the verdict was demanded by the evidence, and the court, with propriety, might well have directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for. Instead of so doing, the trial judge submitted certain issues of fact to the jury, and error is assigned upon certain portions of his charge. Exception is also taken to various rulings in admitting or excluding evidence relating to a breach of this unilateral contract. Inasmuch, however, as the verdict was demanded, any possible errors committed by the court in charging the jury or in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence touching the alleged breach of such contract afford no cause for ordering a new trial. People's Bank v. Smith, 114 Ga. 185, 39 S. E. 920.

2. There is no error in overruling a plea in abatement to a bill of indictment based on the ground that one of the grand jury that found the bill had not resided within the county for the period of six months, when it is not made to appear that the accused did not have full notice and opportunity to make the question by challenge before the finding of the indictment. *Lascelles v. FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—ACTIONS AGAINST.

1. A foreign corporation doing business in this state and having agents located therein for this purpose may be sued and served in the same manner as domestic corporations upon any transitory cause of action, whether originating in this state or otherwise; and it is immaterial whether the plaintiff be a nonresident or a resident of this state, provided the enforcement of the cause of action would not be contrary to the laws and policy of this state.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by H. N. Reeves against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Andrews & Skeen, for plaintiff in error.
Dorsey, Brewster & Howell and Sanders McDaniel, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. This was an action in the city court of Atlanta, by a plaintiff whose place of residence does not appear, against a foreign railroad corporation which is doing business in the city of Atlanta. The defendant was duly served with process according to the law of this state. The cause of action alleged is a tort to property committed in the state of Alabama, the tort consisting of an injury to a horse which was being transported from Harrisonville, Mo., to Atlanta, Ga., in a car of the defendant company. The petition did not allege that the contract of transportation was made by any officer or agent of the corporation in Georgia, or that the tort was connected in any way with orders issued by a Georgia officer, or from a Georgia office of the corporation. The court dismissed the petition on demurrer for want of jurisdiction, and the plaintiff excepted.

The fact that a corporation has no existence except in legal contemplation gave rise to the conception that its existence could not be legally recognized outside of the territorial jurisdiction of the lawmaking power which created it, and that, therefore, it was impossible for a corporation to migrate beyond the bounds of its creator. This conception resulted in the courts holding that the corporation could not be sued in a jurisdiction foreign to that which gave it existence. While, under this view, as a matter of theory the corporation did not migrate, yet as a matter of fact its officers and agents did; and contracts were made in its name, and wrongs committed by its officers and agents, in territory far remote from that in which it was supposed to have its only legal existence. Great hardship and inconvenience resulted oftentimes from the application of this rule, which had the effect of compelling those who sought redress for breaches of contract and other legal wrongs against the corporation to bring their actions in the courts of the jurisdiction creating the corporation; the expenses of the remedy in many cases amounting to more than what would have been the fruits of recovery. The recognition of the hardship resulting from this rule brought about a modification of the rule to the extent that, where a foreign corporation located an agent and actually transacted business in a foreign jurisdiction, it so far acquired a residence in that jurisdiction as to make it amenable to the processes of the courts thereof on all causes of action originating within that jurisdiction. The rule was then further modified to the extent that, where the corporation had an agent and was doing business in a foreign jurisdiction, it might be sued upon any transitory cause of action by a citizen of the state in which the corporation was thus doing business. And in this country it followed from this rule that, if a resident was allowed to bring this suit, any citizen of the United States would, under the Constitution of the United States, have a similar right to bring suit. South Carolina Railroad Co. v. Nix, 68 Ga. 572 (2), 580; Barrell v. Benjamin, 15 Mass. 354; Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 113, 114, 10 Sup. Ct. 269, 33 L. Ed. 538. There are many years and manifold changes in economic conditions between the old rule, which denied the right to sue a foreign corporation in personam outside of the jurisdiction of its creation, and the modern doctrine that the question of jurisdiction and suability is not so much one of citizenship as one of finding. See Williams v. Ry. Co., 90 Ga. 522, 16 S. E. 303; Dearing v. Bank, 5 Ga. 497, 48 Am. Dec. 300. The development of the principle was by gradual steps, and necessarily involved the overturning of many old cases. The case of Bawknigh v. Insurance Company, 55 Ga. 194, was decided during the transition period, and before the modern doctrine had been firmly established. It denied the right to sue a foreign corporation on a foreign cause of action. This decision seems to have been followed in Central Railroad Co. v. Carr, 76 Ala. 388, 52 Am. Rep. 339. In the Bawknigh Case it is to be noted that the original record shows that the plaintiff was a resident of the state of Florida, and at that time the fact of the nonresidence of the plaintiff was by several courts considered important; some holding that on a cause of action arising in another state a nonresident plaintiff could not sue a nonresident corporation, while others held that it was within the discretion of the court to allow or refuse such right to a nonresident. The true test of jurisdiction is not residence or nonresidence of the plaintiff, or the place where the cause of action originated, but whether the defendant can be found and served in the jurisdiction where the cause of action is asserted. A corporation can be found in any jurisdiction where it transacts business through agents located in that jurisdiction, and suits may be maintained against it in that jurisdiction if the laws of the same provide a method for perfecting service on it by serving its agents. From 1845 to the present time the law of Georgia has provided that service of process necessary to the commencement of "any suit against any corporation in any court," with certain exceptions, which are not material to this discussion, may be perfected by serving any officer or agent of such corporation, or by leaving a copy of the process at the place of transacting the usual and ordinary business of such corporation, if such place shall then be within the jurisdiction of the state in which the suit is commenced. Civ. Code 1895, § 1899. The language of this section is sufficiently broad to authorize the service of process in a suit against a foreign corporation that has a place of doing business in this state. City Fire Ins. Co. v. Carrugi, 41 Ga. 660 (1), 671. There are many cases decided by this court where it either expressly or tacitly recognized that a foreign corporation may be sued in this state in personam if lawful service can be perfected upon it. See Selma R. Co. v. Lacy, 43 Ga. 461; Mayor of Macon v. Cummins, 47 Ga. 326; Nat. Bank v. Mfg. Co., 55 Ga. 86; Dahlonega Min. Co. v. Purdy, 65

Ga. 496; Central R. R. v. Swint, 73 Ga. 651; Ala. R. Co. v. Fulghum, 87 Ga. 263, 13 S. E. 649; Watson v. R. Co., 91 Ga. 222, 18 S. E. 806; Saffold v. Mtg. Co., 98 Ga. 785, 787, 27 S. E. 203; South Carolina R. Co. v. Dietzen, 101 Ga. 730, 29 S. E. 292; Equity Life Ass'n v. Gammon, 119 Ga. 276, 48 S. E. 100. It is true that in most, if not all, of these cases the cause of action arose in Georgia, and the plaintiff was a resident of this state; but neither of these facts was stressed as being material in any of the decisions, the jurisdiction, where the question of jurisdiction was directly raised, being maintained on the ground that service of process could be had upon the corporation for the reason that it was present in the state when it transacted business there through an agent duly authorized to represent it in reference to the business transacted, and that the statute of 1845 was broad enough to authorize service of process upon foreign corporations by serving the agent who within this state transacted the business of the corporation. A natural person not a resident of this state may be sued in this state if found within its limits, and served with process, although he may be simply passing through the state, and not transacting business of any character within the same. Civ. Code 1895, § 4954. And there is nothing in the law authorizing such a nonresident person to be sued here which makes the jurisdiction of the courts dependent upon whether the cause of action against him originated in this state. Presence within the territorial limits of the state gives jurisdiction to its courts, and a nonresident may be brought into court by service of process in the same manner that a resident would be brought in. In cases of foreign corporations a mere passing through the state of an officer, even though the head officer, would not give the courts of this state jurisdiction of the corporation. Schmidlapp v. Ins. Co., 71 Ga. 246; Associated Press v. United Press, 104 Ga. 51, 29 S. E. 869; Reynolds Co. v. Martin, 116 Ga. 495, 42 S. E. 796. A corporation is not always present where its officers are, but it is present in any place where its officers or agents transact business in behalf of the corporation under authority conferred by it. The weight of modern authority seems to support the proposition that a foreign corporation may be sued on a transitory cause of action in any jurisdiction where it can be found in the sense that service may be perfected upon an agent or officer transacting business for the corporation within that jurisdiction, and that the residence of the plaintiff and the place at which the cause of action arose are not material questions to be determined to maintain jurisdiction if the corporation can be found and served. From among the numerous cases relating to this subject we cite the following: Eingartner v. Steel Co., 94 Wis. 70, 68 N. W. 664, 34 L. R. A. 503,

ture consideration and reflection we have reached the conclusion that this case should be overruled, and the law of this state, so far as this question is concerned, put upon the sound principles promulgated in the well-considered cases in other jurisdictions above referred to. The record does not disclose whether the plaintiff was a resident or non-resident of the state, but this being now immaterial, and the foreign corporation which is defendant having been found and duly served according to law, the court has jurisdiction of the cause of action stated in the petition, notwithstanding it arose in another state, there being nothing in the cause of action which would make its enforcement contrary to the policy and law of this state.

SMITH v. STATE.

LARCENY AFTER TRUST—EVIDENCE.

1. An indictment for larceny after trust, charging that the accused, after having been intrusted with money for the purpose of paying it to "Dudley-Butts Lumber Co.," fraudulently converted the same to his own use, is sufficiently supported by evidence showing that the money which the accused converted was intended for payment to "Dudley-Butts Sash, Door & Lumber Company"; it appearing that the two names were applied to the same corporation, and that it was as well known by one name as the other. "The question is one of the identity of the party, * * * and not merely one of the identity of a name." Jackson v. State, 76 Ga. 568; Rogers v. State, 16 S. E. 205, 90 Ga. 463.

2. The motion for a new trial did not complain that the court committed any error of law, but was upon the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence. The evidence warranted a finding that the accused, a building contractor, was intrusted by the prosecutor with money to pay certain bills for materials; that these materials were used in the construction of houses that the accused had built under a contract with the prosecutor; that credit for the materials was extended to the prosecutor, and not the accused, and the accused so understood; and that the accused converted the money so intrusted to him to his own use and immediately left the county. The verdict of guilty of larceny after trust was, therefore, not contrary to the evidence.

MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE—DAY OF SALE.

1. Where it was stipulated in a mortgage that upon default in the payment of the debt secured thereby the mortgagee, for the purpose of paying the indebtedness, was empowered to sell the mortgaged property at public outcry before the courthouse of a given county, after advertising the same for 30 days in the newspaper in which the sheriff of that county published his legal advertisements, the time for sale was fixed by the stipulation, and therefore it was not essential to a valid sale under the power that it be made on the day of the month designated by statute for public sales.

J. D. & L. M. Rambo and W. A. Scott, for plaintiff in error. W. D. Sheffield and W. C. Warrill, for defendants in error.

FISH, P. J. The record in this case presents but one question for decision. It was stipulated in a mortgage that upon default in the payment of the debt it was given to secure the mortgagee was empowered to sell the mortgaged property at public outcry, in front of the courthouse of a given county, after advertising the same for 30 days in the newspaper in which the sheriff of that county published his legal advertisements. The question is whether a sale under such power, in order to be legal, had to be made on a public sales day—the first Tuesday in the month. Civ. Code 1895, § 4023, provides: "Power of sale in deeds of trust, mortgages and other instruments is to be strictly construed and must be fairly exercised. In the absence of stipulations to the contrary in the instrument, the time, place and manner of the sale should be that pointed out for public sales." This section, as shown by the annotation, was codified from the decision in Calloway v. Bank, 54 Ga. 441. In that case there was a power of sale mortgage, in which it was stipulated that, if the indebtedness were not paid at maturity, the mortgagees were empowered to sell the mortgaged property, "after advertising the time, place, and terms of sale for the space of ninety days in one or more newspapers published in the city of Macon, Georgia," etc. In rendering the opinion in the case, Judge McCay said: "We recognize the rule that such powers are to be strictly pursued, and to be honestly and fairly exercised. It is true, too, that if no time, place, or manner be pointed out in the deed, the mode ordinarily pointed out by law for public sales ought, in our judgment, to be pursued. This is in accord with the spirit of our law as indicated by the provisions for executors and trustees. Code 1895, §§ 2328, 2567. This deed clearly contemplates a public sale. It fixes the time; it provides for the advertisement, and fixes the time of publication; it leaves nothing open but the place, but, in effect, it also covers that." If the time of sale were fixed by the terms of the stipulation in the mortgage in that case, it is quite clear, we think, that the phraseology of the stipulation in the mortgage in the case now under consideration has the like effect. Power to sell after advertising for 30 days was authority to sell on any week day for which the sale had been duly advertised for 30 days. It follows that a sale made by the mortgagee in accordance with the power, and on a week day other than the first Tuesday in the month, was not void. As the trial court ruled to the contrary, the judgment must be reversed.

Error from City Court of Moultrie; W. S. Humphreys, Judge.

Proceedings by J. C. Jenkins against the Moultrie Lumber Company to foreclose a laborer's lien. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jenkins made his affidavit to foreclose a laborer's lien under Civ. Code 1895, § 2816, for $290.96, against the Moultrie Lumber Company, claiming a lien upon all the personal property of the defendant, and particularly upon certain lumber and shingles therein described. Execution issued, and a levy was made on March 25, 1904. On March 30, 1904, a member of the defendant firm made a counter affidavit denying that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in any sum whatever. This affidavit was sworn to before Y. L. Watson, N. P. C. C. Ga. It does not appear where the affidavit was made, the caption simply stating the case, with the court to which it was returned. On the call of the case the defendant moved to dismiss the levy on the ground that some of the property was in Mitchell county and some in Worth county, and the return did not show that the sheriff of Mitchell county had levied on that which was only in Mitchell county. The plaintiff contended that the counter affidavit was void because sworn to and subscribed before Y. L. Watson, of counsel for the defendant, he being then and there attorney for the Moultrie Lumber Company. Thereupon the defendant offered in open court to have the affiant, who was then present in court, again swear to the same before a competent officer. This motion was denied by the court, and the counter affidavit was dismissed on the ground that the same was void, and not amendable. To this ruling the defendant excepted.

Bryan & Watson and Z. D. Harrison, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Powell, Ernest M. Davis, and R. J. Bacon, Jr., for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the facts). Where a laborer's lien has been foreclosed under Civ. Code 1895, § 2816, the execution issued thereon operates as final process. The office of the counter affidavit is to convert this final process into mesne process, and raise an issue which must then be passed upon by the proper tribunal. But until there is such an affidavit there is no case, nothing to be returned to a court, no pleading to be amended, and no issue to be tried. If, therefore, the counter affidavit was void, the defendant was not in a position, on this hearing, to have a ruling as to the validity of the foreclosure or levy. Civ. Code 1895, § 4417, expressly declares that "attorneys cannot take affidavits required of their clients unless specially permitted by law." The word "take" in this section was construed in Wilkowski v. Halle, 37 Ga. 681, 95 Am. Dec. 374, to mean that he cannot administer an oath to his client. The affidavit, being one which counsel was prohibited from certifying, was void. It should not have been received by the levying officer. It was ineffective to arrest the levy or to convert the final process into mesne process. There was nothing in court by which to amend. The case was properly dismissed.

FISHER v. GEORGIA VITRIFIED BRICK & CLAY CO. et al.

INJUNCTION—CONTRACT WITH CITY—PERFORMANCE.

1. Where a petition for injunction sought to prevent the performance of a contract by the terms of which the defendant obligated itself to pave a street for a municipal corporation and to give a bond to keep the pavement in good repair for 10 years, the ground upon which an injunction was sought being that the contract was ultra vires and void, and there was evidence warranting a finding that the work of laying the pavement had been practically completed, and that the circumstances which would give rise to the necessity for enforcing the provisions of the bond were only remotely contingent, it was not error to refuse to grant an injunction.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Charles Fisher against the Georgia Vitrified Brick & Clay Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Wm. H. Fleming, for plaintiff in error. El. H. Callaway and C. H. Cohen, for defendants in error.

CANDLER, J. On June 23, 1904, the Georgia Vitrified Brick & Clay Company (which, for brevity, will be called the "Brick Company") executed a contract with the city of Augusta to do certain paving for the city and to do other specified work incidental to the paving. Prior thereto, Fisher, a stockholder and director of the brick company, had sought to enjoin the execution of the contract, on the ground that it was ultra vires; but an injunction was refused, and when the case was brought to this court the writ of error was dismissed. Immediately after the contract was executed the brick company began the work prescribed therein, and there was evidence that on October 21, 1904, the date when the present suit was filed, it had practically completed the paving and the other incidental work. By the terms of the contract the brick company was required to keep the pavement in good condition and repair for 10 years; to hold the city harmless from all claims for damages arising in connection with the work; to pay a forfeit of $100 per day for each day that the contract might remain unfulfilled after the expiration of the time limit therein provided; and to give a bond in 45 per cent. of the amount of the contract, conditioned upon the faithful performance of the contract, and an additional bond to maintain the pavement in good condition for 10 years, and leave it in such condition at the end of that time. Fisher, having failed in his effort to enjoin the execution of the contract, instituted the present action to enjoin its performance. As before stated, when the suit was filed, the work of laying the pavement had been practically completed, the only dispute in the evidence on this subject being as to how long would be required to consummate certain details necessary before the work could be turned over to the city. Nearly $60,000 had been paid to the brick company on the contract, and there remained due a balance of only about $7,000. The prayers of the petition were (1) that the brick company be enjoined from further performance of the contract, or any part thereof; (2) that the contract be canceled as ultra vires and void; (3) that the brick company and the city be required to settle and adjust their equitable rights growing out of the part performance of the contract, and the brick company thereafter released from any obligation arising thereunder; and (4) for general relief.

In the view that we take of this case it is not necessary to go into the question most urgently stressed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, viz., the authority of the brick company, under its charter, to make the contract with the city of Augusta, the performance of which it is now sought to enjoin. Equity will not do a vain thing, and, of course, will not attempt to enjoin a thing that has already been done. The authorities for this proposition are too numerous to need citation. The evidence on the trial in the court below as to the exact status of the work undertaken by the brick company was somewhat in conflict; but the judge was authorized to find that the paving had been completed, and that the only thing remaining to be done before turning the work over to the city was to clear away the débris from the street, and a day's labor on a specified portion thereof. If this be true, the mischief, if any, has already been done; and the only thing left for the court to enjoin is the compliance with the condition of the bond given by the brick company to keep the street in repair for 10 years—a condition which at most is merely contingent. In the course of 10 years the street may or may not need repairing. There was evidence for the plaintiff to the effect that the paving was defective in certain particulars, which would materially shorten the duration of its usefulness, and that there would "necessarily be considerable risk in guarantying that the pavement shall be in good repair and have an unbroken surface at the end of ten years." On the other hand, the president of the brick company testified that the brick used in the pavement were of the best quality known; that the work of laying the pavement was properly done; that, "if the brick furnished by deponent's said company are of any value for paving material, there will never be any liability or expense incurred for the maintenance of said paving during the 10 years covered by said bond; that the only liability that can come upon said brick company as covered by said bond will necessarily be from the inherent defects and shortcomings of the brick furnished and used in constructing said pavement"; and "that said bond does not amount to anything more than a guaranty of the quality of said bricks for street paving." In any view of the evidence, the bond has already been made, and the only thing that can now be enjoined is the performance of its condition. The circumstances which will give rise to a necessity for such performance are, even according to the evidence for the plaintiff, only possible—not threatened, or even definitely probable. Here, again, equity will not interfere. The injury sought to be prevented must be more than speculative or contingent; it must be threatened. Rounsaville v. Kohlhelm, 68 Ga. 668, 45 Am. Rep. 505; Mayor v. Mitchell, 74 Ga. 377; Bacon v. Walker, 77 Ga. 338. This is a well-settled principle of equity jurisprudence, and its application to the case at bar, in our opinion, settles adversely to the plaintiff in error his right to the relief sought.

PIKE v. STATE.

SEDUCTION—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Evidence that the mother of the prosecutrix was dead, and that the defendant was the father of the child, was not irrelevant; nor is there any showing that it was harmful, or that any improper argument was based thereon.

2. The extracts from the opinion in O'Neill v. State, 11 S. E. 856, 85 Ga. 383, were correct statements of law, and there would have been no error in giving the same. But there is no assignment that the same principle was not otherwise given. An inspection of the charge found in the record shows that the court covered the principles involved in the requests to charge.

3. There was no error in giving the other charges complained of, nor in any other ruling on the trial.

4. The evidence, while conflicting, was sufficient to sustain the verdict, and there was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Brooks County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Albert Pike was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

On the trial of Pike for seduction the prosecutrix testified "that she lived with her father, stepmother, brother, and sister." Over objection of the defendant that the same was irrelevant, she was allowed to testify that the mother was dead. Over like objection she was permitted to testify that the defendant was the father of her child. Having been convicted, Pike moved for a new trial on these grounds, and also because the court refused written requests to give in charge certain propositions which were in the language of this court in O'Neill v. State, 85 Ga. 383, 11 S. E. 856 (2), (4); because the court charged that the jury must inquire from the evidence whether it was by persuasion and promises of marriage that the defendant accomplished his purpose, and whether she was an unmarried female, and virtuous; because the court charged that, if the prosecutrix was consenting to have sexual intercourse with the defendant, not under any promises of marriage, or from being overcome with persuasion, but was as willing to the intercourse as the defendant, then the defendant would be guilty of fornication; and because the court charged that it was for the jury to say how far the impeachment of any of the witnesses was successful. The motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

W. S. Humphreys and S. S. Bennett, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Thomas, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the facts). 1. In prosecutions for seduction there is peculiar and special absence of any need for appeals in order to secure conviction. On this, as on all other hearings, the defendant is guaranteed a fair trial. Considering the peculiar character of the issue involved, the state is under the obligation to check, rather than inflame, passions aroused by the natural sympathy of those before whom the hearing in this class of cases is had. In the present record, however, there is no assignment that the testimony, if irrelevant, was harmful, and no suggestion that any improper use was made of the fact that the mother of the young woman was dead. But, looked at from the rules of evidence, we cannot hold that the testimony was irrelevant. It was admissible, not for the purpose of forming a basis of appeal to the sympathies of the jury, but to show her situation and environment, and to what extent she was protected or subject to the persuasions of the defendant. So, too, as to the evidence relating to the paternity of the child. The fact of its birth was a circumstance in proof of the fact that there had been sexual intercourse. This had to be established before there could be any conviction for seduction. Besides, the defendant subsequently admitted that on many occasions he had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix. This admission is an answer also to the assignment of error on the use of the words "accomplished his purpose" by the court in its charge. It was not cause for granting a new trial that the court instructed the jury that they were to determine whether that admitted and "accomplished" connection had been brought about by persuasion and promises of marriage, or whether she consented because she was as willing to the intercourse as the defendant.

2. It is not always proper in a charge to use the language in the opinion of an appellate court. But, even if the paraphrase of the abstract propositions announced in the O'Neill Case, 85 Ga. 383, 11 S. E. 856, was such as could be used as a part of the instructions to the jury in the particular case on trial (Jones v. State, 90 Ga. 628, 16 S. E. 380 [4]), the judge elsewhere gave the principle of the request. He instructed the jury that they must first find that the prosecutrix was a virtuous, unmarried female; that in determining that question they might consider any facts or circumstances tending to show a debauched mind and behavior; that it would not take direct or positive evidence of previous connection with some other person; any evidence that would satisfy their minds beyond a reasonable doubt that she had parted with her virginity would be sufficient.

3, 4. There were witnesses who were offered to impeach several witnesses for the defendant. There was no error in instructing the jury that it was for them to say how far the impeachment of any witness was successful. The motion for a new trial assigns as error that the judge instructed the jury that if the defendant, by promises of marriage or persuasion induced the female to have carnal connection, etc. But when his attention was called to this matter he stated that if he said "or" instead of "and," it was a slip of the tongue; that the jury must find, under the charge in the indictment, that the female yielded because of promises of marriage and persuasion. He thereby not only cured the error, but so emphasized the necessity of showing both promises and persuasion, as to help, rather than injure the defendant. We find no error requiring the grant of a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

RHODES v. CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 21, 1904.)

MUNICIPAL BONDS—VALIDATING ACT—MISNOMER—NOTICE—PUBLICATION—SERVICE ON MUNICIPALITY.

1. The misnomer of the municipality in a petition to validate bonds under the act approved December 6, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 82), does not vitiate the judgment of confirmation, where it appears that the officers of the municipality acknowledged service of the petition and answered the same under oath in its true corporate name, and the judgment of validation also sets forth the proper corporate name of the municipality.

2. The published notice prescribed in section 6 of said act is designed to give the citizens of the municipality, county, or division information of the pending proceeding, and a substantial compliance with the statute is sufficient.

3. Where the validating proceeding, which was served on the municipality, was described in the published notice by the caption, "State of Georgia vs. The Town of Louisville, Jefferson County," and there is no municipality in Jefferson county having the corporate name of the "Town of Louisville," but there is a municipality in that county with the corporate name of the "City of Louisville," such notice is sufficient to notify the citizens of the city of Louisville of the proceeding to validate the bonds of that municipality.

Action by E. H. Rhodes against the city of Louisville. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

G. H. Howard, for plaintiff in error. B. T. Rawlings, Sol. Gen., and Phillips & Phillips, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. The plaintiff in error, in behalf of himself and other taxpayers of the city of Louisville, Ga., seeks to enjoin the city of Louisville, Ga., from selling certain bonds of that municipality, authorized by an election held in that city, and which were validated by the judge of the superior court of the Middle circuit. He attacks the judgment of validation on two grounds: (1) That the petition of the solicitor general to validate the bonds was brought against the town of Louisville, Ga., and not the city of Louisville, Ga.; and (2) that the published notice in the newspaper was of a proceeding against the town of Louisville, and not against the city of Louisville. For these reasons it is contended that the judgment of validation is void. On the hearing the facts were agreed upon, and the court denied the injunction. The exception is to the refusal of the injunction.

The judgment of validation was based on a petition of the solicitor general of the Middle circuit, reciting that "an election was held in the city of Louisville, Georgia; that the purpose of said election was to ascertain whether or not said town would issue bonds." The allegations as to the election, the result thereof, the amount, number, maturity of the bonds, and the rate of interest, the service of notice of the result of the election on the solicitor general within 20 days of declaring the result, were made with all the fullness and precision required by the act approved December 6, 1897. Acts 1897, p. 82. The first paragraph of the petition declared that the city of Louisville was the county site of the county of Jefferson. The prayer of the petition was "that an order be granted requiring said I. F. Farmer, mayor, and W. L. Phillips, L. R. Farmer, J. B. Polhill, J. O. Little, and J. F. Brown, aldermen, of the town of Louisville, to show cause before the judge of the superior court of the Middle circuit on the 22d day of July, 1904, why said bonds should not be validated." The judge of the superior court granted an order requiring the "defendants" to show cause before him at a named place and on a given date why the bonds should not be validated. Service of the petition and order was acknowledged by the mayor and council of the city of Louisville. Notice of the hearing of the petition was published in the proper gazette. The notice was a copy of the order of the judge, with the caption: "State of Georgia vs. The Town of Louisville, Jefferson County. Petition to validate bonds." The city of Louisville, by its officers, the mayor and councilmen, filed its answer under oath, whereupon the court passed the following order: "Wrightsville, Ga., July 22, 1904. In the Matter of the Validation of Bonds of the City of Louisville, Ga. The above-stated matter coming on for hearing before me this day, as provided by order previously passed upon the petition of B. T. Rawlings, solicitor general of the Middle Judicial Circuit of Georgia, and the sworn answer of the mayor and city council of the city of Louisville, Ga., on this, the 22d day of July, 1904, after duly considering said petition and answer, together with the certificate of the clerk of the superior court of Jefferson county that the required notice has been published duly as required by law, it is ordered that the bonds, as contemplated in said petition, be issued, and that the issuance of said bonds is hereby confirmed and validated as prayed for."

1. Under the ruling in Augusta So. R. Co. v. City of Tennille, 119 Ga. 804, 47 S. E. 179, and cases therein cited, if the city of Louisville had not answered, but, on the other hand, had appeared to object to the proceeding because it was not brought against it in its corporate name, the court would have dismissed the petition. However, the city of Louisville answered the petition, and by its answer admitted that it was the corporation about to issue the bonds described in the petition, and for the validation of which the petition was brought. Notwithstanding the proceeding was against the town of Louisville, Ga., the petition recited the election was had in the city of Louisville, Ga. The city of Louisville answered this petition, and a judgment was rendered against the city of Louisville, eo nomine, confirming and validating the issuance of the bonds. If a person is sued by the wrong name, but is served, and pleads to the action, he is bound by the judgment. Even though a petition be defective for want of proper parties, yet, if such parties do in fact file their answer, such defect is cured. Mayor & Council of Brunswick v. Finney, 54 Ga. 318. So far as the misnomer of the municipality is concerned, the appearance of the municipality and pleading in its true corporate name cured this defect in the pleading. The city of Louisville is as effectually bound by that judgment as if the petition had been directed against it in the first instance.

2, 3. The notice prescribed in the sixth section of the act of 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 84) is designed to give information to the citizens of the municipality, county, or political division about to issue bonds of the pending proceeding to confirm and validate the same. Provision is made for any citizen desiring to contest the validity of the issue to become a party to the proceeding, and to sue out a writ of error to the Supreme Court from the judgment of validation. By this procedure the Legislature has declared the sound policy of determining, by judicial inquiry in advance of the sale, the validity of the bonds about to be placed on the market. The machinery employed is a proceeding in the name of the state against the municipality, county, or political division intending to issue bonds, wherein is alleged a compliance with the constitutional requirements relative to incurring bonded indebtedness. The judgment of the superior court is against the municipality, county, or political division, confirming the issuance of the bonds as in compliance with the statutes and the Constitution. As an additional safeguard against possible carelessness or collusion, the clerk is required to publish in a gazette having general circulation in the territory affected notice of the time of hearing the application to validate the bonds. A substantial compliance with this section of the act is all that is required. No judgment in personam is sought against the individual citizen, but he is permitted and invited to investigate the proceeding, and to resist the legality of the proposed bond issue. If the notice is sufficient to put the individual citizen on notice that the municipality, county, or political division of which he is a resident is seeking to validate bonds, and the time of hearing of the proceeding, the statutory purpose has been subserved. The caption of the notice published by the clerk was of a proceeding against the "Town of Louisville, Jefferson County." Judicial notice will be taken of the corporate name of a municipality. Without proof, the courts know that the city of Louisville is a municipal corporation located in Jefferson county, and that there is no such corporation therein as the town of Louisville. This knowledge will be imputed to every citizen of the city of Louisville. It frequently happens that the corporate name of a town or city is more elaborate and comprehensive than the name of the town or city as used in ordinary speech. Sometimes the corporate name is styled the mayor and aldermen of such a town or village, and yet outside of legal procedure the full corporate name is rarely, if ever, used. No citizen of the city of Louisville could have been misled by designating his municipality as the town of Louisville. Only recently the election had been held, two-thirds of the qualified voters had expressed their concurrence in the proposition to bond the municipality, and acts of such notoriety would at once suggest to a citizen of the city of Louisville that the published notice had reference to that municipality.

It will be observed that there is a wide distinction between the necessity of alleging the correct name of the corporation as a party defendant in a legal action and the general notice to the public of a pending action against the corporation. In the first instance it is essential to the validity of the judgment that the defendant corporation be styled by its correct name; otherwise the judgment would not be against it. But where a notice is required to be given to the public of a pending proceeding against a corporation the niceties of exact pleading are not demanded, and a notice sufficiently descriptive of the corporate name, so as to be easily and readily applied to the legal name of the corporation, will be deemed a substantial compliance. Accordingly, we hold that the published notice was a substantial compliance with the validating act of 1897.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v.
PRICE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 27, 1905.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—DANGEROUS PREMISES—KNOWLEDGE OF PLAINTIFF—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. It is reasonably to be expected of a railway employé, who is engaged in the performance of duties in and around one of the freight-yards of his master, that he shall avail himself of his opportunities to familiarize himself with his surroundings, and note the location of a culvert passing under an embankment along which tracks are laid, to the end that he may guard against the obvious danger of falling into the culvert in the event his duties call him in the nighttime to the point where it is situated; and if he be injured by falling into the same he cannot be heard to say that though he knew of its existence, and, notwithstanding he had previously had full opportunity to acquaint himself with its relative location, he did not in point of fact know exactly where it was, and that his master should have warned him of the danger of falling into it before sending him at night to attend to his duties on and around an engine which had been left directly over the culvert.

2. The charge of the court touching the right of the plaintiff to recover was not adjusted to the law and facts of the case on trial, and unjustly deprived the defendant company of one of its main defenses; irrelevant and prejudicial evidence was admitted over its objection; and these and other errors committed should have persuaded the trial judge to grant a new trial irrespective of the question whether the evidence sufficiently supported the finding of the jury.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Sam Price against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Hall & Wimberly and J. E. Hall, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Hall and Clawson & Fowler, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. This was an action for damages brought by Price against the Central of Georgia Railway Company, he having sustained personal injuries while in its employ as a locomotive fireman. The case made by his petition was, in brief, as follows: About half past 12 one night he was called on by the defendant company to go out on an engine about to leave the city of Macon, and went to the place in the company's yard where his engine had been stationed by other employés whose duty it was to bring the engine from the roundhouse. The steam was on, and the engine was fully prepared to go out on what was known as the "South-western Division" of the company's road. He undertook, as it was his duty to do, to make an examination of the engine for the purpose of seeing that certain parts of it were in good order, and while in the discharge of this duty he stepped into an opening or hole on the premises of the company, very near the track on which the engine was standing, and received the injuries complained of. He had no reason whatever to apprehend that this opening or hole existed, and before he fell into the same did not see it, and could not, by the use of ordinary care on his part, have discovered the same. He was at the time in the full discharge of his duty at the place where the company required him to be, and was himself entirely free from fault. He had "no knowledge or notice of the existence of said hole or opening at that place." It was an opening in a culvert or waterway that passed under the tracks of the company at that place, and its presence was absolutely unknown to him up to that time, and he had no means of discovering it before he fell into the same. The hole was on one side of the engine, right at the point where the cow-catcher stood, and in passing around the cow-catcher for the purpose of examining the engine, he stepped into the hole; it being impossible for him, under the conditions existing at the time, to have discovered its presence in time to prevent the injury. He fell a distance of some 15 feet into a culvert or sewer, and as a result of the fall both bones of his left leg, just above the ankle, were broken, and badly splintered.

The plaintiff charged that the employés of the company were negligent in unnecessarily placing the engine so near the opening in the top of the sewer, and in failing to give him notice of the presence of this opening; that the company was negligent in sending him, without warning, to an unsafe place in which to perform his duties, when it had every means of discovering the dangerous locality, and he did not have equal means of discovering the same before he was injured; that the defendant was negligent in permitting or causing the opening to be made on its premises, and in not taking any means to give petitioner or any other employé notice of the existence of this dangerous place on its premises, where he was required to go in the performance of his work; and that the company was also negligent in failing to place any sort of guard or railing about said excavation in order to prevent persons going upon the premises of the defendant from falling into the same, and being thereby injured. The railway company filed an answer, wherein it made a denial of the facts upon which the plaintiff relied as showing negligence on its part. On the trial, however, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and it is to the refusal of the court to grant a new trial that the company excepts.

Before undertaking to deal with the several assignments of error set forth in the motion for a new trial, it may be well to give a brief summary of the evidence touching the character of the hole or opening into which the plaintiff fell, and its situation relatively to the track on which the engine was placed and other points in the immediate vicinity. This particular track was a "spur," which, together with other tracks, passed along an embankment some 14 feet in height. Through this embankment extended a brick culvert, built some time prior to the year 1875. From 1886 up to the time of the plaintiff's injury on February 17, 1902, this culvert had remained in the same condition, save for necessary repairs, in which it was on that date. The stream running through this culvert passed through the company's yards under about ten freight tracks, under its coal chute, then under two passenger tracks, and then under two tracks leading to its shopyard. At several points, between different sets of tracks, the ravine through which this stream ran was exposed to view, the coal chute being one of these points. The spur track on which the plaintiff found the engine on the night of his injury was the outside track, and was laid so close to the edge of the culvert that there was no passageway between the end of the cross-ties and the edge of the opening; nor was this opening guarded by any railing extending from one side of the embankment to the other. There was, however, a free passageway between this track and the one next to it, the spaces between the rails and those between the several tracks at this point where they crossed the culvert having been filled in with earth and cinders. The exposure on the outer side of the spur track, caused by its proximity to the edge of the culvert, was an open and obvious one. By day the situation could have been taken in at a glance by the casual observer. At night, one passing along the railway embankment might, in the darkness, fail altogether to observe the ravine on one side where it was not spanned by the culvert, especially if one were not familiar with the locality. It was customary for the company's hostlers, in the discharge of their duty, to bring engines from the roundhouse, and to place such of them as were to go out on the Southwestern Division upon this spur track. Engines had sometimes been placed below the culvert, though they were usually left the distance of a block or so above. On the night of the plaintiff's injury three engines were brought from the roundhouse and placed on this track in readiness for the engine crews; that on which the plaintiff was expected to go being the last in line, so that the others might start out ahead. It was left over the culvert, and the engineer and the plaintiff were expected to locate it and take it in charge.

1. On the argument before us, counsel for the plaintiff in error very strenuously insisted that the evidence was not such as to support a verdict in favor of Price. The theory upon which he sought to recover was as follows: He was sent for in the middle of the night, and called on by the company to serve as fireman on engine 1001. He was expected to find this engine, and, after locating it, to go around it, and see whether or not it was in good order. Such being his duty, the company was bound to place the engine at a place where he could reach it in safety and perform his duty of inspection. Instead of choosing a safe place, the company's hostler left the engine over the culvert, negligently failing to observe the open ravine at this point, of which he had, or ought to have had, knowledge. Plaintiff received no warning of the dangerous locality in which the engine had been left; did not know of the existence of any culvert in that part of the company's yard; had never before been called on to take an engine so far down on the spur track; and had no reason to apprehend that the engine had not, as always theretofore, been left in a place of safety. After arriving at the company's yards, he went in search of engine 1001, going along the embankment between the spur track and that next to it; and, after locating the engine, he got on it, changed his clothes, attended to minor duties inside the cab, and then took his hammer, wrench, flambeau, and oil can, and started on his tour of inspection, getting off the engine on the same side from which he had boarded it, which was the side next to the adjoining track on the left. After examining the left side of the engine, he got in the middle of the track and looked at the headlight, turned it down, and then got on the pilot in order to reach and adjust the "spark slide." From the pilot he stepped to the outer rail, then upon the cross-ties, and started to go around on the right side of the engine, but fell over the culvert into the ravine below, sustaining the injuries of which he complains.

If this represents the real truth of the matter, then it was for the jury to say whether or not the plaintiff, on this occasion, acted with due caution and circumspection. But the contention of the company is that such does not constitute the entire truth surrounding the occurrence, even though the plaintiff gave a truthful account of the manner in which he received his injury. His stout avowal that prior to the night of February 17, 1902, he had no knowledge of the existence of a culvert in that immediate vicinity, and was unfamiliar with that particular locality, is as strongly denied by the defendant company. Moreover, it insists that, even if the plaintiff did not have actual knowledge of the precise location of this culvert and open ravine in its yards, his opportunities for knowing all about the same had previously been such that he cannot now be heard to say that the company was under any duty to give him notice thereof, to the end that he might, on the night of February 17th, have watched out for and discovered the culvert, and have observed that engine 1001 had been placed directly over it. The defense thus interposed was such as, if sustained, would defeat any recovery by the plaintiff. Blackstone v. Railway Co., 112 Ga. 762, 38 S. E. 79, and cases cited. And this defense was supported by testimony, which demonstrated that, if Price did not have actual knowledge of the existence and precise location of the culvert, his opportunities for knowing had been such that the law would impute knowledge to him.

On the argument before this court, counsel for the defendant in error conceded Price's general knowledge of the existence of the culvert, and the open ravine running through the company's yard, but contended that, relatively to the place where the locomotive was stationed, he did not know of the precise location of the culvert. The law charges the servant with what he ought to have known, and will not excuse him for not knowing in case he has been negligently unobservant. Price had worked in the yards of the defendant company first as section hand, afterwards as fireman on a switch engine, and at the time of the injury was employed as fireman on a freight train. His employment as fireman on a switch engine extended over a period of about two years. He had previously worked as a section hand about six months. During this time there had been no change in the physical appearance of the culvert. With such opportunities for obtaining knowledge of the location of the culvert, the conclusion is irresistible that an ordinarily prudent man, under similar conditions, would have known of its location.

2. On the trial the plaintiff sought to contrast his diligence on the night of his injury with that of the company's hostler. To this end the plaintiff showed that he walked down the railroad embankment between two tracks, and was therefore not in a good position to discover the culvert, whereas the hostler's post of duty was on the right-hand side of the engine, from which side he had full opportunity to observe the culvert as he approached it with the engine. The court charged the jury that should they believe from the evidence that the place in which the engine was left was not reasonably safe, and the company knew, or ought by the exercise of ordinary care to have known, of the danger, and "that Sam Price did not know of it at the time of the alleged injury, and had not equal means of knowing such danger, and could not, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence at the time of the alleged injury, have known of such danger," then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. The court further instructed the jury that "the conduct of the parties to this case, the conduct of Sam Price, the conduct of the railway company as represented by its officers, servants, and employees, is to be tested by ordinary care and diligence at the time of the alleged injury—that care and diligence which every prudent man would exercise under the same or similar circumstances and conditions." The complaint made of these instructions is that the court thereby limited the jury to a consideration of the conduct of Price on the night of the injury, and entirely ignored the company's defense that he might previously have known all about this culvert, and ought to have become perfectly familiar with its location, even though he may not have had any actual knowledge concerning it prior to the time he was hurt. The criticism is just. Moreover, we find, upon inspecting the entire charge of the court, that in it no reference whatever was made to this aspect of the company's defense, but that it was wholly deprived of all benefit of the same.

The court further committed error in charging upon the assumption that the capacity of the plaintiff to earn money might have increased, there being no evidence to warrant such a charge.

Over the objection of defendant's counsel, the plaintiff was permitted to elicit from the company's engineer the statement that when, shortly before the plaintiff's fall, the witness had himself boarded the engine, he did not know it was over the culvert. This testimony was not only irrelevant, but prejudicial to the defendant. The engineer may or he may not have been a man who exercised ordinary care and diligence. His conduct on that night was not the subject-matter of investigation, and his failure to note the culvert could not illustrate the issue whether or not the plaintiff might, in the exercise of reasonable care, have discovered that the engine was over the same.

Complaint is made that the plaintiff was also allowed to show that at the end of a culvert near the coal chute the company had erected a guard rail. This evidence was certainly incompetent for the purpose of showing a quasi admission on the part of the company that the erection of guard rails in such places was a necessary precaution against injury to its employees. Ga. So. & Fla. Ry. Co. v. Cartledge, 116 Ga. 164, 42 S. E. 405, 59 L. R. A. 118; Portner Brewing Co. v. Cooper, 116 Ga. 175, 42 S. E. 408. The defendant had, it is true, brought out the fact that the plaintiff knew of that culvert at the coal chute, with a view to showing that he must have observed that the stream passing under the culvert into which he fell ran all the way across the company's yard, and that he was familiar with its general direction and its location relatively to other points in the yard, including the place where he usually boarded his engine. Had there really been any pretense by the plaintiff that he did not know of the existence of a culvert at the point where he met with his injury, or at a point other than at the coal chute, the testimony objected to might have been competent to show that one seeing the condition of affairs at the coal chute would not be put upon notice that, if there were other culverts, there might be danger in attempting to go around an engine or car standing over one of them, because of the absence of guard rails. But as the plaintiff admitted he knew of the existence of the culvert across which the sput track ran, and that he had previously had full opportunity to observe that there was no guard rail erected along its outer edge, this testimony threw no light on any issue in the case, and ought to have been excluded as wholly irrelevant.

Exception is taken to certain charges of the court on the ground that by inadvertence the judge used language calculated to impress the jury that the imputation of negligence against the company was to be accepted as an established fact. Another charge, touching the measure of damages, is also criticised on the ground of inaccuracy of expression. We shall not, however, undertake to pass more specifically upon these assignments of error, as, if another trial be had, the court will doubtless so frame its charge as not to subject it to like criticisms.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurred.

CRUM v. BRAY, Marshal.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 27, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ORDINANCES—HOGS RUNNING AT LARGE.

1. Under the general welfare clause in the charter of a municipal corporation, the mayor and council have authority to pass an ordinance providing that hogs shall not be allowed to run at large within the corporate limits.

2. In order to make such an ordinance effectual, such mayor and council have authority by ordinance to empower the marshal to seize and impound such hogs as are at large in the streets, and to provide that, after giving notice to the owner by advertising for 10 days, he shall, at the expiration of that time, sell such hogs unless they are redeemed by the owner's paying the costs of feeding, and an impounding fee of 50 cents for each hog.

3. Such an ordinance is not illegal, as providing for the forfeiture of the animals impounded.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Vienna; D. L. Henderson, Judge.

Action by D. A. R. Crum against G. B. Bray, marshal. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Crum & Jones, for plaintiff in error. E. F. Strozler, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. The city council of Cordele passed an ordinance which provided:

"It shall be unlawful for hogs to run at large upon the streets and sidewalks of the city of Cordele, the same being declared a nuisance. All hogs found at large upon the streets and sidewalks of said city * * * shall be impounded by the marshal or policeman in a suitable pound and, when so impounded, shall be advertised at the post office and council chamber by the marshal for ten days, at the end of which time they shall be sold if not redeemed by the owner. The owner of said hog or hogs shall pay all cost of feeding and fifty cents additional as an impounding fee for each hog so impounded." Under this ordinance the marshal of Cordele seized and impounded one suckling pig, of the value of 50 cents, belonging to Crum, the plaintiff in error. Thereupon Crum brought an action of trover against the marshal to recover the pig. The marshal set up the foregoing ordinance in justification of his acts, and stated that he stood ready to deliver the pig to the plaintiff upon the payment of the impounding fee prescribed in the ordinance. The case was heard by the trial judge upon the petition and answer, and he held that the marshal was in lawful custody of the pig, and that plaintiff was not entitled to recover it without paying the fees prescribed in the ordinance. To this ruling, Crum excepted.

The assignments of error in the bill of exceptions are very meager and indefinite, but in his argument the plaintiff in error contended (1) that the mayor and council had no power to declare a thing a nuisance which was not a nuisance at common law or by statute, and that even this right was limited by the charter of Cordele; and (2) that the enforcement of the ordinance providing for the sale of hogs amounted to a forfeiture of his property without due process of law.

1. We think it clear that, under the general welfare clause in the charter of the city of Cordele, the mayor and council had authority to pass the ordinance above set out. This clause of the charter is similar to that occurring in most of the charters granted to municipal corporations by the Legislature of this state. This general welfare clause confers broad and general powers upon the city authorities. Under such a clause the municipal authorities can pass any reasonable ordinance for the health, safety, protection, comfort, and good government of the people of the city which is not in conflict with the special provisions of the charter or with the Constitution and laws of the state. The charter of Cordele did give special power to remove, as nuisances, certain buildings, chimneys, fences, and porches which should become dangerous to the public or an obstruction of the city streets, but this special enumeration was clearly not intended to be exhaustive of the powers of the city with regard to declaring what should be considered nuisances or with regard to abating nuisances. Under the general welfare clause the city had authority to provide for the abatement of any nuisance not dealt with in the provisions of the charter which gave these special powers. Even at common law, permitting hogs to run at large upon the streets of a city is a nuisance. Hellen v. Noe, 25 N. C. 493. It is therefore clear that the city authorities had full power and authority to pass an ordinance making it unlawful to permit hogs to run at large upon the streets and sidewalks of the city.

2. Incidental to this power, and in order to make such an ordinance effectual, the city had authority to provide that the marshal should seize and impound hogs found at large upon the streets and sidewalks, and, after 10 days' advertisement, to sell the same unless they were redeemed by the owner's paying the cost of feeding and the impounding fee of 50 cents.

3. To the question whether the ordinance amounted to a forfeiture, we have devoted considerable time and study. After reading many authorities, we have come to the conclusion that the municipal authorities have power to seize and impound animals unlawfully upon the streets, and have them sold for the purpose of paying the reasonable cost of feeding and the impounding fee, provided there is sufficient notice given. This view is sustained by the great weight of authority as found both in decisions and in textbooks. Ordinances providing for the seizure and sale of animals found at large, without any provision for notice to the owner, have been held to amount to a forfeiture, especially where the proceeds of the sale were disposed of in some way other than by deducting the expenses and paying over the remainder to the owner of the animals sold. So ordinances providing for the sale of the animals, and the deduction from the proceeds of the reasonable impounding fee and expenses, and for a fine imposed upon the owner, without notice or judicial inquiry, have been held invalid as depriving the owner of the right of trial, and as forfeiting or confiscating his property without due course of law. Very different from such cases is the present one. Here there is no fine imposed as a penalty upon the owner of the impounded hog. His property is seized because it is upon the streets, and has become a nuisance which should be abated. Its detention for 10 days is itself one form of notice to him—a form of notice similar to that given in attachment. The ordinance also provides for public advertisement for 10 days, which is also constructive notice. There is no forfeiture of the property, but it is sold to pay the reasonable expenses unless the owner prefers to redeem it by paying those expenses. If the seizure and detention of the hog are unlawful, the owner is not without his remedy by due course of law. He can be fully heard, and have all material questions judicially determined by an action of trover, which, in this state "may be employed in any case in which replevin, detinue, or trover could be used at common law." Mitchell v. Georgia & A. Ry., 111 Ga. 762, 36 S. E. 971, 51 L. R. A. 622. This is, indeed, the remedy pursued by the plaintiff in error in the present case. For these reasons, we think the contentions of the plaintiff in error unsound.

One of the ablest opinions upon this subject which we have found is that of Valentine, J., in Gilchrist v. Schmidling, 12 Kan. 263. That case arose under an ordinance which provided for the impounding of cattle running at large in the streets of the city in the nighttime, and, which in other respects was similar to that involved in the present case. In the opinion Justice Valentine said: "Now, it will be admitted that, where the law or an ordinance provides that the owner of cattle shall, in addition to the cost of taking them up, impounding and keeping them, pay for the damages they may do to private individuals while unlawfully running at large, the question of damages and the amount thereof can be determined only by judicial investigation, and generally in a suit between the parties interested. Bullock v. Geomble, 45 Ill. 218. And it will also be admitted that, where fines or forfeitures or anything of a penal or criminal nature or character is imposed, the question of whether the owner of the stock is liable for the same can only be determined by judicial investigation. Const., Bill of Rights, § 10; Poppen v. Holmes, 44 Ill. 360 [92 Am. Dec. 186]; Willis v. Legris, 45 Ill. 289. It will also be admitted that some notice of some kind must be given, in order to render a sale of the property valid. Rosebaugh v. Saffin, 10 Ohio, 32. And it will also be admitted that the ordinance must be authorized by law or the charter of the city in order to be valid. See, as sustaining these propositions, Rockwell v. Nearing, 35 N. Y. 302, 307; Campbell v. Evans, 45 N. Y. 356; Happy v. Mosher, 48 N. Y. 313; Ames v. P. M. L. D. & B. Cos., 11 Mich. 147 [83 Am. Dec. 731]. But when nothing is attempted to be imposed upon the owner of the stock as damages or penalty, but only the reasonable cost of taking up, impounding, and keeping the same, and sufficient notice is provided for, and the ordinance authorized by the city charter, it is believed that no court has ever held the law, or the ordinance founded thereon, to be unconstitutional or invalid, although the sale may not be made under judicial process, although there may be no provision for a judicial investigation, except the general remedies to determine whether the law or the ordinance has been complied with, and although the notice provided for may not be a personal notice, but only a notice by publication or by posting. The ordinance which we are now considering does not attempt to impose upon the owner of the stock any damages or penalty, but provides merely for payment for taking up, impounding, and keeping the stock, and for posting notices of sale and making the sale. * * * Only the charge for taking up and impounding applies in the present case, for no other charges had yet accrued when the cattle were replevied, and no other charges were required from the owner before the officers were willing to surrender the cattle to the owner. Every charge authorized by said ordinance must be considered as remedial, in contradistinction to penal, and therefore does not come within those decisions which declare that a penalty can be imposed by judicial determination. Cattle running at large in the nighttime in a city are supposed to be a nuisance, or at least such a thing is supposed to be against the best interests of the public; hence they are taken up and impounded, not as a penalty against the owner, but as a protection to the public; and the fees are fixed merely as reasonable compensation for the trouble of taking them up and keeping them, and not in any sense as a penalty. These fees immediately become a lien upon the cattle, and can only be discharged by payment, and the owner has no right to the possession of his cattle until he makes this payment and discharges this lien. This is as far as this case goes, and this far the law and the ordinance must be valid beyond all doubt. No sale was attempted to be made in this case, and no fees were charged, except for taking up and impounding the cattle. Whether the officers could have made a valid sale of the cattle if they had not been replevied, it is not necessary now to determine, but yet we think they could. The officers were required to keep them at least six days before they offered them for sale, and could not then or at any time sell them without first giving at least three days' notice of the sale by posting notices in at least three public places in said city. * * * That ordinances and proceedings similar in their main features to those we are now considering are valid, we would refer to the following authorities: Hellen v. Noe, 25 N. C. 498; Whitfield v. Longest, 28 N. C. 268; Goosefink v. Campbell, 4 Iowa, 296; Gilmore v. Holt, 4 Pick. 257; and Rockwell v. Nearring and Campbell v. Evans, supra. Such proceedings as these do not determine a man's rights without giving him his day in court. He has his action of replevin from the very moment that the officers take possession of the property until the statute of limitations bars such an action to try the legality and validity of the proceedings whereby his property is taken. And if any irregularity or injustice should intervene that would render the taking up of the property void, the same would also render the sale, and all other proceedings connected therewith, void. And all this could be shown in an action of replevin: For instance, if some enterprising city marshal or other officer should take up a cow in the daytime, or should take her from an inclosure in the nighttime, or should go beyond the city limits to find her, these facts could be shown in an action of replevin, and after the sale as well as before, and would render the sale, and every proceeding connected therewith, or with the taking up of the cow, void. Thus the owner of the cow or the owner of any other stock taken up and impounded has 'for injuries suffered' an ample 'remedy by due course of law.' WOLFE v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE TO SUSTAIN.

1. There being nothing in the evidence or the statement of the accused which would authorize a finding that the act charged was brought about by his criminal negligence, a charge to the effect that criminal negligence would supply the place of intent was calculated to mislead the jury, and it was error to refuse to grant a new trial on an assignment of error complaining of such charge.

COBB, J. The accused was tried for the offense of assault with intent to murder, and convicted of the offense of shooting at another. He assigns error upon the refusal of the court to grant a new trial. The evidence for the state abundantly authorized, if it did not demand, a verdict of assault with intent to murder. The statement of the accused authorized a verdict of acquittal, upon the theory that the shooting was accidental. The judge instructed the jury in several places in his charge that if there was no intent to kill, but if the shooting was the result of criminal negligence, the accused would still be guilty. Error is assigned upon those portions of the charge, upon the ground that there was no evidence of criminal negligence. Under the state's evidence the shooting was with an intent to kill, and under the statement of the accused the shooting was the result of an accident unmixed with negligence. In such a case a charge that criminal negligence will supply the place of intent is calculated to mislead the jury, and a new trial should have been granted because of such instruction. The motion for a new trial contains numerous other assignments of error, some of them relating to matters which will probably not occur upon another hearing. No error seems to have been committed in the admission of the evidence which was objected to, and the other portions of the charge excepted to do not seem to be subject to the objections made thereto.

CRIMINAL LAW—PROCEDURE—NEW TRIAL—MOTION IN ARREST.

1. Where one convicted of a criminal offense made a motion in arrest of judgment and a motion for a new trial, and insisted upon both motions, it was not error for the judge, over the objection of the movant, to first hear and decide the motion for new trial, though the filing of the motion in arrest was prior to the filing of the motion for new trial. And where, under such circumstances, a new trial was granted, it was not error to then dismiss the motion in arrest, as the effect of the grant of the new trial was to set aside the judgment.

EXECUTION—EXCESSIVE LEVY—SALE—TITLE ACQUIRED.

1. This was a suit in ejectment, the plaintiff claiming under a sheriff's deed made in pursuance of a sale under a tax execution. It appeared that the property was worth $1,500 or $2,000, and that it was sold under an execution for $17.81. It also appeared that the defendant in execution owned at the time two other lots, less valuable than the one in controversy, and that the lot levied on was susceptible of division, though the value of the whole would have been impaired by such a division. Held, that the levy of the execution was grossly excessive and void, and the purchaser at the sale acquired no title as against the owner or those claiming under him, and it was not error to direct a verdict for the defendant. *Jones v. WILL—CONSTRUCTION—NATURE OF ESTATE—HEIRS—LIEN OF JUDGMENTS.

1. Testator died, leaving his property to his wife for life or widowhood, and giving her power to dispose of it during such time, with remainder over, of all that might be undisposed of upon her death, to his lawful heirs, or, if she remarried, then to his lawful heirs; including her as one of such heirs. Held, (1) that the widow took an estate for life or widowhood, and also a power of disposal; (2) that the testator's lawful heirs at the time of his death, other than his wife, took a vested remainder in the property, subject to be defeated by the widow's exercising her power of disposal, and subject, in the event she remarried, to having her included among the remaindermen; (3) that, where one of such heirs died after the testator died, and the widow subsequently died without having remarried or disposed of the property, children of such deceased heir could take only through him, and his interest was subject to the lien of judgments against his estate.

Garnishment proceedings between E. E. Melton and Effie Camp. Judgment for Camp, and Melton brings error. Reversed.

Cameron & Pinkston and W. D. Crawford, for plaintiff in error. John C. Butt and J. J. Dunham, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Judgment was obtained and fi. fa. issued for about $475 against the administrator of the estate of W. T. Melton, deceased. The estate being insolvent, the plaintiff in fi. fa. sued out summons of garnishment, and had the same served upon the administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of Mitson Melton, deceased. The garnishee answered that, as administrator, he had in his hands $140.29, arising from the proceeds of the estate of the testator, which was the amount W. T. Melton would have taken under the provisions of the will of the testator. The garnishee further stated in his answer that the heirs of W. T. Melton claimed title to this fund, not subject to the lien of the judgment, and he prayed that these heirs be made parties. Mrs. Ella Melton, the widow of W. T. Melton, and Mrs. Effie Camp, his daughter, claiming to be his only heirs at law, asked to be made parties, and filed a claim to the fund in the hands of the garnishee. They were made parties, but subsequently the name of Mrs. Melton was stricken, and the claim allowed to proceed in the name of Mrs. Camp alone. The case was submitted to the judge, without the intervention of a jury, upon the will of Mitson Melton and an agreed statement of facts. The judge decided in favor of the claimant, and the plaintiff in fi. fa. excepted.

The will of Mitson Melton disposed of his property as follows: "I do hereby give and bequeath all my estate both real and personal and all things to me belonging to beloved wife Julian Melton, to be by her controlled, managed and disposed of with full power, liberty and privilege of selling and buying, trading and trafficking as seems right and proper to her, trusting all to her discretion as long as she remains a widow, or in case she should never marry any more, then during her natural life, and at any time while the property is under her control she may help any of the children that may marry and be in need, but this shall be at her discretion, but if she should marry again then the entire remainder or balance of the property shall be equally divided among my lawful heirs and she shall be entitled to receive an equal part with the other heirs, and at her death the entire balance or remainder shall be equally divided among my lawful heirs." From the agreed statement of facts it appeared that the testator, Mitson Melton, had died April 24, 1881, leaving his widow and eight children, one of whom was W. T. Melton; that the widow did not remarry, but died in March, 1902; that W. T. Melton died in November, 1901, leaving as his only heirs at law his widow and Mrs. Camp, the latter being his only child; that each of the distributive shares of the estate of Mitson Melton in the hands of the administrator at the time of the service of the summons of garnishment was $140.29.

We think that the court below erred in holding that Mrs. Camp was entitled to a share of the estate of her grandfather, free of the lien of her father's debts. The will is inartificially drawn, but its intention seems clear. The testator's widow took an estate for life or widowhood, and also a power of disposal. Indeed, neither party to this case could travel, except on the theory that the widow took such an estate, and not a fee. The will expressly limits her estate to one for life or widowhood, and therefore the addition of the power of disposal does not enlarge this estate into a fee. Wooster v. Cooper, 53 N. J. Eq. 682, 33 Atl. 1050; Payne v. Johnson, 95 Ky. 175, 24 S. W. 238, 609; Shaw v. Hussey, 41 Me. 495. It is true, the words "as long as she remains a widow" and "during her natural life" follow the words giving the power of disposal, but this does not make them apply any the less to the estate given. They affected both the quantum of interest in the estate and the power of disposal. Stuart v. Walker, 72 Me. 146, 39 Am. Rep. 311. A power is not property, but a mere authority, and an absolute power of disposal is not inconsistent with an estate for life only. The gift of such power will not enlarge the life estate previously given, but confers an authority in addition thereto. The widow therefore took an estate for life or widowhood.

The limitation over to the lawful heirs of the testator was neither an executory devise nor a contingent remainder. It was to a class, and the objects thereof must be determined in this case as of the time when such will took effect; that is, at the death of the testator. These objects were certain at that time when the widow's estate commenced, and there was some one to take possession eo instanti upon the termination of the particular estate. The remaindermen were certain, and the particular estate had to be determined by a necessary event—the remarriage or death of the widow. There was therefore no contingency about the remainder, and there was nothing about the limitation over to make it conflict with the rules of law so as to require it to be construed as an executory devise. It is true, the remainder might be defeated by the widow's disposing of the property, but this did not make it a contingent remainder in a legal sense. The persons to take were certain and ascertained at the time of the testator's death, and the happening of the event was necessary. The uncertainty as to the mere quantum of property to be possessed did not make the remainder contingent. The remainder was subject to be divested, in whole or in part, by the widow's disposing during her widowhood of the whole or some part of the property left by the testator, but this contingency did not deprive the remainder of its character as vested. Until the happening of the divesting contingency, the remainder had all the incidents of an indefeasible interest, and when the contingent event was no longer possible the estate became absolute. Sumpster v. Carter, 115 Ga. 893, 42 S. E. 324, 60 L. R. A. 274. An able discussion of a will much like that here under consideration will be found in Burleigh v. Clough, 52 N. H. 267, 13 Am. Rep. 23. See, also, Wiley v. Gregory, 135 Ind. 647, 35 N. E. 507; Rail v. Dotson, 14 Smedes & M. 176.

The widow's estate could be terminated either by her death, in which case the heirs of the testator took all of the property that was left, or by her remarriage. In the latter event the widow was entitled to share as an heir in the property remaining. This, however, did not change the character of the remainder left to the heirs at law of the testator. Wilbur v. McNulty, 75 Ga. 458. There was a vested remainder to them, but in the event of her remarriage the class was to enlarge to receive her, and she was to share as one of the class. The particular estate was to end, and she to take her place as one of the remaindermen.

W. T. Melton was one of the heirs at law of the testator at the time of the latter's death. He was therefore one of the remaindermen, and had a vested remainder in his pro rata part of the property devised—this remainder subject to be divested or defeated by the widow's exercising her power of disposal, and his pro rata interest subject to diminution by the widow, in the event of her marriage, being classed as one of the remaindermen. The widow died without having remarried, and some, at least, of the property remained undisposed of by her. The remainder had not been defeated by a disposal of the property, and the property remaining went to the remaindermen. W. T. Melton had died prior to the death of the widow, but, as his remainder had been a vested one, his interest belonging to his estate. Mrs. Camp could take no interest in it under the will, but merely as one of the heirs of W. T. Melton, her father. As the property came through his estate, it was subject to the lien of the judgment against his estate, and the court below erred in holding that Mrs. Camp took it free of her father's debts.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

LUTTRELL et al. v. WHITEHEAD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 27, 1905.)

DEED—DESCRIPTION—EJECTMENT—POSSESSION—EVIDENCE—DOWER—ASSIGNMENT.

1. The description of the land in a deed must be sufficiently certain to afford means of identification. A deed purporting to convey land, which is so indefinite in description that the land is incapable of being located, is inoperative either as a conveyance of title or as color of title.

2. Possession of land cannot be established by family repute.

3. In an action of ejectment between an administrator of an intestate and one not a privy in estate it is error to admit in evidence the application of a former administrator for leave to sell the land of his intestate.

4. The description of land assigned as dower must be sufficiently certain to locate the premises before third persons will be affected by the dower proceedings.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Harris County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Action by A. H. Whitehead, administrator, against W. H. Luttrell and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Reversed.

J. H. Martin and J. B. Burnside, for plaintiffs in error. Hatcher & Carson, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. This was a common-law action of ejectment. The title relied on by the plaintiff was a deed from James W. Echols to John T. Whitehead, dated October 9, 1844, and possession of the land by Whitehead until his death; after his death, possession by Pitts, his administrator; assignment of dower to Catherine Whitehead, widow of John T. Whitehead, and possession by the dowress in 1886; the death of the dowress in 1901, and letters of administration on John T. Whitehead's estate to A. H. Whitehead in September, 1901. The defendant filed pleas of not guilty and of title by prescription. The verdict was for the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant made a motion for a new trial, to the denial of which he excepts.

1. When the plaintiff tendered in evidence the unrecorded deed from James W. Echols to John T. Whitehead, dated October 9, 1844, as an ancient document, the defendant objected to its admission in evidence on the ground that the deed was void, and of no effect, because of insufficient description of the land which it purported to convey. The description of the land was as follows: "All that tract or parcel * * * containing two hundred and fifty-five acres, more or less, it being part of the lot 270, and part of lot 271, and part of lot 274, and part of lot 272, all in the 17th District of Harris County." The court allowed the deed in evidence. The description is too vague and indefinite for the deed to have effect as a conveyance of title. It neither indicates the shape of the tract nor the metes and bounds of the land purporting to be conveyed. A deed is not invalid where the description is imperfect, if the instrument refers to extrinsic data by means of which the land may be identified. Likewise an ambiguous descriptive clause may be aided by allunde evidence. But such imperfect or ambiguous descriptions must not be confounded with a description utterly lacking in definiteness. A deed which fails to describe any particular land or to furnish any key to the confines of the land purporting to be conveyed is void. Huntress v. Portwood, 116 Ga. 351, 42 S. E. 513.

Was the deed admissible as color of title? The answer to this query must depend on what is meant by "color of title." In Beverly v. Burke, 9 Ga. 444, 54 Am. Dec. 351, it was defined to be "a writing upon its face professing to pass title, but which does not do it, either from a want of title in the person making it, or from the defective conveyance that is used; a title that is imperfect, but not so obviously so that it would be apparent to one not skilled in the law." And in Veal v. Robinson, 70 Ga. 816, it was said that color of title "is anything in writing purporting to convey title to land which defines the extent of the claim; it being immaterial how defective or imperfect the writing may be, so that it is a sign, semblance, or color of title." There are other decisions of our court giving substantially the same definition. From this it will be seen that it is immaterial as to the character of the instrument. It is not necessary that the color of title be executed in the form of a deed. Thus it has been held that a purchase at sheriff's sale and payment of the purchase money, evidenced by a written memorandum and receipt by the sheriff who made the sale, is sufficient to constitute color of title in aid of possession. Field v. Boynton, 83 Ga. 239. A forged bond for title, accepted by the obligee as genuine, without knowledge of the fraud, operates as color of title under our statute of prescription. Griffin v. Stamper, 17 Ga. 108; Millen v. Stines, 81 Ga. 655, 8 S. E. 315. Varied as the different instruments are which have been held sufficient to constitute color of title, all of our decisions hold that it is necessary that the extent of the claim should be defined in the instrument. Unless the land is sufficiently described in the instrument itself, or the description is of such a character that it furnishes the means of identification, the extent of the claim cannot be defined. The description in an instrument offered as color of title must afford the means, by the application of allunde proof, of identifying the land; and, if it is utterly defective in this respect, the instrument is not good as color. Title by prescription may result either from twenty years' adverse, actual possession without deed, or from seven years' possession under color of title. The only distinction between these two titles by adversary possession is that, where actual possession is relied on without the aid of a deed, twenty years is necessary before prescription will ripen; but where the adversary possession is held under color of title the possession need not extend beyond seven years. In the latter case the color of title aids the possession, and, unless there is some description in the instrument which will aid the possession by disclosing the character and extent thereof, the instrument relied on as color of title will be of no advantage to the possessor. Actual possession of a part of the land held under paper title will be extended to the boundaries of the paper title, and the prescriber may thus acquire a prescriptive title to land of which he has only constructive possession. But the "description in a deed to realty introduced as color of title will not be extended beyond its terms because of a belief by the holder under it that it covered land not embraced in that description, nor because of any unexpressed intention in the mind of the grantor that it should cover land not described in the deed itself." Williamson v. Tison, 99 Ga. 791, 26 S. E. 766. And if the instrument relied on as color of title be fatally indefinite in description of the premises therein referred to, the actual occupancy of a part cannot be adverse to the extent of any boundaries whatever. The necessity of a sufficiently certain description is therefore apparent. While the exact point has not, perhaps, been heretofore definitely raised in this court, the correctness of the proposition has been assumed. See Tumlin v. Perry, 108 Ga. 520, 34 S. E. 171. And this conclusion is in accord with the general current of authority. Barker v. Ry. Co., 125 N. C. 596, 34 S. E. 701, 74 Am. St. Rep. 658; Masterson v. Todd, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 131, 24 S. W. 682; Williams v. Thomas, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 472, 44 S. W. 1073; Stumpf v. Osterhage, 111 Ill. 82; Holbrook v. Forsythe, 112 Ill. 306; Wray v. R. R. Co., 86 Ill. 424; Wilson v. Johnson (Ind. Sup.) 43 N. E. 930; 1 Cyc. 1090, 1091; 3 Wash. Real Prop. § 1981. It was therefore error to admit the deed in evidence.

2. Possession of land by one's ancestor cannot be proven by general family reputa.

It is a fact which must be established by evidence which is not hearsay. Family tradition of possession of the ancestral home is objectionable as hearsay testimony. The Civ. Code 1895, § 5177, which permits descent, relationship, birth, marriage, and death to be established by general repute in the family, can have no reference to proof of possession of land by the ancestor of the claimant of the title. The proposition is too clear for argument, and evidence of family history as to the possession of the premises in dispute by the plaintiff's intestate was erroneously admitted.

3. Complaint is made that the court allowed in evidence the minutes of the court of ordinary containing the application of one Pitts, as administrator of plaintiff's intestate, for leave to sell certain land therein described. If the purpose of this evidence was to show possession of the land by a former administrator of plaintiff's intestate, it was open to the objection of irrelevancy. An application for leave to sell land by an administrator is neither evidence of possession nor title in his intestate. An administrator may apply for leave to sell land which is held adversely to him at the time of the application. Indeed, if his purpose is to recover land held adversely by an heir, an order of sale is a necessary prerequisite. Head v. Driver, 79 Ga. 179, 3 S. E. 621. It cannot be said that an application for leave to sell could, in any view, be a link in the plaintiff's chain of title. The court should have repelled this evidence.

4. The return of the commissioners appointed by the superior court of Harris county to admeasure and assign dower to the widow of J. T. Whitehead was admitted in evidence over the objection of the defendant. The only part of the land described in the return which related to the premises involved in the suit was described as "ten acres in front and north of the house, cut from lot 272," and the objection to the evidence was that the description was void for uncertainty, and not legal evidence of title. The other land assigned to the widow in the return of the commissioners was definitely and particularly described; but there was no description of the premises which are the subject-matter of the present suit. For this reason the dower proceedings, as to the 10 acres referred to in the return, were wholly ineffectual. The extent of the widow's claim should appear from the return of the commissioners, because the widow is entitled only to possession of the land which has been defined by them and admeasured to her as dower. The admeasurement of dower must, with reasonable clearness, disclose the lines of demarcation between the land which the heirs are entitled to presently enjoy and that the enjoyment of which has been postponed till the widow's death. "The return of the commissioners should include a particular description of the land admeasured and laid off to the widow, although errors in the description—as a mistake in the lot or section number—will not be fatal." 14 Cyc. 1008. See, also, Smith v. Smith, 112 Ga. 351, 37 S. E. 407. A return by commissioners that they had laid off "four acres around the house" was, in Stevens v. Stevens, 3 Dana (Ky.) 371, held to be fatally indefinite. There is no essential difference in the procedure for admeasuring dower and for setting apart a year's support in land; and in a proceeding to assign a year's support out of 150 acres of land, to which proceeding a caveat had been filed, it was held by this court that a verdict giving to the widow "fifty acres of land where dwelling house now stands" was, as to this land, too vague and uncertain to be capable of enforcement. Lee v. English, 107 Ga. 152, 33 S. E. 39. The location of the 10 acres, which the dower commissioners described as being "in front and north of the house, cut from lot 272," cannot be definitely ascertained without a resort to extrinsic evidence as to what was the tract of land which the commissioners intended should be set apart to her as dower out of lot 272. It might be a square, a rectangle with a short or long base, or any irregular figure. The description of it set forth in the commissioners' return was too vague and uncertain to support an assignment of dower covering any part of land lot 272. This being true, the return had no relevancy to any issue in the case, and the court should have rejected the same.

The foregoing disposes of all the questions which it is necessary to discuss, as the other assignments of error relate to matters which cannot arise on another hearing of the case.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

PITTS v. WHITEHEAD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 27, 1905.)

DEED—VALIDITY—DESCRIPTION—EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. A deed in which the description is so indefinite as to afford no means of identifying any land is inoperative either as a conveyance of title or as color of title.

2. In a suit in ejectment by an administrator, where the defendant was the plaintiff's predecessor as administrator of the estate, but claims the land under a deed from another, evidence of an application by defendant, as administrator, to sell certain lands of the estate, and of an order of the court of ordinary granting this application, the land sued for not being embraced in either the application or the order, is irrelevant.

3. The other questions made will probably not again arise in this case, and therefore will not be passed upon.

Error from Superior Court, Harris County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Action by A. H. Whitehead, administrator, against I. H. Pitts. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. H. Martin and J. B. Burnside, for plaintiff in error. Hatcher & Carson, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. An action of ejectment was brought against Pitts by A. H. Whitehead, as administrator of the estate of John T. Whitehead, to recover a tract of land, part of lot 271, in the Seventeenth District of Harris county, Ga. Plaintiff relied upon a deed from Echols to John T. Whitehead, and the possession of John T. Whitehead and of plaintiff as administrator; also upon an assignment of dower to Catherine T. Whitehead, the widow of John T., and the termination of the dower estate by the death of the widow. The defendant pleaded the general issue, title by prescription, based on twenty years' adverse possession and possession for seven years under deed from Mary Whitehead. The evidence was conflicting, the case turning principally upon the question as to the location of a dividing line. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant made a motion for a new trial. This was overruled, and the movant excepted.

1. Complaint was made of the admission in evidence of the deed from Echols to John T. Whitehead, purporting to convey "all that tract or parcel of land containing two hundred and fifty-five acres, more or less, it being part of lot 270, and part of lot 271, and part of lot 274, part of lot 272, all in the 17th District of Harris County." The objection made was that this deed was void for uncertainty, there being no sufficient description of the land conveyed. That the description in this particular deed was so indefinite as to afford no means of identifying the land sought to be conveyed, and that the deed was, therefore, inadmissible in evidence either as a conveyance of title or as color of title, see Luttrell v. Whitehead (this day decided) 49 S. E. 691.

2. Complaint was made of admitting in evidence the minutes of the court of ordinary showing (1) the application of Pitts, the present plaintiff in error, who had preceded defendant in error as administrator of the estate of John T. Whitehead, for leave to sell certain lands of the intestate; and (2) the order of the court of ordinary granting this application. Neither the application nor the order embraced any part of lot 271, in which is located the land involved in the present suit, and upon this ground defendant objected to this evidence. The application and order had nothing to do with the land in dispute. They did not embrace it or refer to it, and were not admissible for any purpose.

3. For the errors above pointed out, the judgment refusing a new trial must be reversed. The only other grounds of the motion for new trial related to charges of the court which were excepted to because of certain verbal inaccuracies. Against these the trial judge will doubtless guard on the next trial, and it is not necessary, nor would it be profitable, to discuss them at length.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

ROBY et al. v. NEWTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 27, 1905.)

REMAINDERMAN—RIGHT OF POSSESSION—WASTE
—TENANT IN DOWER—FORFEITURE—PROCEDURE—ISSUES—DAMAGES.

1. Under Civil Code 1895, § 3090, a remainderman is not entitled to claim immediate possession as a result of a forfeiture of the interest of the tenant for life, unless it appears that there has been both permissive and voluntary waste by the tenant, or one for whose conduct he is responsible, and it must also appear that the voluntary waste was committed wantonly, and in a manner evidencing an utter disregard of the rights of the next taker.

Fish, P. J., and Lamar, J., dissent.

2. A petition by heirs at law against a doweress alleged acts of waste, and prayed for a forfeiture of the estate of the tenant in dower, and in the alternative for damages in the event the evidence did not establish a forfeiture. There was no special demurrer to the petition. Held, that at the trial the judge should have submitted both issues to the jury without any written request asking the submission of the question of damages.

3. There was no evidence to authorize a forfeiture, but there was evidence which would have authorized a finding in favor of the plaintiff on the question of damages, and it was error not to submit this issue to the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Kate M. Roby and others against Cornelia Newton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

This was an action by the heirs at law of a decedent against his widow, who was in possession of a tract of land which had been set apart as her dower, upon which land was situated the mansion house and other improvements. It is alleged that the widow has committed waste, in that she has allowed the improvements to become out of repair, and has also actually destroyed other improvements, as well as having cut timber growing upon the land. It is also alleged that the acts complained of were done wantonly, with a deliberate intention to injure the plaintiffs; that the defendant is insolvent, and has no property except her dower, unless it be some small personal property of trifling value, which is incumbered by liens exceeding in amount the value of the property; and that the defendant has cleared up lands, and threatens to clear up other lands and destroy the timber thereon, while the cleared land and uncleared land is now in that proportion that a prudent person would desire. The prayers were that the plaintiffs recover the land as forfeited to them by the acts of waste complained of; that, in the event this prayer is denied, they recover damages; and that the defendant be restrained.

ed from further acts of waste tending to the permanent injury of the freehold. The answer of the defendant, was, in effect, a general denial of all the material allegations of the petition. The trial resulted in a verdict for the defendant, and the case is here upon an assignment of error by the plaintiffs complaining of the overruling of their motion for a new trial.

J. D. Kilpatrick, for plaintiffs in error.
Greene F. Johnson, for defendant in error.
